Rhineland Agricultural Society was organized in February 1931 to serve the citizens of the Rural Municipality of Rhineland (q.v.) and adjoining areas of southern Manitoba. Its headquarters are in Altona, where its annual fall fair is held. Although it is not a church organization, most of the society's officers and members have been Mennonites. From 1931 through April 1937 it published Rhineland Agricultural Society's Quarterly and since then has continued the publication of its Annual Fall Fair Prize List. The society assists the farmers in the control of crop and livestock diseases and in obtaining seeds of new and better varieties of crops, promotes interest in agriculture and works for the improvement of rural life, sponsors agricultural and homemaking schools, short courses, correspondence courses, and lectures on agricultural problems, and holds agricultural fairs. Its financial support comes from the Manitoba Department of Agriculture and the Rural Municipality of Rhineland, as well as from private organizations and individuals and the members of the society. Since the early 1940's a full-time agriculturalist has been serving the society, who in addition to giving direct aid to the farmers supervises boys' and girls' clubs, in which thousands of young people have been enrolled. The annual fairs avoid the kind of amusements often associated with these events, although they do feature sports, music, and instructive educational lectures, as well as contests in livestock, poultry, grains, grasses, fruits and vegetables, and in junior educational exhibits. Rhineland, Rural Municipality of, equivalent to a county in the United States, was established in 1884 as a local government unit by the Manitoba government. First called Douglas, it was renamed Rhineland in 1891 at the request of its citizens. It covers an area of 18 townships, a block roughly 18 x 18 miles, 360 sq. miles, or 230,400 acres, extending north from the United States border just west of the Red River. It includes the towns of Altona, Gretna, Plum Coulee, Horndean, and Rosenfeld, and 15 villages, including Sommerfeld and Halbstadt. Altona is the civic and business capital of the area. Its area is almost identical with the original West Reserve grant. In 1949 it had a population of 8,000, in 1959 some 6,500, then being the most densely populated rural district in Manitoba. It is a prosperous rural area with almost 100 per cent of its land under cultivation. It has probably the largest concentration of Mennonite population in compact block in North America, with very little admixture of population of non-Mennonite stock. The reeves, secretary-treasurers, and members of the Municipal Council have almost always been exclusively Mennonite. H. T. Hamm of Altona served as secretary-treasurer 1913-43. The largest body of Mennonites in the area is the Bergthal Mennonite Church. The former Sommerfeld and Old Colony group were largely replaced by newer immigrants from Russia in 1922-26. The Rudnerweide group had its origin here and has most of its members in the municipality. Rhineland-Stanley Teachers' Association includes the teachers of the rural municipalities of Rhineland and Stanley in southern Manitoba, most of whom are Mennonites. This association was organized by H. H. Ewert of Gretna, Man., in the 1890's to further the cause of education among the Mennonites of this province. The members of the association hold a two-day convention each fall. Before World War I the second day of the convention was always conducted in German, but now both days are in English. The locale of the convention alternates between the main towns of the two municipalities. The 1949 convention was held in Winkler; 145 teachers attended. By 1958 the RSTA area was organized into two divisions with 220 teachers, though still meeting in one convention. N. G. Neufeld has been convention secretary for the past ten years.

Rhodes, John (d. 1766), a Mennonite minister, born near Zürich, Switzerland, emigrated to America in 1728, settled in Shenandoah County, Va., in 1730, and later moved to Page County, Va. In August 1766 eight Indians led by a white man massacred eight members of this family. Two daughters escaped and one son was held captive two years by the Indians in their camps west of the Ohio River.

Rhodium, Marianne (1814-1902), a Mennonite philanthropist, was born Oct. 12, 1814, at Crefeld, Germany. After the death of her husband Christian Rhodium in 1873 she lived quietly in retirement, finding her happiness in making others happy. The records of the "Rhodium petitions" which she quietly granted, have been preserved in the archives of the Crefeld city poor-law administration. Of these petitions there were in poor years about 2,400; in 1892-93, 2,191 were granted; after 1884 Mrs. Rhodium contributed 25,000 Marks annually for this purpose alone. In addition she was the first contributor in all undertakings for the common welfare (e.g., 100,000 Marks for the erection of the Kaiser Wilhelm Museum). Almost unnoticed were her contributions to all institutions and associations as well as for the support of talented students in the universities or art schools, regardless of creed. When she came into the inheritance of the property of her uncle Cornelius de Greiff (q.v.) she contributed the business house of the firm of her grandfather, Cornelius and Johann Floh, for the initial care of the poor; four years later 25,000 Talers to enlarge the city hospital; and in 1867, 50,000 Talers for the support of fifty needy families (see de Greiff). Later she gave 40,000 Marks for the building of a market hall, and in her will, under the name of "Cornelius de Greiff'schen Unterstützungsfonds," she bequeathed to the city for benevolent purposes 1,800,000 Marks, to the Linn community 100,000 Marks, and for institutions and communities at other places, including the Mennonite congregations at Weierhof, Neuwied, and Monsheim, 54,000 Marks. Her residence, which the city acquired in 1905 from the heirs, houses the Crefeld city library. A portrait of this benefactress has been placed in the library. (*Menn. Rhönbruderhof (Bruderhof Neuhoof, Fulda district, Germany), the name given in 1934 to the settlement of Hutterian Brethren, originally called simply "Bruderhof," which was founded in the foothills of the Rhön Mountains of Germany in 1926 by the Sannerz brotherhood, and which existed until 1937. The contract of its founding, dated Dec. 5, 1926, which was the expression of "the fundamental common expression of the direction of the will and the work for all time," says: "The publications of the Eberhard Arnold-Verlag and the work of lecturing connected with it shall be continued in the spirit of the hitherto published books, writings, and periodicals; likewise the daughter congregation in the spirit of the Sannerz letters and the Wegwarte. Above all the open door and the community of life and goods of the early Christian church are to be kept open and carried on. . . . The contracting parties on the occasion of the hereby established founding of the Bruderhof express their unanimous will that this agreement shall remain unconditionally and without a break directive also for all successors of both parties." The name Bruderhof was adopted from the older Hutterite terminology.

To the original small peasant farm Hansahof two additional adjacent farms were added, thus giving the Rhönbruderhof about 250 Prussian Morgen of fields, meadows, pastures, and woods. By 1934 a small communal settlement had been erected by new buildings and remodeling of old ones, which offered simple subsistence to about 140 persons. From this colony Eberhard Arnold set out to visit the Hutterite settlements in the United States and Canada in 1930-31. Through the union established at that time with the Americans the inner and outer structure was continued under the deep impact of the four-hundred-year-old history of the genuinely fraternal communal living of the Hutterites. The elder (Wortführer) was supported by one or two assistant preachers (Diener am Wort). Together they bore the responsibility for all the internal and practical affairs, assisted by the householder in business matters, the work supervisor (Weinzedel) for the systematic distribution of labor, the treasurer (Kästner) for provisions, and the housemother for feminine concerns. Several additional brethren (Zeugnisbrüder) were called on for support in making important spiritual decisions; each field of work was supervised by a responsible member of the brotherhood. But the final authority in all inner and outer matters lay, as in all Hutterite communities, in the Spirit-led, united brotherhood as the bearer of the reality of the church.

The divisions of work included agriculture with the gardens, the community school with the children's home, the publishing house with its printing and distribution of books, the office, the various workshops for trades and building; in addition there were, besides the care of the smaller children, also the various household activities. The infants were cared for in the nursery and "creeping-room." At the age of two or three years they were placed in the kindergarten until they were of school age. Young people were educated according to their gifts and abilities. In the children's home orphans and children from difficult social circumstances were supported and educated with the children of the commune in the spirit of true brotherhood. Among the older children there were frequent conversions which led to an inner union with the brotherhood. In the publishing house and the printery which was instituted in 1931 the work begun in Sannerz was continued, especial attention being given to research, collection and publication of the old Hutterite writings. In 1932 the printing of the Klein Geschichtsbuch by Johannes Waldner was begun, and in that year as well as in the next an epistle was issued to the Hutterian Brethren of North America. With the Nazi rise to power in 1933, the death of Eberhard Arnold in 1935, and other difficulties, the work on the old manuscripts was seriously hindered, and the printing of the Klein Geschichtsbuch could not be completed. The preaching of the Word among the brethren and the numerous guests and assistants on the Bruderhof was, besides the education of the children and public witness in spoken and written word, the most important work of the missionary community on the Rhönbruderhof, so that the brotherhood grew from a membership of 40 in 1927 to 130 in 1934 through the influx of persons from Germany and other countries, who had convictions favoring the communal life.

In spite of the difficulties evoked by the Nazi government, the Bruderhof attempted to continue its work in the same spirit as before. But by November 1933, the Gestapo instituted a search of the buildings, closed the school and the children's home, and forbade the care of strangers on the Bruderhof. Since the distribution of literature in Germany was also restricted, a daughter colony was founded early in 1934 in the principality of Liechtenstein. The school, children's home, and publication were transferred to the Almbruderhof (q.v.) there. In consequence of the emigration of a part of the Bruderhof and the departure of a number more when military training became obligatory in Germany in 1935, the Rhönbruderhof was seriously weakened. By such measures as heavy taxation, foreclosure of mortgages, and other economic regulations the state tried to compel the Bruderhof to close; but with the assistance of the Almbruderhof and the Cotswold Bruderhof, the Rhönbruderhof was able to maintain itself until it was forcibly closed by the Gestapo. Eberhard Arnold died on Nov. 22, 1935, in the midst of this severe struggle. His Innenland, revised in 1932, was published soon after his death, as well as the booklet, Eberhard Arnold, Sein Leben für die Bruderhöfe. At the end of 1936 the Cotswold Bruderhof in England took over the printery and the extensive library. In April 1937 two American Hutterite elders, David Hofer of James Valley, Man., and Michael Waldner of Bon Homme, S.D., visited the Bruderhof and were witnesses of its dissolution on April 14, 1937, the arrest of the three directing members of the corporation, the confiscation of endowments, and the expulsion of the members with their children from the grounds. Through negotiations the expelled group succeeded in obtaining permission to emigrate to Liechtenstein and Holland. David Hofer gives an account of these events in Der Pflug (Vol. I, no. 3) and The Plough (Vol. I, no. 3) in the form of pages from his diary, titled "Die Auflösung des Rhönbruderhofes in Deutschland." A few of the exiles were admitted to the Almbruderhof; most of them for two months enjoyed the hospitality of the Dutch Mennonites in Bilthoven and Elspeet, until they could proceed to England and enter the Cotswold Bruderhof. After three months the three imprisoned brethren were released and permitted to join their families in England. The Rhönbruderhof was sold at auction by the authorities.

In Liechtenstein and in England the brotherhood was able to live according to its faith, until it was compelled by reasons of war to emigrate to Paraguay. Three Bruderhofs were established in Primavera, Paraguay, whereas in England the communal life was revived in 1942 in the Wheathill Bruderhof (q.v.). In all four of these settlements the work was carried on in the spirit of the contract of founding as a work of re-establishment of the primitive Christian and primitive Anabaptist church. Later a Bruderhof was established at Woodcrest (q.v.), Refton, N.Y. E.C.H.A.

Ribeauville, a town (pop. 3,866) 9 miles north of Colmar in Upper Alsace, the seat of an early Anabaptist congregation and also of an 18th-century Mennonite congregation, long since extinct. Two Anabaptists arrested in Basel in 1534 stated under torture that Anabaptist meetings were being held at Ribeauville and also near Colmar, and that a service attended by 300 persons had met in a forest between Colmar and Ingersheim. In all this region, they said, their doctrine was making progress; Hunawir, near Ribeauville, was almost completely won over, and the brethren were numerous at Riquewihr and Kaysersberg. There continued to be Anabaptists in the region of Colmar until in the 17th century. Immigration from Switzerland after the Thirty Years' War established a considerable Mennonite settlement northeast of Colmar, with meeting places in various villages in this area, which also changed as the places of settlement of the members changed. Whether one of these places of meeting was Ribeauville in this and the later period down into the 19th century is not definitely known. H.S.B.

Rich (Riche, Richen, Reich, Ricken, Rijkens) is a widely spread Mennonite family name. The Rich(en) family stems from Frutigen in the Bernese Oberland of Switzerland; it is also found in Hochstetten, west of Langnau in the Emmental (q.v.). Persecution in the canton of Bern (q.v.), lasting into the 18th century, compelled many Mennonites to emigrate. The "Amnesty Proclamation" issued by the Bernese government on Feb. 11, 1711, permitting them to leave freely with all their possessions, had as a consequence a mass emigration, in which the Richen family was included.

Among the refugees settling in the Netherlands was Daniel Richen (Ricken) (c1681-c1755), an Amish Mennonite preacher, who had previously been banished to Neuchâtel (q.v.) and then at the age of thirty served as supervisor on the emigrant boat sailing for the Netherlands in 1711, settled first in Deventer (q.v.) and later became an elder and organizer in the congregations of the Nieuwe Zwitsers (see Swiss Mennonites in the Netherlands), in Groningen (q.v.) and Sappemeer (q.v.). Peter Ricken (d. 1772), probably a brother of Daniel, was a preacher here in 1740-72. They were all farmers and lived near Groningen, where some descendants are still living (Rijkens). David Ricken (d. 1779), a son of Daniel Ricken, was a preacher of the Old Flemish congregation in Norden, East Friesland, 1777-79.

A second place of refuge for the Swiss Mennonites was Montbéliard (q.v.), now in the French department of Doubs. There were Richens here since 1715. A Hans Richen, a well-to-do farmer with eight children, was for many years an elder in the congregation of Swiss origin, a leading personality. The congregation met every second week in his home; in 1730 he began to keep a church record. In April 1787 he assisted in the ordination of an elder in the Schänzli (q.v.) congregation of Basel (q.v.), and in June of that year he recommended two brethren of the Chaux de Fonds (q.v.) congregation in the Bernese Jura to the office of elder (see his note in the Bernese dialect, ML III, 498). He also traveled to the Netherlands as one of the elders from Alsace called to the New Swiss (q.v.) congregations in 1766 to arbitrate a dispute among them. A century later Isaac Rich (d. 1878), who had grown up in the Seigne (q.v.) congregation and attended the Mennonite (GCM) school at Wadsworth (q.v.), Ohio, established a school in Etupes, near Montbéliard, which was soon moved to Exincourt and continued there until 1876. Other members of the Rich family served as preachers or deacons in the Montbéliard congregation until the 20th century. Peter Rich was the elder of the Birkenhof (q.v.) congregation in Upper Alsace 1788-c1820.

In Mennonite circles in Switzerland—Bernese Jura and Basel—and in France—Montbéliard, Altkirch, and Florimont—the name continues. It is also found in Ohio, Iowa, Kansas, and other states. Willis E. Rich and Ronald L. Rich are on the faculty of Bethel College. Olive G. Rich is on the faculty of Goshen College. Eldon S. Rich is a practicing physician in Newton, Kan. S.G., NEFF, E.C.

Richardson, Samuel (1689-1761), owner of a publishing house at London, England, and a novelist, some of whose novels (Pamela, 1740; Clarissa Harlowe, 1747-48; and Charles Grandison, 1753) have been translated into Dutch. Johannes Stinstra (q.v.) translated Clarissa Harlowe in eight volumes (Harlingen, 1752-55); for Volumes 3, 5, and 7 Stinstra wrote prefaces of 60, 32, and 28 pages, in which he explained and defended Richardson's moralism. In 1752-56 Richardson and Stinstra exchanged a number of letters, which were published in The Correspondence of Samuel Richardson (London, 1804). Richardson's novels were very popular in the Netherlands, influencing such authors as Wolff and Deken (q.v.), and were read with special interest by the Mennonites. vdZ.

Richert (Richertz, Richaert, Richers, Riggert, Riggers), a family name which originated among the Mennonites of Prussia and spread to Russia and America. The earliest appearance of the name in Mennonite records is found in 1632. It was found in Danzig, Schöensee, and Przechowka. The Alexanderwohl church record has had many bearers of this name during more than 300 years. The first bearer of the name, Knels Richert, a shoemaker, joined the Mennonites in 1632. He was an ancestor of the Alexanderwohl Richerts. From Goessel, Kan., the name has spread over numerous states.

Among the prominent members of the family have been Heinrich Richert (q.v.), an outstanding leader of the Goessel Mennonite community, and his son Peter H. Richert (1871-1949), former pastor of the Tabor Mennonite Church of Goessel and a G.C.M. leader. A second son, David H. Richert (1875-), was for many years professor of mathematics and astronomy at Bethel College. Peter Richert (1850-1937) served as pastor of the Reedley M.B. Church. Herbert C. Richert (1900-) is professor of music at Tabor College. John Henry Richert (1883-) is a minister in the M.B. church at Dinuba, Cal., and Irvin Richert is pastor of the G.C.M. church at Buhler, Kan. Richert, Heinrich (1831-95), an outstanding Mennonite (GCM) teacher, minister, and leader, born May 23, 1831, the oldest son of David Richert, at Deutsch-Kunopath, West Prussia, where he became a member of the Przechovka Mennonite Church. Before he was a year old his parents moved to Russia and settled in the village Alexanderwohl of the Molotschna settlement. He attended the school at Lichtfelde and passed the teacher's examination in 1851, after which he taught in Nikolaidorf. In 1849 he was baptized by Elder Peter Wedel and in 1856 he married Anna Schmidt. In 1859 he was elected minister. Soon his influence in the congregation became noticeable. He favored active participation in mission work and some changes in traditions. The first Mennonite missionary, Heinrich Dirks (q.v.), came from this church. In 1860 Richert accepted the call to teach in the neighboring school of Gnadenheim where he had from seventy to eighty pupils. In 1869 his wife died, leaving him with eight children. His second wife was Helena Unruh.

In August 1874 Richert joined a group of Alexanderwohl Mennonites who emigrated to Kansas and established the Alexanderwohl or Goessel Mennonite community. Here he continued his work as minister and was particularly active in promoting the educational and missionary efforts of the General Conference Mennonite Church. After attending the General Conference sessions in South Dakota in 1890 he suffered a cerebral hemorrhage which paralyzed him. On Oct. 16, 1895, he died. C.K.

Richert, Peter H. (1871-1949), a teacher and leader in the General Conference Mennonite Church, was born Aug. 11, 1871, at Gnadenheim, province of Taurida, South Russia, the son of Heinrich and Helena Unruh Richert. In 1874 he came to America with his parents, with whom he experienced the hardships of pioneer life. He grew up near Goessel, Kan., attended Halstead Seminary, and completed the Bible course at Bethel College in 1897. On Aug. 16, 1900, he married Eva Schmidt and to them were born five children.

Richert taught five years in the district schools and fifteen years at the Bethel College Academy. In 1896 he was elected evangelist in his home church of Alexanderwohl and several years later elected minister of this church. In 1908 he was elected as pastor of the newly organized Tabor Mennonite Church, and on Oct. 2, 1910, ordained as its elder; he served here until 1946, when he suffered a stroke which partially paralyzed him.

Peter Richert's dream of serving as a foreign missionary never materialized, but was partly fulfilled in the tremendous amount of work which he did as secretary of the Foreign Mission Board in 1910-46. Reports sent in by the foreign missionaries were published in the Mission Quarterly, which he edited 1924-31. In 1913 he served as vice-president for the All-Mennonite Convention. 1914-18 found him president of the Kansas Ministers' Conference, and 1920-29 president of the Bethel College board of directors. For seven years he was president of the Western District Conference.

Richert's preaching was mainly expository; very frequently he preached about the cause he loved most, viz., missions. He was also deeply interested in the promotion of peace. In 1940 he wrote a catechism entitled Some Difficult Passages Concerning the Use of the Sword. He died on Oct. 24, 1949. R.E.F.

Richfield Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Richfield, Juniata Co., Pa., a member of the Eastern District Conference, began in 1883, when about 125 members, the larger part of the Cross Roads (q.v.) congregation, with three ministers, Solomon and Thomas Graybill and William Bergey, and deacon Abel Shirk, withdrew from the Lancaster County (MC) Conference to form an independent congregation. A meetinghouse was built in 1886 and enlarged in 1914 and 1950. A Sunday school was organized in 1914. In 1928 the congregation joined the Eastern District Conference. The membership in 1958 was 270, with Walter J. Dick as pastor. Biweekly worship services were held until 1948, when weekly Sunday morning and evening services were begun. W.J.D.

Richmond, the capital (pop. 230,000) of Virginia, is located in the eastern part of the state. The National Heights Mennonite Church (MC), organized in 1951, had a membership of 27 in 1957, with Truman H. Brunk as bishop in charge. The university and seminary in the city attract an increasing number of Mennonite students. E.W.C.

Rich(s)t (Rixt, Ryxt), an Anabaptist martyr, also called Richt Heynes because she was the wife of Heyne Renicxzoon Schuytemaker (maker of boats), living at IJlst, Dutch province of Friesland, was arrested there on Oct. 12, 1556, and taken to Leeuwarden, the capital of Friesland. Her husband, also a Mennonite, escaped. After she had given birth to a son in prison, Richt was tried and severely tortured and, "desiring not to part from Christ," was finally sentenced to death. On March 14, 1557, she was executed by being put in a sack and drowned. During the trial she admitted that she had been rebaptized, and had regularly taken part in the meetings of the "sectarists," i.e., the Mennonites, at IJlst. Both van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, and the Bibliographie des Martyrologes Protestants Néerlandais state that Richt was put to death about 1547, but this has been proved an error. vöZ.

Ridderus, Franciscus (François) (c1618-83), was a Dutch Reformed minister, who served at Schermerhorn, Brielle, and Rotterdam. He is known for his religious poems and devotional books; his Bloedspiegel der Religie, which deals with Christian martyrs (no Mennonites), went through several editions. Besides these he published Doop, Avondmaal en Disciplin van de tijden Christi af vervolgens tot den jaare 1672 (Amsterdam, 1672). Though he defended infant baptism and rejected Mennonite doctrines, Ridderus is one of the few Reformed authors who did not repeat the calumny that the Mennonites are descended from the Münsterites (q.v.). In Doop (p. 698) he gave Menno Simons and the Mennonites this favorable testimonial: "When Menno Simons came to rebaptism, the Münsterite revolt broke out, but Menno showed clearly that he detested this wicked rebellion and he vigorously attacked it. The Doopsgezinden (Mennonites) in Holland too have always been quiet, honest, and peaceful people. During and after the Münster rebellion there were violent revolts by those who called themselves Wederdopers (Anabaptists), but these men came from abroad, and one should take care not to blacken all the Mennonites." Ridge Valley (GCM) Meeting, Bucks County, Pa. A deed of Dec. 12, 1792, conveyed a parcel of land in West Rockhill Twp., Bucks Co., Pa., to "the Lutheran and Reformed Calvinist societies." A log school on the tract was used as a house of worship at least until 1833 when it was renovated. It is not known when the Mennonites began to share in the use of this union house of worship, possibly before 1833, but in 1854 the Lutherans, the Reformed, and the Mennonites united to build a meetinghouse for their common use. The building committee consisted of one representative from each group, the Mennonite being Jacob Roth. It appears that the Mennonites who united in this project were of the Oberholtzer group (GCM). The Mennonite services seem to have soon died out, but were resumed about 1881, only to be discontinued permanently in 1886. J.C.W.

Ried, a town (pop. 12,000) in Upper Austria, until 1779 and again in 1810-16 belonging to Bavaria (q.v.). Anabaptism came to Ried in the early days of the movement. Wolfgang Brandhuber (q.v.), of Passau, had won a group here for the Anabaptist cause in 1528. In the 1530's the Philippites (q.v.) settled here after their withdrawal from Moravia; Riedemann (q.v.) visited them in Ried. But in the early 1540's they disappeared from the town. Hutterite missionaries were martyrs here: Hans Blüedl (q.v.) 1545, Hans Aichner (q.v.) 1585, Georg Bruckmaier (q.v.) 1585, Wolf Rauffer (q.v.) 1585, Marcus Eder (q.v.) 1605, Hänsel Poltzinger (q.v.) 1605. In 1610, he was deposed from his office on account of the "disgraceful and seducing art of alchemy" and laxity in performing his duty. He was then admitted as householder at Pellertitz (q.v.), but because of his offensive attitude he was expelled on July 16, 1612. He died at Pribitz on April 1, 1616. NEFF, E.C.

Riedemaier: see Riedmair.

Riedemann (Rideman, Rydeman, Ryedeman), Peter (1506-56), Hutterite bishop, missionary, and outstanding doctrinal writer, by some called the second founder of the Hutterite brotherhood. Because of his height he was also called "the tall Peter," and because of his first imprisonment in Gmunden (q.v.), Upper Austria, was also known as "Peter of Gmunden."

Riedemann was born in 1506 in Hirschberg, Silesia, Germany, where he learned the shoemaker's trade. In 1529 he is encountered for the first time, imprisoned in Gmunden for his Anabaptist faith. Apparently he had joined the Anabaptist Brethren in Upper Austria (q.v.) sometime before, where Hans Hut (q.v.) and later Wolfgang Brandhuber (q.v.) had been active as missionaries, mainly around the cities of Linz, Steyr, and Gmunden 1527-29. Riedemann had been ordained as "Diener des Wortes" in 1529. During his three years' imprisonment (1529-32) Riedemann wrote his first great doctrinal work, Rechenschaft unseres Glaubens geschrieben zu Gmunden im Land ob der Enns im Gefencknus, a work of deeply spiritual qualities, which placed Riedemann doctrinally very near to his contemporary brethren Hans Schlaffer (q.v.) and Leonhard Schiemer. (A complete publication of this work is planned for the second volume of Glaubenszeugnisse, to be published in the Täuferakten Series in 1960.) Even though Riedemann at the time of writing this work had not yet joined the Hutterites, they have faithfully preserved this "Account of Our Faith" in numerous manuscript books. Besides its main part, this work contains also two separate pieces of great beauty not strictly belonging to the confession proper: (1) Wie man das Haus Gottes bauen soll und was Haus Gottes sei, and (2) Von den sieben Pfeilern an diesem Hause (Prov. 9:1).

In 1532 Riedemann escaped from prison. He worked first with the Brethren in Linz (q.v.), but soon thereafter joined the Hutterite brotherhood in Moravia (q.v.) then still in its formative years. In 1533 he was sent out for the first time as a missionary (Sendbote) into Franconia, to spread the Anabaptist message. On his way he revisited the remnants of the older Anabaptist groups in Upper Austria, inviting them to join the Moravian group. In 1533-37 he was again jailed for the sake of his faith in Nürnberg (q.v.), but little is recorded of him in this period. In July 1537 he was released from prison upon his promise not to preach in Nürnberg, and he now returned home to Moravia, again via Upper Austria. Here he met the remnants of the Philippite Brethren (q.v.) and took them into his care as if he were their bishop. Four epistles from his hand (1537-39) written to these Philippite Brethren in Linz, Steyr, and Gmunden, and two more (1537-38 and 1540) to other Philippites in Germany (Württemberg, Palatinate, etc.) are still extant. These epistles give a strong impression of pastoral care for this almost leaderless group, some of whom later joined the Hutterites in Moravia.

About 1532, prior to the above journey, Riedemann married an Anabaptist sister Katharina, called familiarly "Treindl." Among his many letters there are six very lovely ones sent to his "marital sister." In 1539 the Brethren sent him again on a mission trip to Hesse (q.v.) mainly to straighten out an unpleasant affair with Hans Both (q.v.), a friend of Melchior Rinck (q.v.) and a former Philippite. At Holzhausen Riedemann composed an important epistle. Returning in the same year 1539, he arrived at the brotherhood a few days after the unfortunate government raid at Steinabrunn (q.v.), Lower Austria. Several letters of comfort written to the imprisoned in Falkenstein (q.v.) are extant, which again show Riedemann as a true pastor, loving and full of concern. Two months later he was again on his way to Hesse through Austria, Tirol (q.v.), Württemberg (q.v.), and Swabia (Lauingen, q.v.), visiting all the groups he could reach. In Hesse he seems to have been very successful, since large numbers (up to 90-100) were now making their way to Moravia. Some of these newly won members were imprisoned in Württemberg en route; Riedemann comforted them too in the genuine fashion of a shepherd.

Not long thereafter, most likely toward the end of February 1540, Riedemann himself fell into the hands of the authorities of Hesse and was chained in a dark and severe prison in Marburg (q.v.). It should be noted that Philip (q.v.) of Hesse did not permit Anabaptists to be put to death. The numerous letters written by Riedemann during this imprisonment (1540 to early 1542) show that his condition was soon eased. He was permitted to help the jailer by making shoes, and then he and another brother were removed to the near-by castle of Wolkersdorf, where the administrator (Vogt) was sympathetic to Anabaptist ideas and somewhat ashamed of all the imprisonment. Riedemann now had full freedom of movement, but he felt obligated to remain at the castle. His activities were manifold. He received visitors from Hesse and from Moravia (his old friend Hans Gentner (q.v.), a former Philippite from Austria, but now a Hutterite, was sent to consult him concerning a difficult case at home), and he continued to dispatch newly won brethren and sisters to Moravia. In 1541 his correspondence became more sparse; it may be assumed that at that time he was working on his great doctrinal work, the Rechenschaft (q.v.). One of the letters (No. 21) indicates that his main motive for writing this confession was to inform Philip of Hesse about the true beliefs and viewpoints of the Anabaptists. (This fact was not known heretofore.) Since he had full leisure, the book became rather lengthy and carefully worked out. More trouble in the Moravian brotherhood and the death of the Vorsteher Hans Amon (q.v.) in February 1542 prompted the Brethren to ask him to come home if he could manage it without hurting his conscience.

Late in February 1542 Riedemann was back in Moravia, where after Hans Amon's death Leonhard Lanzensiel (q.v.) was chosen Vorsteher of the brotherhood. Riedemann was now made co-bishop, and this co-operation worked out very well. Lanzensiel was more of a practical man, while Riedemann was the great spiritual teacher and leader. From now until his death in 1556 Riedemann remained with the brotherhood, leading it forcefully through years of severe persecution and trial. In 1545 the brotherhood presented to the lords of Moravia a petition (found in Beck, 169-73, incomplete) which can safely be assigned to Riedemann's hand. A copy of the Rechenschaft of 1540 was enclosed with this appeal.

The years 1547-51 brought the severest persecution which the brotherhood had to endure before their total expulsion from Moravia in 1622. The Brethren were homeless as hounded game, moving hither and thither, and digging underground tunnels (in Czech called lochy, q.v.) as temporary abodes. Many fell away, but the strong core remained loyal. In fact the group was augmented by newcomers from Silesia (former Gabrielites, q.v.). One of Riedemann's letters of this period was addressed to these Silesian brethren and spoke frankly about their suffering. One can almost feel the strong spiritual forces that bound the brotherhood together in those days, Riedemann, Lanzensiel, and Walpot (q.v.) being responsible leaders. The Rechenschaft may well have added to the strength of their conviction, as the church now had available a statement which was well argued and documented by not less than 1,800 Bible references. One last letter by Riedemann (of 1549-50) was addressed to those brethren who were now scouting for new and safer homes east of the Carpathian Mountains in (then Hungarian) Slovakia.

In December 1556 Riedemann died on the Bruderhof of Protzko (q.v.), Slovakia, at the age of fifty, having been a minister of the Divine Word for 27 years, and having suffered in prison for 9 years. The Hutterite Chronicle contains a lengthy obituary, in which all his achievements are listed with the comment, "For he was rich in all divine secrets and the gift of the spiritual language issued forth from him like a spring which gushes over. All souls who heard him gained peace. . . . On his deathbed he comforted his brethren with the words of Ezra 8:3 and 9" (presumably IV Ezra). Shortly before his passing he composed the hymn "Quitt, ledig, los hat uns gemacht Christus vom Tod, des Teufels Macht" (Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, 516).

Riedemann's written work is quite considerable and has not yet been fully studied. It may be classified in three divisions: doctrinal writings, epistles, and hymns. (a) The doctrinal writings comprise two large works, (1) the Gmundener Rechenschaft (1529-32), one of the very strong expressions of early Anabaptism, biblicistic and yet thoroughly spiritual (well called "Biblical spiritualism," as over against the general spiritualism of the Sebastian Franck type); and (2) the great Rechenschaft unseres Glaubens, written in 1540-41, one of the few books ever to have been printed by the Hutterian Brethren, published in 1565. (See Rechenschaft unserer Religion.) To this day it has remained the basic doctrinal statement of the Hutterites.

(b) The Epistles. Next to nothing was known about Riedemann's epistles until recently. Wolkan refers to them as "a major source of our knowledge of the Hutterite doctrinal position," but only four epistles were incorporated in the Chronicle and were thus known to him. As far as could be ascertained, only one manuscript codex (at a Bruderhof in Montana) and several recent copies of it contain a nearly complete collection of these most valuable documents, 34 in number (six of which are addressed to "Treindl"). To them must be added the epistle to the lords of Moravia (Landesherren) of 1545, mentioned above. The present biographical sketch has been partly drawn from the contents of these epistles. They express a deep and concrete Christian faith, a genuine brotherly love, and a pastoral concern for the fellow brethren and sisters, whom he calls his "dear little children." No prison or persecution could stop him in these acts. The epistles will be published in full in a Täuferakten (q.v.) publication in the near future.

(c) Hymns. The Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914) contain (pp. 450-537) forty-five hymns by Riedemann. One additional hymn, "O Herr, wie reichlich tröstest du," composed in 1529, was discovered by Elias Walter, the editor of the Lieder, after the publication was out, and another, the "Glaubensbekenntnis" (Ausbund, No. 2): "Wir glauben all an einen Gott," is likewise ascribed to Riedemann, even though the Brethren think it was composed by Siegmund Wiedemann (Rechenschaft, new edition, Berne, 1902, last page). Hymn 37 in the Ausbund, "Komm Gott Vater vom Himmel," is likewise by Riedemann (Lieder, 483), composed while imprisoned in Gmund in 1529, which praises the martyr death of Hans Langenmantel. It is possible that still more hymns were written by this outstanding man. Rudolf Wolkan, who carefully studied these hymns (Lieder, 185-206), considers Riedemann the greatest Hutterite hymn writer. The hymns are found in numerous Hutterite codices in both Europe and America.

One may safely say that the fact that the brotherhood weathered the critical years of 1545-51 and kept its spiritual testimony so high that they could continue unspotted until far into later centuries was due not least to the work of this man, a true bishop of his flock. His writings are preserved in numerous codices and are still being copied today by the Hutterian Brethren in America. R.F.

He took part in the negotiations with Elector Charles Louis (q.v.) of the Palatinate in 1654 regarding the establishment of a Bruderhof in Mannheim (q.v.), with the archbishop of Gran (q.v.) in 1674-76, and with the Hungarian Stadholder Georg Szelepcsényi; his co-worker and successor was Johannes Milder (q.v.). On April 20, 1665, in the name of the brotherhood in Lower Hungary, he wrote a letter to the Dutch Mennonite congregations requesting financial aid. His letter of thanks for the gift received, sent from Sobotiste, is now in the archives of the Amsterdam

Riehl, Wilhelm Heinrich (1823-97), a German historian and important writer of historical fiction, was born at Biebrich, a suburb of Wiesbaden, Germany. He was educated at the universities of Marburg, Tübingen, Giessen, and Bonn. From 1845 to 1853 he served on the editorial staff of several newspapers. In 1854 he was appointed as professor at the University of Munich. He wrote innumerable articles (745 by 1853) and over fifty Novellen, which were published in seven volumes. His most important work was Die Naturgeschichte des Volkes als Grundlage einer deutschen Social-Politik, which appeared in four volumes—Land und Leute (1853), Die bürgerliche Gesellschaft (1851), Die Familie (1855), and Wanderbuch (1869). In 1857 his Die Pfälzer, ein rheinisches Volksbild appeared. He was an outstanding folklorist.

Riehl had many Mennonites contacts. In the Rheingau, where he grew up, there were Mennonites and Amish. Riehl's father was the manager of the castle of the Nassau regents, and thus had contact with the outstanding Mennonite farmer and elder Valentin Dahlem (q.v.), who had leased the Koppenstein land at Wiesbaden. It is possible that this was the Mennonite farm depicted in Riehl's first work. His maternal grandfather, who lived in Marnheim, near the Weierhof (q.v.), is said (Schmidt) to have been related to Mennonites there (as yet unproved). On his lecture tours Riehl frequently stopped at Crefeld in the 1870's and 1880's and also visited Johannes Molenaar (q.v.), the Mennonite minister at Monsheim.

It is possible that Riehl's attention was called to Anabaptist history by Carl Adolf Cornelius (q.v.), who was about the same age as he and lived in the same general area. Both were professors at Munich in related fields at much the same time. In the 1872 issue of Raumers Historisches Taschenbuch, which Riehl edited 1871-80, Cornelius published an article, "Die Eroberung der Stadt Münster im Jahre 1535."

In 1846 Riehl published a novel, Richard Zürbach, in the literary supplement of a Frankfurt newspaper; this novel he reworked in 1848, and called it Die Geschichte vom Eisele und Beisele. The mother of the hero was the daughter of a Mennonite, or rather Amish, family which disowned her for marrying a Protestant minister. Riehl describes the mother and her father as healthy, frugal, and sensible, but intellectually dormant, with rather expressionless faces.

In 1852 Riehl published in the Allgemeine Zeitung an essay concerning the permission granted by Russia for West Prussian Mennonites to settle in the province of Samara, giving them the doubtful tribute of having contributed more to agriculture than to church history. In his 1857 book Die Pfälzer Riehl describes the Mennonites in the Palatinate, distinguishing between the Mennonites and the Amish, and praising the learning of some of the Mennonite ministers. In 1869 Riehl's Wanderbuch speaks of the contribution made to Crefeld's (q.v.) prosperity by the Mennonites and other Separatists, and describes the monument erected in Crefeld to Cornelius de Greiff (1781-1863), one of Crefeld's great philanthropists.

In 1875 Riehl published in the volume Am Feierabend the Novelle Mein Recht (q.v.), which deals sympathetically with the Mennonite position of non-vengeance. The hero, Henneke Gülzow, has set his heart on obtaining justice for his brother who met his death in a scuffle. When at the end it is apparent that he has been in error in seeking vengeance, even though his motive was the preservation of order in the world, he loses his mind and dies. The psychological conflict is excellently portrayed. The book deserves wider reading than it enjoys at present.

Through all these works Riehl's attempt to be fair to the Mennonites is obvious. An occasional error in historical fact or in interpretation may be pardoned. (See Literature.) E.C., E.H.B.

Rieme Douwedochter, of Jelsum, Dutch province of Friesland, was arrested on April 7, 1535, during the recapture of the Oldeklooster (q.v.) near Bolsward, which had been taken by revolutionary Anabaptists. Riemer (Rinner), Hans, a tailor of Altenbergen, Gotha district of Thuringia (q.v.), Germany, was arrested as an Anabaptist in Reinhardsbrunn (q.v.) in 1530, but recanted and was released. Nevertheless in 1532 he allowed himself to be baptized by Jakob Schmiedeknecht in a barn. In 1533 he was arrested and on July 7 cross-examined by Friedrich Myconius (q.v.) at Gotha (q.v.). Concerning baptism and communion his answers followed the Anabaptist concepts. But in his attack on the Lutherans he accused Luther of having dethroned the pope and seated himself on the throne. When he was thereupon, upon command of Electoral Prince John Frederick (q.v.) of Saxony, sentenced to death as an Anabaptist and Sacramentist (q.v.) in accord with the mandate of Speyer of 1529, he recanted again. Rienks, a Mennonite family in the Dutch province of Friesland, where there are still many Mennonite members of this family. Originally (mentioned as early as 1618) they lived in or near Hallum (q.v.) and soon after also at Holwerd, Oudebildtzijl, St. Anna-Parochie, and other villages in Friesland. At first they were all farmers, and many have served the church as deacons.

An outstanding member of this family was Sieds Johannes Rienks (1770-1847), who lived near Ferwerd in Friesland until c1820 and later at Berlikum. He was a farmer and also a maker of telescopes, and built a famous telescope for the astronomical observatory at Leiden about 1830. In 1825 he constructed lightning rods, then a novelty. In 1828 he moved with his family to Leiden, and there manufactured instruments.

An Yde Rienks, of Hyum near Hallum, was a (lay) preacher in the United Flemish-Waterlander congregation at Sneek (q.v.) in 1726-45. In 1746, after confessing his agreement with the Old Flemish confession, he was ordained as preacher of the small Groningen Old Flemish congregation at Sneek, serving until Sept. 11, 1763. He died at Sneek on Oct. 7, 1763. Yde Rienks probably did not belong to the same family as Sieds Johannes Rienks. vdZ.

Ries, Hans de (also de Rys, de Reis, de Rycke, le Riche, which may have been his official name), b. Dec. 13, 1553, at Antwerp, Belgium, d. Sept. 14, 1638, at Alkmaar, Holland, was an important leader of the Dutch Mennonites. Originally, when he found himself at variance with Roman Catholic doctrine, he united with the Reformed church of his native city; but he did not feel at ease among them either, because they carried arms when they went to their religious meetings, and possibly also because of their strictly dogmatic spirit. He was drawn to the Anabaptists, but hesitated to join the congregation at Antwerp, which was rather conservative. Then he became acquainted with the somewhat more liberal spirit of the Waterlander (q.v.) branch in Holland and journeyed to De Rijp (q.v.) in North Holland, where he was baptized upon confession of his faith by Simon Michiels (q.v.) in 1575 or 1576. Soon he returned to Antwerp, and on Jan. 4, 1577, he stood beside the stake at which his friend Hans Bret (q.v.) suffered martyrdom for his faith. He married the mother of his friend, and probably soon afterward left the insecurity of Antwerp. His employer—de Ries was a bookkeeper and is therefore also known as Hans Cassier—rode after them on horseback, and the noble-minded Catholic gave them a purse of money: "Take this and use it in your need." In September 1577 de Ries was in Alkmaar, where he with other Waterlander preachers drew up a confession of faith of 25 articles, the first known Dutch Mennonite confession (printed in Doopsgezinde Bijdragen 1904, 145-56). Later he did much traveling. He is thought to have spent some time in Aachen (a.v.), Germany, and in April 1578 he was in Middelburg, the capital of the province of Zeeland, where he was imprisoned, but released after a month on condition that he leave the area of the city within 24 hours. Then he went to Emden (q.v.), where he had his headquarters until about 1600. In 1600 or a little earlier he was back in Alkmaar as leader of the Waterlander congregation, a position he held until his death.

The influence of Hans de Ries was profound on the Mennonites of the Netherlands, especially the Waterlander branch. He was a friend of Dirk Volkertsz Coornhert (q.v.), whom Kühler calls the "Sebastian Franck of Holland," and like Coornhert he thought little of the external (visible) church. He was a Spiritualist (q.v.), i.e., he believed that the believer must be completely open to the Spirit of God. Church constitutions, regulations, offices, sacraments, ban, and the church itself are of minor importance. Apparently, under the influence of Coornhert, de Ries even laid aside his preaching office in 1578, but it was only for a short time, for soon he was actively on duty again. Later on he also grew more conservative, although throughout his life he did not rate the organization and authority of the church and its elders as highly as most of the Frisians and Flemish did at that time. In the Waterlander congregations the ban was little applied, avoidance not at all, and marriage with non-members was not considered serious.

In many areas de Ries was an outstanding leader. With great joy he watched the merger take place between the High Germans and the Frisians in 1591 on the basis of the Concept of Cologne (q.v.). Throughout his life he worked for the unification of all Mennonites; he wanted to "heal the breach." Unfortunately he saw very little visible result. But the beginning seemed promising. After the union between the High Germans and the Frisians effort was made to bring the Waterlanders into this merger, and de Ries strove untiringly for this goal. Gradually many of the Waterlander congregations joined the union, and in 1601 the Bevredigde Broederschap (q.v.), i.e., the brotherhood that had made peace, was accomplished, and more and more Waterlander congregations joined. But about 1610 it became clear that this union was after all somewhat artificial, because the views of the Frisians and the High Germans, especially regarding the ban and outside marriage, were not those of the Waterlanders; therefore a large part of the Frisians and High Germans withdrew as Afgedeeelden from the Bevredigde Broederschap in 1613. This must have been a bitter experience for de Ries.

The loss was balanced by a gain; in 1615 in Amsterdam a group of English Brownists (q.v.) united with the Mennonites (see Smyth, John). For this union de Ries, in co-operation with Lubbert Gerritsz (q.v.), a Frisian elder who had joined the Waterlanders via the Bevredigde Broederschap and was at the time a leader of the Amsterdam Waterlander congregation, drew up a confession of faith of 38 articles, which was later, with two additional articles, printed and is known as the Confession of Hans de Ries.

Of great importance is de Ries's work in martyr literature. The old first martyr book, Het Offer des Heeren, had contained reports on only a few of the martyrs. When the need of a new edition became apparent, de Ries decided to issue an entirely new and more complete edition. For years he had been collecting reports and records on the martyrs and had stimulated others to do the same, e.g., Jacques Outerman (q.v.) among the Flemish. On the basis of this preliminary work he published in 1615 his Historie der Martelaren ofte waerachtighe Getuygen Jesu Christi, with an important introduction in which he urged love and peace and asked that the Mennonites bury their dissensions. Unfortunately this admonition was little heeded. The new martyr book, however, was very welcome; after it had been reprinted with slight alterations in 1617, 1626, and 1631, T. J. van Braght used it as the basis for his Martyrs' Mirror in 1660 and 1685.

De Ries also gave the church a hymnal, published first in 1582 with the title Lietboeck (q.v.), and in six later editions under different names, e.g., Lie(d)tboeck, Het Boeck der Ghesangen, and Gesangboeck. In 1624 the book appeared in a completely revised edition. In this edition the rhymed version of the Psalms by Dathenus (q.v.) was added. De Ries's high evaluation of the Old Testament Psalms was probably due to his temporary sympathy with the Reformed Church; it was in turn due to his influence that the Psalms gradually replaced the Liedekens in the assemblies of the Dutch Mennonites. His authority is also seen in the Waterlander custom of partaking of communion while seated around a table (Avondmaal bij aanzitting), whereas in other branches the emblems were taken by the ministers to the members, who remained seated (Avondmaal bij Rondgang).

De Ries was one of the first Mennonites to replace silent prayer with audible prayer by the minister (stemmelijk gebed). He apparently also introduced the practice of admitting members of the Reformed Church without (re)baptism; for this he was severely criticized by the conservative branches like the Frisians and the Flemish. About the end of the 17th century this became the practice of the Lamists (q.v.), and is now the general practice among the Dutch Mennonites. Thus Hans de Ries was in many regards an innovator who steered the brotherhood into new paths.

The library and the archives of the Mennonite church in Amsterdam contain a number of documents in de Ries's own handwriting, as well as many letters written by and to him. In addition to his Lietboeck and the confession, published in 1610, 1614, 1618, 1624, 1634, 1640, 1643, 1654, 1658, 1681, 1686, 1700, 1716, 1740, 1741, all in Dutch, a French edition (n.p., 1684), a Latin (Amsterdam, 1723), and a German (Amsterdam, 1741), the following books by de Ries are still extant (other tracts may have been lost): Cort ende claer bewijs, dat de twaelf Jongheren, daer d'Euangelist Lucas van meldet, Act. 19, vers 1. twee maal met water ghedoopt zijn (Amsterdam, 1597), and Ontdeckinghe der dwalingen, misduydinghen der H. Schrift ende verscheyden mis-slagen, begrepen in seecker Boek, ghenamt Raech-besem (Hoorn, 1627), directed against Nittert Obbesz (q.v.). After de Ries's death two tracts were published with Kort Verhael van het Leven ende Daden van Hans de Ries; these tracts were Een seer stichtelijck Tractaet, by maniere van een Vaderlijcke onderwijsinghe . . . ghestelt 1581, and 't Fonteyntien, zijnde: een corte onder-richtinge. This volume also contains a letter of 1630 by de Ries: Eenen brief gheschreven aen M.T. His Klaer Bewys van de Eeuwigheydt ende Godheyt Jesu Christi appeared at Haarlem in 1672 and was reprinted at Leeuwarden and at Haarlem in 1688. Marten Schagen mentions the following additional writings by de Ries: Seyndt-brief waer in begrepen is een corte Bekentenisse bevesticht met de H. Schrift, van eenige stukken betreffende de Mensheyt Christi, followed by Bewijs uyt der H. Schrift, dat Maria is van den Sade ofte Geslachte Davids (Amsterdam, 1604).

De Ries was a man of great authority. At times his action seems headstrong and imperious, for which reason some of his opponents called him "Pope Hans." He was a very beloved preacher, and is said to have moved his hearers to tears, especially in his prayers. He was frequently called by other congregations to settle disputes or to arbitrate in matters of discord. In 1608 he was in Haarlem to intermediate between Leenaert Clock (q.v.) and Claes Wolter Kops (q.v.); in 1618 he presided at a conference of elders and preachers at Workum, which met to examine charges made against elder Rippert Eenkes (q.v.); in 1626 he was asked to settle the quarrel between Nittert Obbesz and the leaders of the Waterlander congregation at Amsterdam.

Hans de Ries carried on an extensive correspondence with many congregations and preachers. The Danzig congregation asked him for advice in countering the persistence of the Socinians. In Amsterdam he had to intervene in the dispute with Nittert Obbesz (q.v.). He was engaged in controversy with many opponents both within and without the Mennonite fold. The great number of these polemics, of which only a few were printed, complete the picture of a man who served the kingdom of God faithfully and without regard for consequences. At the age of 84 he allowed himself to be persuaded to undertake a journey by boat to Zaandam to preach a sermon. Once more he served his church at Alkmaar (in early August 1638). Three weeks later he became bedfast; he died on Sept. 14, 1638. Three days later he was buried in the Reformed Church (Groote Kerk) at Alkmaar. The Haarlem preacher Denys van der Schuerer delivered his funeral sermon. He married three times. His first wife, the mother of Hans Bret, apparently died soon after they fled from Antwerp; concerning his second wife nothing is known, not even her name; his third wife was Guertje Jansdochter, whom he married in Alkmaar, and who died on July 3, 1638, a few months before his death. His portrait was painted by Michiel Mierevelt. vdZ.

Riesen, van (von), a Mennonite family found in a number of West Prussian churches (Danzig, Ladekopp, Tiegenhagen, Heubuden, Elbing) from the early 17th century. David von Riesen (q.v.) was a Mennonite preacher. (See also Peter von Riesen.) Cornelius von Riesen (b. 1754) who in 1789 moved from Damfeld in the area of Marienburg, Prussia, to Neuendorf, Russia, was from 1794 a preacher of the Frisian Mennonite Old Colony (Chortitza) congregation.

Cornelius Jansen (q.v.) married Helena von Riesen, the daughter of Peter von Riesen (q.v.), who printed Menno's writings. David Goerz (q.v.) also married a Helene Riesen. Some of the Riesen who joined the Kleine Gemeinde changed their name to Friesen. Many of them settled in Jansen (q.v.), Neb., and Manitoba. Some of the Riesen established the Brudertal Mennonite Church (q.v.) near Hillsboro, Kans., and others settled in Beatrice, Neb. Riesen, David von, a member of the Mennonite congregation of Elbing-Ellerwald (q.v.), West Prussia, Germany, was expelled from membership for serving in the army in the War of Liberation in 1815, and sought to be reinstated into this congregation or into the Danzig (q.v.) congregation by way of the courts, but after lengthy negotiations his suit was rejected by the royal court in Berlin on Jan. 24, 1818. Riesen's fate was the basis of Wildenbruch's drama Der Mennonit (q.v.). NEFF.

Riesen, Peter von, a Mennonite of Schidlitz, near Danzig, (then) Germany, who had close connections with the Kleine Gemeinde (q.v.) in Russia. He was the father-in-law of Cornelius Jansen (q.v.). His name is associated with a revision of the German translation of Menno Simons' (q.v.) Foundation Book (q.v.) and its printing in 1834 in an edition of several thousand copies. His associates in this undertaking were his brother Abraham von Riesen and perhaps another brother Klaas von Riesen, Abraham and Klaas being ministers in Russia. The brothers Abraham and Klaas appear later with the name Friesen (=von Riesen?). Gustav E. Reimer, however, is of the opinion that Klaas was Klaas Reimer (q.v.), the founder of the Kleine Gemeinde and the brother-in-law of Peter von Riesen.

J. W. Mannhardt (q.v.) gives the following account of the "strange" story of this publication: Right after publication the book fell into the hands of a non-Mennonite who was offended by several arguments used by Menno in defending himself against Lutheran and Reformed theologians. Fearing further offense, the church board compelled the publishers to hide the entire edition in a church in the swamps of the lowlands. Twenty years later, when the von Riesen heirs demanded it as their property, a committee went to Königsberg to ask timidly whether the release of such books was permissible. The leader of the opposition was apparently Peter Regier (q.v.), the elder of the Tiegenhagen congregation 1833-56, whose father, Abraham Regier (q.v.), elder of Heubuden 1804-51, stopped the sale in Russia. But also David Epp, a leader in the revival movement, in his correspondence attacked the publication and offered to send several hundred tracts to convert the Kleine Gemeinde. On the other side Abraham Friesen protested that the foundation of the first nonresistant Christians was thereby rejected (see the Martyrs' Mirror). Wilhelm Mannhardt was right in assuming that the fear of the loss of their privileges played a role here. But a declaration of the 29 ministers on Aug. 10, 1835, bases the withdrawal of the books on love for members of other faiths. Later the elders permitted the exportation of some copies to Russia, whence they have found their way to America. Copies are in GCL and BeCL. E.C.

Rietmaker (Rietmacher), Abraham, was a preacher of the Mennonite congregation of Aachen (q.v.), Germany, in the early 17th century. The Amsterdam Mennonite Archives contain five letters written by Rietmaker to the Waterlander leader Hans de Ries (q.v.), in which he informed de Ries on the situation of the congregations in the Rheinland, the progress of the unions between the High German Mennonites, the (Young) Frisians and the Waterlanders, the troubles in this united group at Haarlem, where Leenaerdt Clock (q.v.) and Claes Wolters Kops (q.v.) were in discord, and the relation between the Mennonites and the Socinians (q.v.) in Danzig. The first of these letters is dated Dec. 29, 1613, the last Oct. 7, 1614.

Rietmaker was a defender of a plain Christianity; about 1620 he censured Claes Wolters Kops, who was then living at Gladbach (q.v.), for his wealth and his luxurious estate.

Particulars about the life of Rietmaker are not available. It is not very likely that he is identical with Abraham Dirks (Bierens, q.v.), an elder of the Flemish congregation at Amsterdam from 1617, who is also called Abraham Rietmaker, and who was also a rietmaker (maker of baskets or of cane chairs). vpZ.

Rieu, Adriaen du, an Anabaptist martyr: see Adriaen Olieu(x).

Rieuwertsz (Rieuwers), Jan (1617-c85), was a publisher at Amsterdam, and from 1675 the official printer of this city. He published a large number of books by Mennonite authors, including Schabaelje, Galenus Abrahamsz, Reynier Wijbrandsz, Tieleman Jansz van Braght (several editions of Schole der Deught), Abraham Verduin, and many Galenist (q.v.) pamphlets during the "Lammerenkrijgh" (q.v.). Rieuwertsz also printed books by D. R. Camphuyzen and the philosopher Descartes.

Rieuwertsz was a member of the Flemish (Lamist) Mennonite congregation of Amsterdam and a warm adherent of Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.), whom he supported in the conflict with the conservatives. Rieuwertsz' well-known bookshop, "Het Martelaarsboek," was located on Dirk-van-Hasseltsteeg and later on Beursstraat. This shop was the meeting place of the Collegiants and other "enlightened spirits." In 1646 the Collegiant meetings in this bookshop were prohibited by the magistrates of Amsterdam.

Rieuwertsz played an influential part in the Amsterdam Mennonite life of the 17th century, as well as in Protestant liberalism in general. His friendship with the Jewish philosopher Spinoza was severely censured by the more conservative Mennonites.

Barend Rieuwersz was a deacon of the (Groningen) Old Flemish Mennonite congregation at Amsterdam about 1625. No relationship has been ascertained between this Barend Rieuwersz and Jan Rieuwertsz. vbZ.

Rijcen (Rijken, dé Rijcke, Rycaen), Christiaen, an Anabaptist martyr; see Christiaen de Rijcke.

Rijkmans (formerly Ryckmans), a Dutch Mennonite family at Zuidveen (q.v.), province of Overijssel, where Matthys Ryckmans was a member of the Mennonite congregation as early as 1600. The Rijkmans family in the 18th century was less conservative than most members of the Zuidveen congregation; this caused some friction. In 1768 Berend Thijssen Rijkmans was banned from the congregation because he opposed the decision of the elder and the deacons to rebaptize his wife, who had come from the Borne (q.v.) Mennonite congregation. Rijkman Roelofs (q.v.) belonged to this family. The Rijkmans family has played an important part in the Zuidveen congregation, which since 1848 has been called Steenwijk (q.v.), and in which many of its members served as deacons. (DB 1878, 6 f., 16, 26, 28; Steenwijk church records.) vbZ.

Rijnsburg, a village a few miles west of Leiden, Dutch province of South Holland, was the center of the Collegiant (q.v.) movement; its adherents were therefore also called "Rijnsburger Collegianten" or Rijnsburgers. They met here twice a year, at Pentecost and in August. The meeting place, called Groote Huis, was a country estate. Here they held their communion services and performed baptism by immersion. The first of these "great meetings," attended by Collegiants from everywhere, was held about 1640 and the last one in 1787; thereafter only occasional baptismal services were held at Rijnsburg, the last one in 1801. The Groote Huis and other properties were sold in 1828.

Besides members of other churches, many Mennonites joined the group at Rijnsburg. Some of the many Mennonites baptized here were Willem van Maurik of Amsterdam in 1730, Hendrik Kockebakker of Wormerveer in 1737, Daniel Hovens of Haarlem in 1735, Aagje Deken (q.v.) of Amsterdam in 1760, Maria Bavink of Amsterdam in 1762, Pieter Vijgh of Rotterdam in 1775, and Pieter Zeper of Leeuwarden in 1781. Mennonites, both ministers and laymen, often addressed the Rijnsburg meetings and conducted the communion and baptismal services. Among these there are familiar names, such as Koenraad van Diepenbroek (q.v.) of Haarlem, Agge Roskam Kool (q.v.) of Beverwijk, Pieter Klaasz de Jong (q.v.) of Krommenie, Joost Daams and Daniel Hovens (q.v.) of Haarlem.

The conservative Mennonites, e.g., the Zonists (q.v.) and many Waterlanders (q.v.), were opposed to the progressive Collegiant ideas and in many congregations the members who attended the Rijnsburg meetings were excluded from the communion service in their home churches. In 1673 a number of Waterlander congregations in North Holland decided not to admit to the pulpit any ministers who were leaders and speakers at Rijnsburg.

It was at Rijnsburg that Richard Blount (q.v.), one of the founders of the Baptist Church in England, was baptized by immersion. vbZ.

Rijp, De, a village in the Dutch province of North Holland (1947 pop. 1490, with 86 Mennonites). In the 16th century, before reclamation of the lakes, it was situated on an island, and so offered good protection to the persecuted Mennonites. There were Anabaptists here at a very early date; Arent Jacobs (q.v.) of this town was drowned with his wife and son at Monnikendam (q.v.) about 1539 because they had been rebaptized. A congregation soon formed, and by the end of the 16th century the village was practically all Mennonite.

The De Rijp congregation belonged to the Waterlander (q.v.) branch, although in the 17th century a more conservative tendency was noticeable here than was usual among the Waterlanders; for this reason it joined the Zonist Sociëteit (q.v.) in 1664. In the 16th century it was the most outstanding Waterlander congregation in the Netherlands. In 1576 Hans de Ries (q.v.) was baptized here. De Rijp was one of the first congregations to join (1601) the union of the High German and Young Frisian Mennonites (see Bevredigde Broederschap). The congregation had excellent preachers, such as Jacob Jansz Scheedemaker (q.v.) from 1557, the principal author of the Waterlander confession of faith of 1577; Pieter Pieters de Oude (q.v.) 1600-25; Jan Willemsz (q.v.) 1610-d.60, who was also a physician, and Engel Arentsz van Dooregeest (q.v.) 1666-d.1706. In the 17th and early 18th centuries some of the Mennonites of De Rijp took active part in the Collegiant movement (q.v.), often attending the meetings at the Collegiant center at Rijnsburg, which was severely censured by the rather conservative leaders of the congregation.

The relations with the Reformed Church and the magistrates of De Rijp were better than in most Dutch towns. As early as 1574 a Mennonite preacher is reported to have preached in the Reformed Church; in the 17th century Mennonites occupied magisterial offices and were often very influential.

In the 18th century this prosperous congregation suffered a rapid decline, principally for economic reasons. The herring and whale fishing industries and their subsidiary industries such as shipbuilding, in which many Mennonites were engaged, grew less and less important. A large number of the De Rijp Mennonites moved to Amsterdam. The membership, which was still 472 in 1670, decreased from that time on. There were 403 members in 1704, 167 about 1800, some 200 in 1809, 160 in 1847, 184 in 1900, and 68 in 1958.

The first meetinghouse burned down in 1654; the replacement was considerably renovated in 1853. The present church was dedicated on Dec. 13, 1953. The congregation once possessed an orphans' home, mentioned first in 1676. The institution was completely rebuilt in 1866; but since 1912 there have been no orphans. In the 17th and 18th centuries the congregation had great wealth; most of the property has been lost since then.

One of the outstanding lay members of this congregation was Jan Adriaensz Leeghwater (q.v.) (1575-1650), the noted mill builder and "engineer," to whom North Holland owes the initiative for the reclamation of the many lakes, and partly also the execution of this task.

A complete list of preachers and deacons from 1557 to the present has been preserved. The first minister of De Rijp who was trained at the Mennonite Seminary at Amsterdam was Anthony de Vries, 1770-71; he was followed by two lay preachers, Johannes van Grouw 1771-79 and Pieter Hartman 1780-1815. Since that time all the ministers have been educated at the Amsterdam Seminary: Pieter Hollenberg 1805-15, Jan Persijn 1816-60, Jan de Verwer 1855-71, S. Kutsch Loyenga 1872-73, W. J. van Douwen 1874-87, W. I. Leendertz 1888-90, J. S. Pekema 1891-94, P. Sijbolts 1894-1901, J. P. Smids 1902-8, G. Fopma 1908-13, J. Scherpenhuysen 1914-23, P. Keuning 1925-52, and L. Koopmans 1954-57. The pulpit is now vacant.

Since July 1949 the pastor of the De Rijp congregation also serves the Grafdijk (q.v.) and Noord-eind van Graft (q.v.) congregation. Church activities include a ladies' circle and a Sunday school for children (in co-operation with the Reformed Church). De Rijp has been the seat of the Rijper Sociëteit (q.v.) since the middle of the 17th century. A well-known Dutch hymnal was the Rijper Liedt Boecxken (q.v.).

Rijp, van de, a Dutch Mennonite family, in the 17th and 18th centuries found at Amsterdam and Haarlem. In Amsterdam they were members of the Waterlander (Toren) congregation and after the merger of this congregation with the Lamist church (1668), of the United Lam and Toren congregation. At Haarlem Johannes van de Rijp was a trustee of the Mennonite orphanage on the Klein Heiligland from 1673, as was his wife Judith ten Cate from 1699. In Amsterdam Arend van de Rijp (d. 1729) was for many years a trustee of the Collegiant Oranjeappel (q.v.) orphanage.

Gerrit van de Rijp (d. March 1735) bequeathed his property to his nephews Jan and Job van de Rijp Centen (the sons of his sister Maria van de Rijp and Gozewijn Centen) on condition that they contribute 20,000 guilders of this property to the founding of an old ladies' home. In 1736 his heirs bought some small houses on the Rozengracht, which were remodeled for this purpose and were called the Rijpenhofje. On Dec. 14, 1747, Jan and Job van de Rijp Centen transferred the title to this home to the deacons of the Lam and Toren Mennonite congregation, who still govern the Rijpenhofje. The home was completely rebuilt in 1913. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 521-32, 3188, 3190.)

Rijper Achterhofken, Het, an appendix to the Dutch hymnbook Rijper Liedt Boecxken (q.v.). vdZ.

Rijper (Ryper) Liedt Boecxken (also called Rijper Gesangboek), a formerly much-used Dutch Mennonite hymnal, the first editions of which were printed at De Rijp (q.v.), whence it took its name. It contains 450 hymns without notes, divided into three parts: (a) Schriftuurlijke liedekens, (b) Geestelijke liedekens (Spiritual Hymns), and (c) an appendix, called Achterhofken (Back Garden). Copies of six editions are still extant and are found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library (except the first, which is found only in the Goshen College Library): Wormerveer 1647, Alkmaar 1664 (also in GCL), Saerdam (Zaandam) 1669, 1682, and 1693, and Amsterdam 1716. (This last edition also contained Geestelyck Kruidt-Hofken.) But there were without doubt other editions. The preface of this hymnal is dated Aug. 25, 1624; hence there must have been an edition of 1624 or 1625 at De Rijp. Marten Schagen and Blaupot ten Cate mention also editions at De Rijp 1647 and Krommenie 1647. The poet H. A. Hoewilt (q.v.) of De Rijp was the author of many of the hymns. The Rijper Liedt Boecxken was particularly used in Waterlander congregations.

Rijper Sociëteit is the name of a conference of Waterlander (q.v.) Mennonite congregations in the Dutch province of North Holland (q.v.), established about 1640. The fixed place of meeting has always been De Rijp; hence its name. In 1841 the Frisian Sociëteit of North Holland united with the Rijper. It differs from the usual pattern in that its annual conferences are attended by the deacons rather than the ministers, for the reason that its purpose is the financial support of needy congregations. From 1693 to 1798 this conference also called a meeting at which the ministers were present, its purpose being to provide for vacant pulpits. vbZ.

Rijper Zeepostil, Den, is the title of a Dutch book published at Amsterdam in 1699; it was composed by the Mennonite ministers E. A. van Dooregeest (q.v.) and C. A. Posjager (q.v.), and was designed to be taken along by the Dutch seamen and whalers, who were numerous at De Rijp (q.v.) and who often had to leave their home town for months. It contains 22 sermons, 16 prayers, and a history of Holland, especially of North Holland and De Rijp. The Zeepostil was used during the services held on the boats on Sunday mornings and on special occasions. vbZ.

Rijsdijk (Rysdyk), Jacobus, b. c1690 in Norden, East Friesland, Germany, a Dutch Mennonite preacher, serving in Almelo 1716-23, Zwolle 1723-28, Groningen 1728-42, and again Almelo 1742-44, where he died in November 1744. He was an educated preacher of the United Waterlander and Flemish congregation, a defender of the Zonist (q.v.) principles, opposing rationalism and Socinianism (q.v.), with a leaning toward the Reformed Church, which his son is said to have joined. He distinguished between "true Mennonites" like himself, and "the so-called Doopsgezinden (q.v.), who hid behind the name Mennonite," and fought the latter, including his colleague Jan Commes in Zwolle and his uncle and colleague Eppo Botterman (q.v.), over his activity in the Collegiant (q.v.) movement in Groningen, where the congregation vainly tried to mediate in 1730-31, and finally also Johannes Stinstra (q.v.), a preacher in Harlingen.

Jacobus Rijsdijk wrote both polemical and doctrinal works. Of his polemic writings the following should be mentioned: Verdediging van de Regtzinnigheid der Ware Mennoniten (Groningen, 1729); Ongeveinsd en Zedig Antwoordt over de beschuldiging hem aengedaen door Jan Commes (Groningen, 1730), which was a reply to the attack on Rijsdijk by Commes titled Den Veynzaart onmaskert (Zwolle, 1729); and Zedige Aanmerkingen (Groningen, 1735) against Botterman. The following doctrinal works should be mentioned: Eerste Beginzelen van de Lere des Geloofs (Groningen, 1733; 2d ed. 1740; 5th ed. Amsterdam, 1784); Korte Schets van de Lere der Waarheid (Groningen, 1733, 1747, 1756, 1764); De Waarheid van Jesus Messiaschap (2 vv., Groningen, 1735, reprinted 1745, 1749); Eerste Waarheidsmelk (Groningen, 1742); Godgeleerde Aanmerkingen (2 vv., Groningen, 1742-44). Besides these he published his farewell sermon at Zwolle and first sermon at Groningen: Afscheidts en Intre-predikaatzen, zo van de Gemeente te Zwolle als in die van Groningen (Groningen, 1729).

As late as Dec. 23, 1789, a plan for contracts for future ministers drawn up at Emden (q.v.), Germany, stipulated that they should build the church and instruct the youth "in accord with the confession of faith of the Zonist Sociëteit as published and taught by Hans de Ries (q.v.), Pieter Arends, Herman Schijn (q.v.), and Jacobus Rijsdijk. The books written by Schijn and Rijsdijk were regularly used in the brotherhood; their spirit should prevail in any other books to be introduced." E.C., vbZ.

Rijswijk, Govert Jan van, b. 1764 at The Hague, d. 1838 at Amsterdam, was an outstanding Dutch Mennonite preacher. He did not have a specifically theological training. He was at first the manager of a type foundry (1784-1800), and during this time he frequently addressed the meetings of the Rijsburg Collegiants (q.v.). In 1797 he took part in an essay contest on "Indifference and Carelessness in Attendance at Religious Meetings," and won an honorable distinction. He therefore decided to devote his life to the ministry. In 1800 he became the preacher of the Hengelo congregation and served until 1806, followed by service at Monnikendam 1806-8, Joure 1808-17, and Den Hoorn on Texel 1817-24. In 1824 he had to resign because of approaching blindness; he soon lost his vision completely. He spent his last years in Leiden.

Van Rijswijk published a number of theological and devotional books: Proeve van Onderzoek over de oogmerken van het Lijden en Sterven van Jezus Christus (Amsterdam, 1792); Schets der christelijke Leere . . . (Amsterdam, 1809, 2d ed. 1816, 3d ed. 1842); Lijkrede op Jezus (Amsterdam, 1813); Het Hoofdzakelijke der Christelijke Leere . . . (Amsterdam, 1814, 2d ed. 1825); Leerredenen en Kerkelijke Redevoeringen (2 vv., Amsterdam, 1816 and 1825); Vragen betreffende de kennis en het goed verstand der heilige Schriften . . . (Amsterdam, 1826).

Van Rijswijk owned a good collection of Mennonite works, including some rare ones. He gave them to the Library of the Amsterdam Mennonite Church. vbZ.

Ring, a Dutch word meaning a regional association of ten or twelve neighboring Mennonite congregations for the purpose of assisting one another, especially in the case of pulpit vacancy. The objective of the general organization was to avoid the extinction of congregations, which was a common occurrence in the 18th century. The first Ring, viz., Ring Akkrum, was founded in 1837 upon the initiative of Steven Blaupot ten Cate (q.v.), who was the minister in Akkrum 1830-39. Soon two more Rings were founded for Friesland, viz., Ring Bolsward (q.v.) in 1840 and Ring Dantumawoude (q.v.) in 1850. In 1844 Ring North Holland (q.v.) followed their example; in 1884 (?) Ring South Holland and Zeeland was established. Other similar regional associations were Ring Zwolle (q.v.) for the northwest, and Ring Twente (q.v.) for the southeast of the province of Overijssel. The province of Groningen has no Ring; the functions of the Ring in this province are performed by the Groningen Conference (Sociëteit van Doopsgezinde Gemeenten in Groningen). After World War II Ring Utrecht and 't Gooi (q.v.) and Ring Arnhem (q.v.) were reorganized. There are at present ten Rings in the Netherlands. vdZ.

Ring(h) (Ryngh), Yeme (Jeme, Ieme, Ime) Jacobsz de, a Dutch Mennonite preacher, b. Nov. 17, 1574, at Harlingen, Dutch province of Friesland, d. there April 10, 1627, served the Waterlander congregation in his home town until his death. As an elder he was very active, especially in the province of Friesland, visiting the congregations regularly, baptizing and administering communion; in 1613-18 he intervened in Workum (q.v.), where complaints had arisen against elder Rippert Eenkes. At first he took a rather strict position in church discipline, disagreeing with Hans de Ries (q.v.), the leader of the Waterlanders in North Holland; but in the course of time his views became more lenient. On Sept. 7, 1626, with five colleagues, he signed the thirteen articles of faith intended to mediate the dispute between the preachers Reinier Wybrandsz (q.v.), Pieter Andriesz Hesseling (q.v.), Cornelis Claesz Anso (q.v.) on the one side, and Nittert Obbesz (q.v.) on the other. When he died a sentimental poem appeared: "Lament of the Oppressed Spirits Concerning the Death of the Virtuous, Blessed, and Eloquent Yeme Jacobsz de Ring," which is a living testimony to his esteem in the brotherhood. Three writings of de Ring's have been preserved; they are Predicatie over Proverb: 30 vers 24-28, in Kort Verhael van het Leven van Hans de Ries (De Rijp, 1644); an excellent funeral sermon, Lijkpredicatie, on II Sam. 3:38 in memory of Anthoni Jacobsz (q.v.) Roscius (Hoorn, 1624); and Tractaet teghen het Straffen der Buyten-Getrouden zonder Ondscheyt (Jan. 1, 1627). This "Tract" attacks a High German (q.v.) preacher, probably Leenaert Clock (q.v.), who took a stricter position in applying the ban to persons guilty of marriage with outsiders. Formerly the "Tract," which was signed with the pseudonym Ben Israëls, was ascribed to Anthoni Jacobsz Roscius; but Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis III, 154 f., proves that the author was de Ringh. Yeme de Ringh had his portrait painted by Lambert Jacobsz (q.v.).

A Jacob de Ring(h) was a preacher of the Young Frisian Mennonites at Harlingen in 1590. He was probably Jeme de Ring's father. Auke de Ring, of Zaandam (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 1779-84), was a Mennonite preacher at Gouda, Dutch province of South Holland in 1728-33, and died there on Feb. 6, 1733. NEFF, vdZ.

Ringmacher, Peter, leader of the Anabaptist congregation of Augsburg (q.v.), chosen to the office with Hans Schleifer (q.v.) on April 4, 1528. They were sent to Regensburg (q.v.) to comfort the brethren there. (ML I, 95; III, 514.) NEFF.

Rink (Rinck, Ring, Ringk, Grink), Melchior (1494-after 1545), an Anabaptist martyr of Hesse, Germany, the outstanding leader of the Anabaptists in Hesse. He was educated at the universities of Leipzig and Erfurt, some of his professors being humanists. His nickname "the Greek" is probably an allusion to a good mastery of Greek. He was said to have participated in the fanatical disturbances of the Zwickau (q.v.) prophets in Wittenberg as early as 1520 or 1521 (Ottius, 7); but this is probably an erroneous assumption. The first certain information about him after this time says that he was a schoolmaster (chaplain) in Hersfeld (q.v.; not in the village, but in the city and the Stift) in 1523. Here he became the good friend of the pastor Heinrich Fuchs, and worked enthusiastically with him to promote Luther's ideas. The Stift authorities, however, induced the abbot to dismiss him; when this happened in December 1523 some disturbances occurred. The landgrave then had Rink and Fuchs arrested, but they were released; they were then permanently expelled from Hersfeld and Hesse.

The two friends now turned to Thuringia (q.v.) where Rink secured a pastorate in Oberhausen near Eisenach and later in Eckardtshausen. He married Anna, the daughter of Hans Eckard. He soon fell under the influence of Müntzer and (according to a report by Eberhard von der Tann) took an active part in the Peasants' War, especially in the battle at Frankenhausen. Fuchs lost his life, but Melchior Rink tried to continue Müntzer's (q.v.) work by means of strong polemics against Luther's doctrine of justification, the proper fruits of which he thought he missed everywhere. Henceforth he was homeless and led the life of a wanderer. In the spring of 1527 he is thought to have met Hans Denk (q.v.), Ludwig Haetzer (q.v.), and Jakob Kautz (q.v.) in Worms and with them signed the seven articles for the disputation with the Lutheran clergy. In 1528 he stayed most of the time around Hersfeld on the Thuringian border, preaching Anabaptist doctrine. There is no sign of seditious intentions on his part. His principal concern was the refutation of infant baptism and the gathering of quiet Christians, tried and tested in life and in suffering, who would enter upon the discipleship of Jesus. He attacked infant baptism because "original sin does not condemn before the person reaches the years of reason and wills to sin." He asserted that a man must first be taught of God before he is baptized, for faith comes by hearing; but without faith baptism is nothing; the child is not a Christian and must first be taught the Word like adults. From this faith issues, and afterwards baptism; for with the heart one believes and by confession one secures salvation. He rejected the bodily presence of Christ in the Lord's Supper, but did not venture into speculation or dispute on this point.

Rink found a considerable following, and therefore ventured to ask permission to preach openly in Hersfeld. His request reached Philip of Hesse (q.v.), who summoned him to a personal conversation in his hunting lodge Friedewald and gave him a choice between recanting and presenting his teachings to the theologians of the faculty of the University of Marburg. Rink chose the latter, and thus a disputation was held at Marburg (q.v.) on Feb. 17 and 18, 1528, the rector of the university acting as chairman. The debate was led principally by Balthasar Raid (q.v.), a Hersfeld clergyman. Raid sent an exact report of the course of the debate to Philip (given verbatim in Thüringen, 294-302). Melchior Rink was required to present his doctrines in five points in written form. The first three concerned the creation of man and his fall and need of redemption. On these there was no difference of opinion. The difference of opinion arose when the question of baptism was opened. Since no agreement could be reached on this subject, the last point, concerning communion, was not touched at all.

As a penalty for his obstinacy Rink was sentenced to imprisonment upon the insistence of John the Steadfast (q.v.), Elector of Saxony, and paid this penalty in Haina on the Wohra. But records of this punishment vary. Hochhuth says he was sentenced to public church confession, and Wappler says that he was expelled from the country. But undeterred by all the persecution Rink at once resumed his quiet gathering of converts. The elector, however, had him sharply watched by his bailiff on the Wartburg, Eberhard von der Tann. But he was not apprehended on Saxon soil; if he had been, his life would certainly have been forfeit. When he was seized in Hesse, Saxony tried by all the means at its disposal to influence Philip to institute a formal heresy trial with the obvious intention of having him executed.

Philip did not yield, but punished Rink with a light sentence of imprisonment, and after half a year released him upon the sole condition that he would never again set foot upon the soil of Hesse or Saxony.

During his arrest Rink wrote a letter to the Wartburg bailiff concerning the attempt by his father-in-law Hans Eckard to have Rink's marriage with his daughter annulled; Rink had not seen his wife since the days of the peasant uprising. Rink's reply reveals poignantly his homelessness: "After I have been for so long persecuted by both the Papists and the Lutherans, that is, by the entire abomination of antichrist, not only as a heretic and fanatic, but also as a seditionist, contrary to all reason (as God is my witness and as the facts have abundantly shown my adversaries), from village to village, from town to town, and from country to country, there now comes to light the deceit and unfaithfulness of my supposed wife and her parents, and heaps upon me such grim and untruthful charges that even my judges, if they only would, could well without my answering to them recognize my innocence and clear me of the charges they make." He accused her of unfaithfulness in that "she took me not for love and a free heart, but out of a desire for quiet days and on the compulsion of her parents."

Rink had not long to enjoy his liberty. On Nov. 11, 1531, he was again seized, in Vacha on the Werra, with eleven companions, while he was preaching on Mark 16:16, one of his favorite texts. Again Saxony interfered and in a personal letter the elector insisted that Philip impose the supreme penalty on Rink on the basis of the edict of Speyer of 1529 and the official opinion of 1531 by the theologians of Wittenberg. But in vain. Rink was condemned instead to perpetual imprisonment, having rejected the plea of his friend Georg Witzel, who had just paid a visit to his native town of Vacha, to recant his views on baptism and to stop performing it. He was taken to Bärbach in the district of Katzenelnbogen, and was still there in 1551. In 1540 his chains were eased upon Bucer's (q.v.) intervention after Peter Tesch joined the established church. He probably died in prison, since Peter Tesch had tried in vain to convert him.

All of Rink's writings but three have been lost. One of these is an epistle written conjointly with Antonius Jacobsz, which was actually a broadside (Flugschrift) on infant baptism. It was published by Cramer (BRN V, 642-44). Another writing was the letter to Eberhard von der Tann, written in prison at Haina, published by both Wappler (Kursachsen, 149-52) and Franz (TA Hesse, No. 14a, pp. 33-37). Both are effective evidence of his earnest Christian attitude.

In 1958 a hitherto unknown writing by Rink, Widerlegung einer Schrift, so Johannes Bader . . . Pfarrer zu Landau, neulich than hat, den Kinder-tauff als chrislich zu erhalten (manuscript), was discovered in the Frankfurt University Library (see Gesch.-Bl., 1958, 48 f.).

Rink baptized Hans Peisker (q.v.) on Jan. 26, 1536. Others whom he is known to have baptized were Gilg Scherer (also called vom Berge), of Motzfeld, the leader of the congregation at Sorga, near Hersfeld. Among his most loyal followers were Hans Both (q.v.) and Margaretha, "the old cook" (Garköchin). P.S.

Rinkes, a Mennonite family, formerly living at Joure (q.v.), Dutch province of Friesland. From the early 18th century the members of this family were usually ships' chandlers and grocers. In the early 19th century they adopted Rinkes as their family name. Inne Wouters (Rinkes) was a lay preacher in the Oude Huis congregation of Joure 1780-d. 1814, and some members of this family were deacons of the church, e.g., Jan Innes Rinkes (1849-1935), who was its treasurer and moderator from 1892 to 1931.

Another member of this family was Simke Heeres Rinkes (1829-65), professor of Latin and Greek at Arnhem and state school inspector, who was active in the promotion of better education for Dutch teachers. vdZ.

Rinske Obbedochter was taken prisoner when the soldiers of the governor of Friesland recaptured the Oldeklooster (q.v.) near Bolsward on April 7, 1535, which had been taken by a group of revolutionary Anabaptists a few days before. She was conducted to Leeuwarden, capital of Friesland, and on April 14, 1535, sentenced to be executed by drowning. (K. Vos, Menno Simons, Leiden, 1914, 229.) vdZ.

Rintjes (Rintsius), Hendrik (1630-98), a preacher of the Waterlander congregation in Leeuwarden, Dutch province of Friesland, and a book printer there. He had contacts with important scholars of his time and from 1656 on published a number of collections of verse. His own verse, of which he published several editions, mediocre in quality, includes Gedachten op den Jongsten dag, in versen vertoont (1681, reprinted 1685), De Morgenstond in haer somersche Vermaeklijkheden vertoont (Leeuwarden, 1684), and Ziele-Zucht aan God (Leeuwarden, 1698). Rintjes apparently also wrote a number of hymns found in the Mennonite hymnal Geestelijke Goudschale (q.v.). E.C., vdZ.

Rippert Eenkes, a Dutch Mennonite elder: see Eenkes, Rippert.

Ris, a widely ramified Dutch Mennonite family, many of whose members, usually conservatives, served the church as preachers and deacons. It seems to have had its origin in Hoorn (q.v.), province of North Holland; branches of this family were found as early as 1650 at Westzaan and Krommenie in this province.

The most outstanding member of this family was Cornelis Ris (q.v.; 1717-90), preacher at Hoorn 1747-90 and composer of the Ris confession of faith (1766); his son Jan Ris (b. 1756 at Hoorn, d. 1784 at Hamburg) was a preacher of the Hamburg-Altona congregation in 1777-84, whose baptismal sermon preached at Altona on March 28, 1784, entitled De Christelyke waterdoop, was published at Hamburg in 1784. Cornelis Willemsz Ris was also a lay preacher at Hoorn 1766-85. Deacons at Hoorn were Gerrit Pieters Ris in 1646-69 and Pieter Ris (1742-1808), a brother of the preacher Cornelis Ris and married to Cornelia van Vollenhoven, from 1783 until his death. Pieter Ris, like his brother, ardently defended the old Mennonite principles, in the Waterlander (Rijper) and also in the Frisian conference. A number of his writings entitled Christelijke brieven en overdenkingen, were published after his death (Hoorn, 1812).

In Hoorn the Ris family was engaged in business and trade; they were among the most active owners of whaling boats and were well-to-do. This family has died out there.

At Wormerveer in 1675 Pieter Jans Ris, a member of the Waterlander congregation, together with some other members insisted that the confession of Hans de Ries (q.v.) should be maintained in the congregation, and that no preacher should be admitted to the pulpit who did not agree with the confession.

At Westzaan, Jan Willems Ris was an untrained preacher of the Frisian congregation in the early 18th century. His writings, Israels Blijdschap, Dank-Predikatie over den vrede van Utrecht (Haarlem, n.d.); Redenvoering, geschickt om in een Sterfhuys voorgedraagen te worden (Haarlem, n.d., 1744); and Verzaameling van Boet- en Bedestoffen, of Bedestonds redenvoeringen, uitgesproken in de jaaren 1702 tot 1712 (Haarlem, 1747), were edited by Agge Wynalda, the Mennonite minister of Haarlem.

One of the descendants of Jan Willems Ris was Klaas Ris, b. c1795 at Westzaan, d. 1852 at Joure, who was trained for the ministry at the Amsterdam Lamist seminary and served the congregations of Makkum 1820-23 and Joure 1823-52. He published Naamlijst van allen, die . . . hunne studiën aan de Kweekschool begonnen en voleindigd hebben (Leeuwarden, n.d.-1841).

A. A. Ris was the sexton of the Haarlem Mennonite Church in 1900-29. Klaas Ris Taconis, b. 1844 at Nieuwe Niedorp, d. 1876 at Graft, a son of Pastor Inne Taconis and Aagtje Ris, after studying at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, served at Noordeind van Graft in 1872-76. He retired because of poor health (DB 1876, 129). His farewell sermon, Laatste Toespraak, was published at Joure in 1876. He died soon after. voZ.

Ris, Cornelis, b. 1717 at Hoorn, Dutch province of North Holland, d. there April 18, 1790, a Zonist (q.v.) Mennonite preacher, stemmed from the influential Ris (q.v.) family of Hoorn. On March 12, 1746, Cornelis was installed as one of the ministers of the Hoorn Frisian congregation. In the 17th century Hoorn had an unusual number of Mennonite branches; in 1747 the Frisians (q.v.) and the Waterlanders (q.v.), then the only remaining congregations, merged. Ris served at Hoorn until his death. His colleague Jacob Spis delivered his funeral sermon.

An address to the Hoorn congregation said, "There was namely besides the Waterlander congregation, which had adopted the Confession of Hans de Ries, also a Frisian congregation, which gave considerable approval to another (confession), signed at Dordrecht on Sept. 27, 1632, by a number of ministers: when these two congregations united in 1747, the third article of the agreement stipulated the following: The confessions of faith now adhered to by the two congregations will not be changed now; nor will the ministers and members be required to give a more specific declaration than that given when they were installed in office or admitted into the congregation; but when the two congregations are united, an attempt will be made to unify the two confessions wherein they may differ: And if an admission of members is planned, as has hitherto been customary, to proceed with such moderation that too much will not be demanded of such as are weak of understanding and tender spirits are spared" (Foreword of the German edition of the Confession of Cornelis Ris, Hamburg, 1776).

Thus it became a special concern to Cornelis Ris to gather into a single confession and merge the confessions of faith (q.v.) that seemed definitive in the Algemeene Belydenissen (1665) of the Zonists (q.v.); viz., the Concept of Cologne (q.v.), 1591; Outerman's (q.v.) Confession, 1626; Olijftacxken (q.v.), 1627; Confession of Jan Cents (q.v.), 1630; Dordrecht Confession (q.v.), 1632. Besides consideration for the two congregations at Hoorn, he was moved by the desire to check the rapid decline of the congregations of his time by steering them toward the old foundation of the recognized confessions (whereas van der Zijpp has shown that the congregations that were more faithful to the confessions were declining even more rapidly than the more liberal ones). In 1759 the church council of the Hoorn congregation decided to present Ris' proposal to the Zonist Sociëteit. This body approached the problem with hesitation. Nevertheless Cornelis Ris was able to present a concrete sketch in 1762 and to publish it in 1766. His caution in this matter is shown by the title of the fourth article; at first it read, "How this one God is further to be distinguished in the Holy Scriptures"; the later version says more plainly, "Of the Holy Trinity." Not until 1773 did the Sociëteit formally approve the confession. But in spite of this approval it found no enthusiastic reception by the Zonists, the Lamists (q.v.), or the Old Flemish (q.v.). Concerning the previous history and the difficulties in having this confession approved Ris wrote Kort Berigt van't voorgevallene over de Geloofsleere (Hoorn, 1776).

The Confession of Cornelis Ris was given the significant title De Geloofsleere der waare Mennoniten of Doopsgezinden. Nevertheless Cornelis Ris, like the orthodox wing of the Dutch Mennonites in general at that time, also sought contact with Calvinism, the established faith; his confession, which expressly attaches itself to the Mennonite tradition, has a certain Calvinistic inclination (the doctrine of election in article IX was later moderated or left open by insertions). His 36 articles deal with all the major points of theology.

This confession, like the Dordrecht Confession, had only temporary significance in the Netherlands (q.v.), but attained a true and wide significance outside its home. For the Confession of Cornelis Ris its relations to the Hamburg-Altona (q.v.) congregation and to America were important.

Besides the Hoorn congregation, the only other congregations to support it were Westzaan in North Holland and Almelo (q.v.) in Overijssel, where Pieter Beets (q.v.), a nephew and collaborator of Cornelis Ris, was the pastor. He took a position in favor of the confession in a "Brief Report."

The bridge to the Hamburg-Altona congregation was built by members of the Beets (q.v.) family, some of whom lived there and others in Hoorn. Jan Beets (q.v.; 1708-88), of Hoorn, a follower of Count Zinzendorf (q.v.) and a successful revival preacher, was a faithful adherent of Cornelis Ris. His cousin Gerrit Beets (q.v.; 1707-76), elder of the Hamburg-Altona congregation, fought all his life, like Ris, "that the ancient pillars should not be removed." Pieter Beets (1727-76), a nephew of Jan Beets and of Cornelis Ris, who had also been "awakened" in the early 1750's, was called from Almelo to Hamburg-Altona, recommended by his uncle Cornelis Ris, and began his service there in 1771. He was succeeded not long after by Jan Ris (1756-84), a son of Cornelis Ris, whom Pieter Beets had instructed in Hamburg-Altona, and who became a ministerial candidate in 1775, a minister in Hamburg-Altona in 1777, and an elder in 1779.

In Hamburg the Confession of Cornelis Ris was translated into German and published in 1776. The Foreword explains that it was intended for Mennonites of Dutch extraction who were now using German in their services, and for the congregations in Southwest Germany and Alsace and their "colonies" in America; it expresses the hope that the Protestants would graciously accept this work. The translator reproduced some 12 pages of the original author's 52-page introduction and added some pages of his own, making a German introduction of about half the length of the Dutch. For 1791 B. C. Roosen reported in his history of the Hamburg-Altona congregation (II, p. 55), "when the preachers of our congregation in 1791 suggested in the church council that competent preachers be sought from the outside, they added the wish that only orthodox ones adhering to the confessions of Hans de Ries and Lubbert Gerrits, Gerrit Roosen, or Cornelis Ris be invited for a visit." The same history records that on May 29, 1803, it was unanimously decided to adopt the Confession by Cornelis Ris, and that for many years each newly chosen preacher and deacon signed a copy of this confession.

In the early 19th century, when Prussia organized its Rhine Province (see Rhineland) and sought information about its Mennonites, the Dordrecht Confession was presented as that of the stricter branch (Amish), and the Cornelis Ris confession as that of the more lenient branch.

The Confession of Cornelis Ris acquired new effectiveness in the 19th and 20th centuries through the work of Carl Justus van der Smitten (q.v.; 1811-90), who was the minister in the Friedrichstadt (q.v.) Mennonite congregation 1837-68, and was then called to America to serve as a teacher in the school at Wadsworth (q.v.), Ohio. He revised the German translation of this confession "in order that it may not be lost to our congregations." His revision, without the Scriptural proof texts, was published as a manuscript in 1850.

In America Carl Heinrich Anton van der Smitten (q.v.; 1851-1950), a son of the above, a Mennonite pastor in Summerfield, Ill., published the Cornelis Ris Confession in 1895 as an appendix to a short history of the Mennonites. This edition contained some new proof texts added by his father and Berend Roosen (q.v.). This confession seemed more liberal, in America as well as in Europe, than the Dordrecht Confession, and was published by the General Conference Mennonite Church in English in 1902 and 1904, and 1904 (with title of 1895 edition) and 1906 in German, as its recognized confession.

In 1778 and 1779, Cornelis Ris also published thirty sermons by his nephew after his early death. Furthermore, his glance extended beyond the ecclesiastical matters. He had since 1777 promoted the establishment of a "Patriotic Association for Shipping and Trade," and in the service of this association (which became a victim of the years of the French Revolution) he composed in 1871 his Algemeen Christelijk-Catechisatieboekje voor de kinderen van verschillende gezindten op de educatieschool der Vaderlandsche Maatschappij te Hoorn. Risser (Reesor, Reesor, Reusser, Rieser, Rüssor), an old Mennonite family stemming from Signau in the Emmental (q.v.) of Switzerland. In 1597 Daniel Reusser "is a disobedient Anabaptist" and a Rüsserin of Brienz returns to the church. Among the Swiss Mennonites who emigrated to the Netherlands in 1711 were Stephan Rüsser, of Hilterfingen, a member of the Reformed Church, with his second wife and Michael Rüsser (1684/5-1759), a son of his first marriage. Michael, who was arrested for his faith in 1710, was at the time of his emigration a preacher. In the Netherlands, farming near Groningen (q.v.), he became a preacher and soon after an elder of the Nieuwe Zwisers. (See Swiss Mennonites in the Netherlands.) In 1680 the Anabaptist Hans Rüsser of Hartlisberg zu Thun was for years reported out of the country; his property had been seized by the church and "should he return he shall be punished with rods and sent away again as a hard wicked Anabaptist" (Bern Archives). In 1672 Babé Ruesser, over 80 years old, Hans Reuscher and his wife and son Daniel, and Hans Reysscher and his wife were among the refugees in the Palatinate. In 1702 a Kaspar Risser successfully eluded the "Täuferjäger."

In 1715 and again in 1749 Hans Rüsser or Johannes Risser is found in the Palatinate as a hereditary leaseholder in Friedelsheim (q.v.). In 1773 Abraham Risser or Rüsser is found in Erpolzheim (q.v.; see Leiningen). A Johannes Risser was a preacher (from 1832) and elder (1833) at Sembach (q.v.) and another Johannes Risser (q.v.) was preacher in Friedelsheim; the former was in the middle of the 19th century one of the leaders in the Palatine-Hessian congregations, and the latter emigrated to America in 1832. In 1870-71 H. Risser was a teacher in the school at Weierhof (q.v.) and preached occasionally in Altleiningen (q.v.). The Mennonite Adressbuch of 1936 lists 27 Risser families in Germany.

Members of the Risser family are reported to have emigrated to America as early as 1712. At any rate, in 1737 a Peter Risser (d. 1804 at the age of 91) emigrated from Switzerland and settled in Lancaster County, Pa. He enjoyed telling that he had emigrated in order to avoid being chosen by lot to the ministry; but immediately upon his arrival the lot fell upon him; thus it became clear to him that it is impossible to flee from the presence of God. He became an outstanding preacher and served a longer term in the ministry than any other Lancaster preacher before or after him. Eight children were born to him in America. His son Christian in 1774 married Fanny Reif(f) and settled near Markham, Ont. His son Jacob married Mary Snyder and remained in the home community. They were the ancestors of all the Mennonite Risser, Reesors, and Reesers of Lancaster, Dauphin, and Lebanon counties, Pa., and Markham, Ont. Some of the original land is still in the family name. Among the descendants in the ministry were Jacob Risser, his son Martin E. Risser (d. 1905), and his grandson John D. Risser (d. 1952) in Washington County, Md., and Christian Risser (d. 1826) and John Risser (d. 1870) of the Risser congregation, Bishop Christian Risser (d. 1910) and John Risser (d. 1873) of the Hammer Creek congregation, Peter Risser (d. 1864) of Chestnut Hill, Bishop Noah W. Risser (1877-) of the Stauffer congregation, and Abram Risser of the Hernley congregation, all in Lancaster County, Pa., and Jacob and Martin Risser (d. 1926) of Lebanon County, Pa. In 1911 Christian B. Risser (or Reeser) (d. 1923 at the age of 103) was an Amish preacher in Roanoke, Ill. James Reusser is a minister (GCM) in the Salem Church near Dalton, Ohio. The family is also found in Kansas and Oklahoma. I.D.L., E.C.

Risser, Johannes (1810-68), a minister of the Mennonite congregation at Sembach, Germany, was born in Friedelsheim (q.v.), Nov. 21, 1810. He was educated at the universities of Heidelberg, Erlangen, and Bonn. On Sept. 16, 1832, he entered the ministry at Sembach. He vigorously cultivated the spiritual life and intellectual interests of his congregation. (The church record books contain his notes on the history of the Mennonite churches in Palatinate.) His influence extended far beyond his congregation. He was an active co-worker on the Mennonitische Blätter (q.v.). He was closely associated with his co-preachers Jakob Ellenberger (q.v.) and Johannes Molenaar (q.v.). He had a prominent part in the compilation of the Formularbuch (q.v.), which is still in use, and of the new hymnal (see Hymnology) of 1854. Also the questions of the creating of a ministerial fund (Predigerfonds, q.v.) and of the traveling ministry (see Reisepredigt) occupied him. His attempts to bring about a union with the Amish Mennonites of the Palatinate were only temporarily successful, but are a testimonial to his warm love for the brotherhood, his broad view, and his generous mind. He died at Sembach on May 23, 1868. NEFF.

Risser, Johannes (John), a minister in the Mennonite congregation at Friedelsheim (q.v.), Palatinate, Germany, 1825-32, where among other things he conducted missionary meetings. He was born at Friedelsheim, Nov. 27, 1788. In 1813 he married Katharina Weber, who was related to the Mellinger family. In 1832 he emigrated to America. They as well as their relatives who had previously emigrated to Mellingers (q.v.) in Pennsylvania sent reports on travel and on America to their old home. Excerpts of these have been published in the Mennonite Quarterly Review. The German originals were probably published early in the 20th century in a newspaper of Worms. German excerpts were printed in the Wappenkunde of the Palatinate shortly before the appearance of the English version. Johannes Risser purchased some land and settled in Mifflin Twp., Richland Co., Ohio, not far from Mansfield in 1833. In 1845 he published a booklet on baptism, Glaube und Lehre von der Taufe der Mennoniten in Deutschland. Verfasst von Johannes Risser, Mitglied dieser Kirche, und hierher nach Amerika eingewandert, welchem dort zwar der Beruf als Prediger geworden, aber ohne in eine andere Schule als eine gewöhnliche Volksschule gekommen zu seyn, folglich kein Gelehrter ist, und daher die Leser wegen der vorkommenden Unvollkommenheiten um freundliche Nachsicht bittet. It appeared in the shop of Heinrich Eby (q.v.) at Berlin (now Kitchener), Ont. It is an expansive treatment, in two parts, dealing respectively with the historical and the practical aspects. Risser (Rissers) Mennonite Church (MC), located 4 miles east of Elizabethtown, Pa., a member of the Lancaster Conference, originated in 1737. The first meetinghouse was built in 1760 in a grove on Peter Risser's (q.v.) land. This was enlarged in 1865, and in 1887 replaced by the present frame church 50 x 70 ft. It is beautifully located, with a schoolhouse adjoining and a well-kept cemetery. In 1957 the membership was 138; Noah W. Risser and Clarence E. Lutz were the bishops, Walter W. Oberholtzer and J. Harold Forwood the ministers. It formerly shared its ministers with the Stauffer congregation at Bachmanville. I.D.L.

Rissler, Daniel and Moses, preacher and deacon respectively of the New Holland O.O.M. Church, Lancaster Co., Pa., were brothers who led a schism of the Weaver Mennonites, a branch of the Pike Mennonites (q.v.), and then disagreed among themselves. The combined group consisted chiefly of the members of these two families and never numbered more than seven. I.D.L.

Rissler Old Order Mennonites. Samuel Bowman (1822-1902), bishop at the Pike church of the Stauffer Mennonite (q.v.) group, New Holland, Pa., led a faction, following the Civil War, which was more conservative than the main Stauffer group. He appointed Philip Rissler minister of the conservative group, which met in private homes. As a bishop Bowman again joined the main Stauffer group in 1916, only to be expelled with 11 members in 1919. Later Deacon Moses Rissler expelled his brother, Minister Aaron Rissler, from the Rissler group.

Aaron Rissler after that was the leader of a small group of followers until his death in March 1950. I.D.L.

Ritschl, Albrecht (1822-89), one of the outstanding German liberal theologians of the 19th century, professor of theology 1852-64 at the University of Bonn and 1864-89 at Göttingen, wrote twice at length concerning Anabaptism, both times in connection with his investigation of the origin and history of Pietism. Under the influence of Max Goebel's Geschichte des christlichen Lebens in der rheinisch-westfälischen evangelischen Kirche (Coblence, 1849, 1852, 1860) he held Pietism to be in a sense a revival of Anabaptism; hence he attempted to show the relationship of the two by analyzing their basic ideas and showing the similarity. In tracing the origin of Pietism to Anabaptism he felt it necessary to trace the origin of Anabaptism, which he did by tracing its roots back to medieval Catholicism, particularly the Franciscan tertiaries or spirituals.

Ritschl first set up his theory of the origin of Anabaptism in an article in Zeitschrift für Kirchengeschichte II (1878) 1-55, entitled "Prolegomena zu einer Geschichte der Pietismus." Here he asserted a direct connection with Franciscan tertiary congregations. When Ritschl published his Geschichte des Pietismus in der reformierten Kirche (Bonn, 1880) he modified his theory (p. 70) to say that since he had found no documentary proof of direct connection he claimed only a general derivation of Anabaptist ideas from Franciscan tertiary ideas.

More important than the matter of the specific origin of Anabaptism is Ritschl's attempted characterization of Anabaptism as in effect a revival and continuance of medieval Franciscan tertiary ideology in contrast to the Lutheran and Zwinglian Reformation, which succeeded in overcoming medieval Catholicism altogether and operated with a radically different concept of church reform. According to Ritschl, Lutheranism (and Zwinglianism) was the exact opposite of Anabaptism on this point. (Calvinism, he thought, had certain Anabaptist-Franciscan elements.) Here Ritschl departed from his mentor Goebel's favorable evaluation of both Pietism and Anabaptism. Contrary to Goebel's view that "Anabaptism was the more thorough, decisive, and complete Reformation, a child of Luther's and Zwingli's Reformation, which was surrendered by Luther in 1522 and by Zwingli in 1524," Ritschl insists that Luther had an entirely different concept of the reform of the church, and never intended what the Anabaptists wanted. He sought to reform doctrine and worship and the clergy, working only indirectly for a reform of life and raising of moral standards, while the Anabaptists like the Franciscans sought basically a reform of life based upon a restoration of a New Testament apostolic moral and social order and institutions on a legalistic monastic-ascetic basis, which meant withdrawal from ordinary occupational and state life, "a flight from the world." Luther by contrast emphasized justification by faith, freedom from legalism, and participation in occupational and state life—no withdrawal. The Anabaptists wanted to establish a pure church by discipline, while Luther wanted to improve the general morals and behavior of the people through the general moral education of the people by the state. So, says Ritschl, one cannot rate Anabaptism as a better Reformation unless one prefers (1) social withdrawal and rejection of the state, (2) communism of goods and regulation of costume, (3) prohibition of cheerfulness and merriment, (4) imagined sinlessness which leads to antinomianism.

Ritschl admits that both Luther and the Anabaptists claimed to base their principles on Scripture, hence the decision between the two in Reformation times could not be made by using Scripture, but only by force, which meant the physical suppression of Anabaptism.

For Ritschl Anabaptism was basically a revival of the monastic-ascetic legalistic ideal of holiness as the Christian way of life which was taught and practiced by the Franciscan tertiaries for 300 years before the Reformation. Both movements treat the New Testament as a code of law. He insists that Anabaptist teaching and regulations can be shown to reproduce precisely the Rule of the Tertiaries (in part). The tertiaries had prohibition of worldly amusements, regulation of costume, restrictions on the oath and the bearing of arms. The Anabaptists, it is true, made the latter two points absolute, but Melchior Hofmann fell back precisely to the tertiary position of restriction on the oath and arms, rather than absolute prohibition.

Ritschl adduces two secondary aspects of Anabaptism, mysticism and chiliasm, and claims that these were also drawn from Franciscan backgrounds. He goes so far as to claim that "all Anabaptists taught the return of Christ and the establishment of His earthly millennial kingdom."

Having surrendered his theory of the direct derivation of Anabaptism from tertiary congregations, Ritschl is at some pains to show the route by which Anabaptists got tertiary ideas. He concedes that the Anabaptists had been direct adherents of Luther (q.v.) and Zwingli (q.v.) in the early years of the Reformation, but says this does not at all mean that they got their ideas from Luther and then carried them on to more complete and logical expressions. He propounds the following theory. All Anabaptists, even their educated leaders, came from the lower artisan classes of the cities. Since it was precisely in these classes that the Franciscans had preached and worked with success, these classes thought of reform in the medieval Franciscan sense of moral reform—of an application of monkish-ascetic holiness to the common people. They held their ideal under the title of "preaching the Gospel" and believed it was based upon the New Testament Scriptures. When Luther came he professed to (1) preach the Gospel, (2) base his work solely on Scripture, and (3) reform the church. Hence the city masses thought he was going to carry out their previously held ideals of reform and rushed to follow him. When they discovered that he was not at all going to do this, they forsook him and his Reformation. At this point the Anabaptist movement came along and the disappointed masses followed them.

What better sources does Ritschl have to support this thesis than he had for his earlier thesis of direct connection, for which he confesses he had no documentary sources? He offers no proof for his claim that all Anabaptists came from the artisan classes of the cities nor even for the claim that these classes were shot through with tertiary ideas. His chief cited source for Anabaptist principles is Heinrich Bullinger's (q.v.) Der Wiedertäufer Ursprung (Zürich, 1560), which he unquestioningly accepts. He has one footnote reference to Cornelius' (q.v.) Geschichte des Münsterischen Aufbruchs II (1859), and Erbkam's Geschichte der Protestantischen Sekten im Zeitalter der Reformation (Hamburg, 1847), both of which he lightly puts aside.

Goebel's book, of course, he was familiar with. Ludwig Keller's basic works on Anabaptism had not yet appeared (Ritschl's preface is signed Jan. 20, 1880). Ritschl gives no evidence of any thorough study of Anabaptism. His method is, in fact, basically that of comparative theology. He draws conclusions about genetic relationships from similarities in ideologies. This method has some value, but at most it can only classify ideas without proving any genetic relationships. Ritschl cites no Anabaptist literary sources or archival records. He names in passing a few Anabaptist leaders, Conrad Grebel (probably based on Cornelius), Hans Denk (q.v.), and Hans Hut (q.v.), and seemingly includes Carlstadt (q.v.) and Müntzer (q.v.) in the Anabaptist group. Where he got his erroneous assertion that Hans Hut's group "as the true Israel undertook to root out all Canaanites by force" is unknown. Nor does he prove his impossible claim that all Anabaptists were chiliasts. He does admit that most Anabaptists were peaceful and nonresistant (he had to in line with his thesis of Franciscan ideological origin) but cites Hut and the Münsterites as examples of the use of violence. His claim of antinomianism among the Anabaptists (where it is not merely a logical deduction) must have come from Bullinger.

One cannot escape the impression that Ritschl basically operates with two central ideas which are imposed upon his material a priori rather than derived from the evidence: (1) Luther's Reformation is preferable as a movement which transcended medieval Catholic monastic-ascetic, papal, and hierarchical Christianity of works by its proclamation of the Gospel of justification by faith, freedom from legalism, rejection of following the New Testament example in ethics and social institutions, and promotion of a Christianity which works toward the gradual improvement of moral and the social order through education. (2) All other types of reformation are basically the opposite of this in all points, in essence a continuation of the medieval Catholic idea of moral reform bearing an essentially legalistic monastic-ascetic character. This latter strain came to the fore in the mendicant orders, especially the Franciscans, and there particularly in the tertiaries or Spirituals. Since the Anabaptists, as conceived by Ritschl, bear this same character, they must have arisen out of this background.

The specific construction of Anabaptist origin and character advocated by Ritschl has had no substantial support by other historians. The idea that Anabaptism was monastic in essence, a monkish movement, was of course often charged in the Reformation period, by Luther and Melancthon for instance, as well as by Bullinger and by superficial observers since that time. This is a strange misunderstanding of the central Anabaptist motivation to be "earnest" Christians in full discipleship and to establish a church of this character kept pure by discipline. On the other hand, from the very beginning there have, of course, been individuals and even groups who went to extremes and became legalistic, both Anabaptists and Mennonites. That this has ever had any direct or even indirect relation to any historic aspect of Roman Catholic monasticism is most unlikely, and certainly has never been proved from acceptable documentary sources.

Heinrich van der Smitten, Mennonite pastor in Hamburg-Altona, Germany, reviewed Ritschl's book in 1882 in the Mennonitische Blätter XXIX, pp. 19-22, 28 f., 37 f., 45 f., 58 f., analyzing at length and refuting Ritschl's hypothesis. Karl Barth describes Ritschl's position as follows in his Die protestantische Theologie im 19ten Jahrhundert (Zollikon-Zürich, 1947) p. 598: "Christianity is world view and morality (Weltanschauung und Sittlichkeit), but in no sense an immediate relationship with God. Catholicism and Anabaptism of any sort are accordingly thereby eliminated (erledigt) in one stroke, since they claim to know of a Christianity and indeed a more perfect Christianity in the moral sphere than the conscious and actuated sonship of God."

Rittenhouse (Rittinghuysen, Rittinghausen, Rudinghuysen, Rittershausen), a Lower Rhine Mennonite family name dating back at least to 1591. There is no trace of the Rittenhouse family among the European Mennonites after William Rittenhouse came to Pennsylvania in 1688. Willem (William) Rittinghausen (1644-1708) was born in the Rhineland near Mühlheim, Germany, and was living in Amsterdam before he emigrated to America in 1688. He became the first Mennonite minister in America and builder of the first paper mill at Philadelphia in 1690. The American Mennonite Rittenhouses all descend from him.

Most of the American Rittenhouses have remained in the place where they first settled (near Philadelphia in Montgomery, Bucks, and Berks counties), but some of them went to Canada with the Bucks County migration of 1799-1800. A few families moved to Wayne County, Ohio, and one can still find a few Rittenhouses scattered in Indiana and Michigan, and even a few in Alberta. A considerable number of the descendants of the original family have joined other faiths. Some notable members of the family besides the pioneer William Rittenhouse have been Matthias Rittenhouse (1770-1832), a minister in the Skippack (Pa.) Mennonite (MC) congregation of the Franconia Conference, and Nicholas (Claes) Rittenhouse (1666-1734), son of William, one of the subscribers to the Dordrecht Confession of Faith (q.v.) at the 1725 conference. There is one Mennonite minister today bearing the name Rittenhouse, Jacob Z. Rittenhouse, pastor of the Lansdale (MC) congregation in the Franconia Conference. The most famous person bearing the family name was David Rittenhouse (1732-96), the Philadelphia astronomer and scientist and the first director of the United States mint, who was a son of Matthias of the third generation in America. He was not a member of the Mennonite Church.

Rittenhouse, William (1644-1708). To this man goes the distinction of being the first Mennonite preacher in North America. He was born at Broich in Westphalia, Germany. In 1678 he became a citizen of Amsterdam, signing as Willem Ruddinghysen of Muelheim, papermaker. Ten years later (1688) he was in Germantown, Pa., and in 1690 joined in building the first paper mill in the American colonies, located on a branch of the Wissahickon Creek in what is now Fairmount Park, Philadelphia. This paper mill was in the Rittenhouse family for over a century. It was probably in 1690 that Rittenhouse was chosen as the first preacher of the Germantown (q.v.) Mennonite congregation, a group of Lower Rhine (chiefly Crefeld) immigrants, which had been without a leader from its beginning in 1683-85. For many years no baptismal or communion services were held because Rittenhouse was not a bishop and did not therefore feel free to proceed in such bishop work. The Germantown Mennonites wrote to the ministers at Altona, Germany, in 1702 asking that a bishop come to America and ordain a bishop for them, so that baptism and communion could be performed. The Altona ministers replied that the trip to America was too great to undertake, and advised the Germantown ministers to proceed with the administration of the ordinances. Rittenhouse was not convinced. In 1706 he wrote to the Amsterdam Mennonites and got the same advice. He eventually felt sufficiently persuaded of the soundness of this advice to proceed, but became ill and died on Feb. 18, 1708, before he was able to perform the services. It was probably D. K. Cassel who started the fiction that Rittenhouse was bishop. The man who actually carried out the instruction of the Altona preachers was Jacob Gottschalk (q.v.; c1670-1763), who had been ordained as assistant preacher to Rittenhouse in 1702.

One other bit of information is known about Rittenhouse. He made an effort to have the Dordrecht Confession of Faith (q.v.) translated into English, but the price asked was so high that the project was abandoned. Jacob Gottschalk then took up the matter with the Amsterdam Mennonites, who successfully accomplished the task in 1712 (reprinted in Philadelphia, 1727).

William Rittenhouse had some distinguished descendants. His son Nicholas Rittenhouse (1666-1734) served as a Mennonite preacher at Germantown. Nicholas had a son Henry, who located in what is now Montgomery County and who granted the land for the Worcester meetinghouse to the "Mennonist Society" in 1739. J. C. Clemens, minister in the Plains Mennonite Church and long-time secretary of the Franconia Conference, is a direct descendant. Henry Rittenhouse had a brother Mathias who became the father of the famous mathematician, scientist, and astronomer, David Rittenhouse (1732-96), thus a great-grandson of William the preacher. David built orreries for Princeton University and for the University of Pennsylvania. He also built an observatory and a transit telescope. In 1776 he was a member of the Pennsylvania Assembly. He served as treasurer of Pennsylvania 1777-89, and as the first director of the United States mint 1792-95. He was president of the American Philosophical Society 1791-96, succeeding Benjamin Franklin.

Ritter, Georg, a well-to-do grocer of Bern, Switzerland, who played an important part in the emigration of Swiss Mennonites. He and a certain Louis Michelle, who traveled in the Pequena region of Pennsylvania in 1704-5, organized a land company whose holdings were to be settled by Swiss Mennonites. This project did not materialize, although in 1710 Swiss Mennonites did establish the Lancaster Mennonite settlement. In 1712 Ritter, in co-operation with the Bernese magistrates, undertook to conduct to the English colony of Carolina in America a transport of some 56 Mennonite prisoners at Bern, and a few poor Bernese residents. He was promised 45 Thalers for each Mennonite whom he safely delivered across the ocean, to be taken from their confiscated property, and for the poor a lump sum of 500 Thalers. But the plan miscarried because the prisoners were released by the Dutch officials when their ship arrived at Nijmegen. In the next year, through the intervention of the Dutch government (see Runkel), a number of Swiss Mennonites were permitted to leave the country to settle in the Netherlands; then Ritter was the leader of the transport of five boats which sailed from Basel on July 16, 1711, arriving at Amsterdam on August 3. For his care and pains Ritter received a gift of 200 Rix-thalers.

Rivageois, the inhabitants of Jemeppe and other villages of the Meuse River, south of Liège, Belgium, who in 1531 rebelled against the government of the Catholic bishop of Liège. This revolt is often said to have been a result of the rise of Anabaptism in this area, but there is no indication of Anabaptist origin. The rebellion of the Rivageois was merely an economic protest. vDZ.

River Brethren, a popular name long used for the denomination known since 1862 officially as the Brethren in Christ (q.v.). The name is supposedly due to the fact that the group had its beginnings (*c*1770) in an area of western Lancaster County, Pa., near the Susquehanna River. H.S.B.

River Corner Mennonite Church (MC), located 2 miles south of Conestoga Center in southern Lancaster County, Pa. Benedict Eshleman deeded one acre of land for a cemetery and meetinghouse upon which a meetinghouse was built about 1774. It was named Miller's after Martin Miller, who obtained the first deed in 1794. A stone building in 1828 replaced this, and another beautiful stone church of colonial design was built in 1882, which was enlarged in 1947. The congregation is a part of the Byerland-New Danville circuit. The membership in 1958 was 73 with David N. Thomas as bishop and Mylin Shenk minister. A large, old well-kept cemetery adjoins the church. I.D.L.

Riverdale Amish Mennonite Church, located at Millbank, Perth Co., Ont., began as a mission in a former Presbyterian church, purchased in 1946 by the Mission Board of the Ontario Amish Mennonite Conference. A number of Mennonite families from surrounding congregations began to worship in the church. Menno Zehr and Valentine Nafziger were superintendents of the mission. Preaching services were supplied by neighboring congregations. In January 1948 Menno Zehr was ordained minister, and in June 1948 a congregation was organized with about 60 charter members, which bought the meetinghouse from the mission board. In early 1956 the bishop, Valentine Nafziger, withdrew with 23 members to form a strictly conservative church called Bethel. In 1958 the Riverdale congregation had 120 members, with Menno Zehr as minister. O.G., V.N.

Riverside Conservative Mennonite Church, Au Gres, Arenac Co., Mich., until 1945 called the Augress River Church, had a membership of 93 in 1957, with Levi Swartz and Elmer Jantzi as ministers. The church was first listed in the 1919 Mennonite Year-Book and Directory, with 17 members. M.G.

Riverside Evangelical United Brethren Church, located 3 miles north of Fulks Run, Va., is used once a month by the Mennonites (MC) as a rural mission in behalf of the seven members who live in the community. The Mennonite appointment is in the care of L. P. Showalter, Broadway, Va. T.S.

Riverside Hutterite Bruderhof of the Dariusleut (q.v.) group, located at Glenwood, Alberta, was founded in 1939 by Preacher Lorenz Tschetter (d. 1957), who was chosen preacher in the Stand-Off (q.v.) colony in 1933 and confirmed there in 1938. He was succeeded as leader of the Bruderhof by his brother Peter A. Tschetter who was chosen to the ministry here in 1944 and confirmed in 1948. In 1958 the number of souls in the Bruderhof was 104, the number of baptized members 47. Plans are under way for 50 persons of the Riverside Bruderhof to establish a new Bruderhof at Estuary, Sask., in the summer of 1958. D.D., P.A.T.

Riverside Hutterite Bruderhof, known as the Riverside Hutterian Mutual Corporation, located one and one-half miles south of Arden, Man., was founded in 1933 by a group from the Iberville Bruderhof, led by the preacher Paul Gross, who died in 1943. He was succeeded by John R. Hofer, who left with a group of families to found the Bloomfield Bruderhof at Westbourne, Man. The present minister is John J. Hofer, chosen in 1949 and confirmed in 1957. The population in 1958 was 82, with 26 baptized members. D.D., J.J.H.

Riverside Mennonite (MC) Mission Church, near Harman, Randolph Co., W. Va., under the Virginia Conference. The work was begun near 1900, and services were held in Dry Fork, Bonner Mountain, and Pennington schoolhouses previous to the building of the Riverside church in 1932. The 1957 membership was 70, with Menno J. Brunk as minister. O.M.K.

Riverstix Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, now extinct, located at Riverstix, Medina Co., Ohio, was organized in 1871 with 6 members; services were held in homes. Later the membership increased to 18 and services were held in schools, one of which was later purchased for a church building. Henry Leatherman, who was ordained in 1879, and Sam Leatherman were their first ministers. Later C. G. Buerge served as pastor for many years. The congregation dissolved by members moving away. It ceased to exist about 1943. P.G.H.

Riverview Conservative Mennonite Church, located at White Pigeon, Mich., on Highway 103 near the Indiana-Michigan line, had a membership of 184 in 1957; Orle Kauffman was the bishop and Noah Zehr and Jonas D. Miller the ministers. The church was first listed in the 1953 Mennonite Yearbook. In 1952 it was formed of former members of the Townline and Griner Conservative Mennonite congregations. M.G.

Rixtel, van, a Dutch Mennonite family name, probably of Flemish origin, found at Rotterdam, Haarlem, Amsterdam, and a few other towns in the 16th-18th centuries. Pieter van Rixtel, a Mennonite, lived in Elbing (q.v.), West Prussia, Germany, until 1709. Another Pieter van Rixtel (1644-73), of Haarlem, was a poet of mediocre gifts. He often stayed at the inn of Jan Zoet (q.v.) near Amsterdam, called "Parnassus aan het Y," a poets' center, where van Rixtel met with Karel Verloove (q.v.) and other Collegiant-Mennonite makers of verse. vdZ.

Rizzetto, Antonio (d. 1565), a Hutterite martyr, was baptized around 1551 in his house in Vicenza, Italy, by the anti-Trinitarian Anabaptist minister Marcantonio of Asolo, an associate of Pietro Manelfi (q.v.). Late in 1551, following the exposure of the north Italian evangelical movement by Manelfi, the Inquisition began to arrest members of the sect, forcing Rizzetto to flee. He sought refuge in Thessalonica, accompanied by Bartolomeo of Padua and the latter's wife and daughter. Upon Bartolomeo's death Rizzetto married the widow. After living some time in Thessalonica, Rizzetto returned alone to Italy, perhaps prompted by a letter from Francesco della Sega (q.v.). In 1561 he visited the Hutterites in Moravia in the company of Bartolomeo of Ferrara, Lucrezia of Vicenza, and one of his daughters by an earlier marriage. He was accepted as a member of a community there, so must have renounced his anti-Trinitarian beliefs, if he in fact ever held them. He went to Moravia, says Rizzetto, "because I had learned that there were there good people who lived saintly lives; and seeing their lives and actions, I was pleased, and thus I determined to remain there and I stayed and I left my daughter there." He now made arrangements to have his wife, Caterina, and his stepdaughter, Paola, join him. To effect this he went to Venice in 1562 with della Sega and paid a merchant twenty-five ducats to bring his family from Thessalonica. (Paola died in Thessalonica; Caterina was attempting to return to Italy in 1563.) Rizzetto himself was about to go back to Moravia with several other persons when a financial dispute led a member of the party to betray them to the authorities at Capodistria, and Rizzetto, della Sega, Nicola Buccella, and Rizzetto's young son were arrested (Aug. 27, 1562). Interrogations followed, at Capodistria and then at Venice, and in the course of these Rizzetto supplied not only the information given above but also some descriptions of the doctrines and ceremonies of the Hutterites. All efforts of the Inquisitors to bring him to recant failed, despite arguments, prolonged confinement, and the pleas of his son. On Feb. 8, 1565, together with della Sega, he was sentenced, as an impenitent Anabaptist heretic, to be drowned. When the executioner told him della Sega was considering an abjuration, Rizzetto, much disturbed, replied, "Unhappy soul! But if he has lost his soul, I do not want to lose mine: What I have said, I have said." Exhorted further, he answered simply, "Do your deed." Thus he died not knowing for sure whether della Sega had recanted.

The execution was a tragic and moving scene. As the boats carrying the party moved under cover of darkness toward the sea, a priest urged Rizzetto to kiss the Crucifix, but he refused and warned those with him to come to Christ that they might escape eternal damnation. When the boats stopped, a plank was extended between them, and the executioner passed around Rizzetto's waist a chain attached to a heavy stone. Turning his face to the heavens Rizzetto cried, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Then, saying, "O God, into Thy hands I remit my spirit," he rolled off the plank into the sea. DeWind.

Roanoke Mennonite Church (MC), located 2 miles west and 2 miles south of Roanoke, Woodford County, Ill., is a member of the Illinois Conference. Settlers from Ohio, Alsace-Lorraine, and Germany settled in the vicinity in 1829, including David Schertz, the first minister. In 1875 the first frame church was erected and dedicated. This was replaced by a brick church in 1920 with a seating capacity of 185, which was enlarged in 1957 to accommodate 325. The majority of the members are farmers, active and retired. The outstanding early bishop was John Smith (1843-1906), ordained preacher 1887, bishop about 1890. Ezra Yordy, of Eureka, was ordained bishop on Sept. 25, 1925, and served until 1957. The membership in 1958 was 316. John L. Harnish, ordained minister on Dec. 24, 1922, served until 1952. Wesley Jantz became pastor in 1957. J.D.H.

Roaring Run Mennonite Church (MC) belonging to the Virginia Conference, located 3 miles north of Onego, W. Va., was established in 1870. In the early 1920's it had a membership of 27 but in 1957 it had only 10. M.G.

Roaring Spring Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Roaring Spring, Blair Co., Pa., had a membership of 24 in 1957; its minister was Kenneth H. Ross. Its first meetinghouse was built in 1898. Among its early ministers was Abram Snyder, who was listed with the congregation in the Southwestern Pennsylvania Conference (MC) as late as the 1908 Mennonite Year-Book. The next issue of the Year-Book (1913) no longer carried the church as a member of this conference district, but it was not until the conference of 1920 that it was listed with the General Conference Mennonite congregations in the Eastern District Conference. M.G.

Robbertsz, Robbert (Le Canu), b. 1563 at Amersfoort, d. after 1627 at Hoorn, Holland, was a teacher of navigation and the instructor of noted Dutch explorers, e.g., Jacob van Heemskerck at Amsterdam from about 1586, and at Hoorn from 1610. At the close of his life he was living at Hoorn, earning his living by selling brandy.

Robbertsz was at first a member of the Frisian Mennonite congregation of Amsterdam. In 1589, when a schism arose in this congregation, dividing it into conservative Old Frisians and moderate Young Frisians, Robbertsz took the side of Lubbert Gerritsz (q.v.), the leader of the Young (or Mild) Frisians; but soon after, probably by 1590, Robbertsz was banned even from this moderate group for his advanced ideas. Robbertsz defended himself in Verantwoordinghe oft ontschulddinghe (1592). With a few others he then founded the Robbert Robbertsz congregation, which had some adherents also in other Dutch towns (called Robbert-Robbertsvolk). To this group also belonged Tymen Claesz Honich (q.v.), who dedicated his hymnal Schrijftuerlijck Lied-Boecxken (n.p., n.d.) to Robbertsz. It could not be ascertained how long this congregation existed, but it is fairly certain that it dissolved in a few years. Robbertsz himself seems to have left the Mennonites. In later years he called himself a "Neutralist," saying, "The church of Christ is a majestic cathedral with many doors, all leading to the center," with this metaphor expressing his idea that one church is as good as another. He is said to have had his children baptized in different Protestant churches.

Robbertsz wrote a number of pamphlets, some of which pertain to the Mennonites: in 1591-92 against Lubbert Gerritsz, in 1596 against Jacob Jansz Kist (i.e., Jacob Schedemaker, q.v.). In 1627 he published a booklet, Disputatie tusschen twee Huyslieden, which defended Jan Theunis (q.v.) and attacked the preachers of the Amsterdam Waterlander congregation. He also attacked Reformed leaders such as Herman Møded (q.v.). A reprint of some of his pamphlets and poems was published at Makum in 1646. vbZ.

Robson, Isaac (1801-85), an English Quaker (q.v.), was delegated with Thomas Harvey (1812-84) to visit the Mennonites living in South Russia in 1867. They first made contact with the Mennonites of South Germany living in the area of Neuburg (q.v.), Bavaria; the Oesch family and a Jakob Hege are named in their report. In Berdyansk they established long-lasting connections with Cornelius Jansen (q.v.), who was then the Prussian consul. Guided by him, they went on to the Molotschna (q.v.), visiting Gnadenfeld, Halbstadt, Felsenthal, Neukirch, Orloff, Rudnerweide, Steinbach, and Tiegengagen, namely, those congregations that in comparison with Petershagen and Pordenau (q.v.) were considered more progressive. At the beginning of 1868 Robson sent an open letter to the South Russian Mennonites, more specifically to Jansen, urging them to spread the Gospel in their vicinity. The publication of this letter was stopped by Russian censorship. The connections with Cornelius Jansen, however, remained. The original with Cornelius Jansen's German translation is preserved in the Cornelius Jansen Collection in BeCL. The English Quakers gave the Mennonites emigrating to America generous financial support. On Feb. 8, 1879, they sent a letter to the immigrant Mennonites in America, which was printed in that year at Elkhart, Ind. (Copy GCL.) E.C.

Rock Lake Hutterite Bruderhof, of the Schmiedeleut (q.v.) branch, located one mile west of Grossisle, Man., was founded in 1947 by Michael Gross, preacher of the Iberville (q.v.) Bruderhof, and nine families with 70 persons including 25 baptized members. By 1958 the population of Rock Lake was 124, with 36 baptized members. D.D.

Rock Mennonite Church (MC), located in Berks Co., ½ mile northwest of Elverson, Pa., was begun in 1920, when the few remaining members of the Rock Baptist Church asked the Conestoga A.M. congregation to start Sunday school in this meetinghouse, built in 1845. In 1936 a congregation was organized by Bishop J. S. Mast, which is affiliated with the Ohio and Eastern Mennonite Conference. The meetinghouse was enlarged in 1937 and 1956. A number of former members are serving the church in other communities. The membership in 1957 was 66, with Ira A. Kurtz as bishop, and Christian J. Kurtz and Harry Hertzler as ministers. C.J.K.

Rock of Ages Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church is located at Maysville, Ohio. The 1957 membership was 22; the minister in charge was Paul Swartley. Most of its members were formerly Amish. M.G.

Rockhill Mennonite Church (MC), near Telford, Montgomery and Bucks counties, Pa., a member of the Franconia Conference, formerly called Bechtel's, then Gehman's (the name Rockhill only since about 1910), was organized between 1744 and 1764. The first meetinghouse was erected between 1737 and 1773. In 1838 the second meetinghouse was erected, and in 1925 the third. Early preachers were Isaac Kolb 1744-76, Samuel Bechtel 1764-1802, Abraham Gehman 1770-92, and Samuel Gehman 1799-1845. The first deacon was Michael Derstine (d. 1777). A small faction left in 1848 to join the new Oberholtzer (GCM) group. In 1957 the congregation had 221 members, with Arthur D. Ruth as bishop, and Edwin A. Souder, Clinton D. Landis, and Alfred A. Detweiler as preachers. H.S.B.

Rockingham County, Virginia (pop. 45,889, area 869 sq. mi.), is beautifully located in the Shenandoah Valley on the far western side of the state, between the Blue Ridge Mountains on the east and the Appalachian Mountains on the west, bounded by Augusta County on the south, and Shenandoah and Page counties on the north. The chief towns are Harrisonburg, the county seat (seat of Eastern Mennonite College and Madison State Teachers College), Timberville, Broadway, Edom, Mt. Clinton, Keezletown, Elkton, Dayton, Mt. Crawford, and Bridgewater (seat of Bridgewater College of the Church of the Brethren). It was formed in 1777 out of Augusta County. The area had an early settlement of the German element from Eastern Pennsylvania and still has many people of German descent. Mennonites, and the Church of the Brethren coming a little later, have always formed a substantial part of the population.

Rockingham County is the location of the oldest permanent settlement and largest part of the Mennonites in Virginia. Eighty per cent of the membership in the base congregations in the Shenandoah Valley are in this county, and 20 per cent in Augusta County. Fifty-two per cent of the total conference membership lives in Rockingham County. The first Mennonite settlers were probably Daniel Stover and John Shenk who came in 1773, and Henry Funk from Montgomery County, Pa., who came in 1780. The Mennonites came largely from the Pennsylvania counties of Montgomery, Lancaster, and York. The oldest present congregations date from 1820-30, Trisels near Broadway (1822), and Pike (1825) and Weaver (1827), both near Harrisonburg, but there is reason to believe that there was an organized congregation at least as early as 1790 in this area. In 1957 there were 15 congregations in the county with a membership of 1,832, and 12 rural mission churches with 613 members and two city missions, one for Negroes and one for whites, with a combined total of 25 members, a total of 2,470. The above churches are responsible for 27 meeting places outside the county. All these are organized into two bishop districts, established about 1840, called the Middle and Northern districts. This is the heart of the Virginia Mennonite Conference. Here are located Eastern Mennonite College (since 1917) and the Virginia Mennonite Home for old people (since 1954). Singers Glen on the west side of the county was the location of the Joseph Funk Mennonite press c1847-62. An Old Order Mennonite schism formed in 1900 has two congregations in the county with 300 members. The Church of the Brethren has 20 congregations in the county with about 5,000 members. H.S.B.

Rockport Hutterite Bruderhof, of the Schmiedeleut (q.v.) branch, 6 miles southwest of Alexandria, S.D. The site was settled first in 1891 by a Lehrerleut (q.v.) group from the Old Elm Spring (q.v.) Bruderhof with the preachers Jakob Wipf and Johann Kleinsasser. This group branched out in 1931 and founded the Hutterville (q.v.) Bruderhof near Magrath. In 1934 they sold Rockport and moved to Alberta, founding the O.K. Bruderhof near Raymond. The present occupants came from the Bon Homme (q.v.) Bruderhof with twelve families and Preacher Joseph Waldner. Daniel S. Wipf was chosen as minister here in 1934; later John J. Waldner was chosen, who is now in the Riverside Colony, Huron, S.D. In 1945 they branched out to found Rosedale (q.v.) in South Dakota, and in 1949 Huron, S.D. David Wipf was chosen as assistant minister in 1954. The membership of Rockport was 32 in 1958, and the total population 123.

Rockton Mennonite Church (MC), located in the northeastern part of Clearfield County, Pa., a member of the Allegheny Conference, had its beginning in 1839, when John Brubaker, the first minister and bishop in the new settlement, located here. Other names of early settlers were Lininger, LaBorde, Hummel, Brilhart, and Hollopeter. The first meetinghouse was built in 1860 and the Sunday school was established in 1864. Revival meetings in 1897 by A. D. Wenger strengthened the church by 23 new accessions. The membership in 1957 was 25, with Paul L. King as minister in charge. G.M.S.

Rockview Mennonite Church (MC), 235 Rockview Ave., Youngstown, Ohio, sponsored by the Ohio and Eastern Mennonite Mission Board, was established in 1947. It had 40 members in 1957, with Fred E. Augsburg as pastor. It is a Negro congregation. M.G.

Rockville Mennonite (MC) Mission, located at Honeybrook, Pa., was established in 1951. In 1957 Millard Shoup was the pastor, with a membership of 62. It belongs to the Ohio and Eastern Conference. M.G.

Rockway Gospel Chapel (MC), East Minot, N.D., is a mission station locally sponsored. It was established in 1951 and had 12 members in 1957, with John H. Stoll as pastor. M.G.

Rockway Mennonite (MC) School, 142 Doon Road, Kitchener, Ont., is a secondary school offering the work of grades 9 to 12 inclusive, operated by a board appointed by the Ontario Conference. Finances are supplied from tuition and by gifts of churches and friends. The school opened in September 1945 in a dwelling on a fourteen-acre farm which had been purchased for the purpose, on the outskirts of Kitchener. The house is still the only dormitory available, housing about 15 per cent of the students. The school accommodations have been increased in three major steps. In the summer of 1946 a barn on the property was converted into a school with four rooms and dining facilities. In 1948 four classrooms were added to the remodeled barn, and in 1954 the first permanent building was erected, consisting of four classrooms and administration quarters. The enrollment has steadily increased to its present level of 167 for 1957-58. Harold D. Groh served as principal until 1956. There are now eight teachers on the staff, including the principal, Ross T. Bender, 1956-. The courses offered are those outlined by the Ontario Department of Education, which accredits the school and issues the diplomas to the graduates. In addition students are required to take a unit of Bible, and this is supplemented by a daily devotional period. H.D.G.

Rockwell Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, located in Sheffield, Bureau Co., Ill., was organized in 1945 under the District Mission Board of the Illinois Conference. The first services, in 1943, were held in homes; later they were held in the Danish Lutheran Church in Sheffield. The 1948 membership of 17 consisted largely of Mennonites who had moved there from other communities. Ministers who served the congregation were John S. Detwiler 1945-47 and John I. Byler 1948-?. It was last listed in the Yearbook of 1950, when it had 22 members. E.I.C.

Rocky Mountain Mennonite Camp Association, Divide, Col., was organized in 1951. Since 1952 it has been conducting a summer camp in "the shadow of Pikes Peak," at an elevation of 9,660 feet. During the 1956 season it served more than 1,600 persons. The president is Harold Dyck, of Hesston, Kan., and the executive secretary Jess Kauffman, of Colorado Springs, Col. M.G.

Rocky Ridge Mennonite Church (MC), located 2 miles southeast of Quakertown, Pa., began as a mission in 1931, with Linford D. Hackman as superintendent. It became a congregation of the Franconia Conference in 1949. The meetinghouse was built in 1948, services having previously been held in a private home. The membership in 1957 was 87; Ernest K. Moyer and Abram K. Landis were the ministers in charge. E.K.M.

Roden, a town (1947 pop. 6,596, with 48 Mennonites) in the Dutch province of Drente. Mennonites living here in 1937 formed a Fellowship (Kring), which was at first served by the pastor of the Den Horn (q.v.) congregation. In 1950 the circle joined the Groningen congregation and was under the care of the pastor of this congregation, from 1951 under Miss C. E. Offerhaus. In 1954 the circle organized as an independent congregation and built a church, which was dedicated on March 6, 1955. The Roden congregation in 1958 numbered 42 baptized members. It has a ladies' circle and a Sunday school for children. Miss Offerhaus served until 1957; since 1958 C. de Groot has been pastor, serving also the recently established Haren congregation. (DJ 1956, 33-36.) vdZ.

Rodenbach, a village near Grünstadt in the Palatinate, Germany, formerly belonging to the graviate Leiningen (q.v.), in the 17th and 18th centuries, perhaps also earlier, the residence of several Mennonite families. In 1685 the Mennonite lists of Karlsruhe name 10 or 11 persons. Toward the end of the 18th century only two Mennonite families were left (Jansson and Christophel). The cemetery, which was laid out by the Mennonites, was used by Mennonites of the vicinity, members of the Altleiningen congregation (q.v.), until the middle of the 19th century. The Mennonite Adressbuch of 1936 lists for Rodenbach only one Mennonite. Mennonites have occasionally also lived in two other villages named Rodenbach, both in the Palatinate—Rodenbach near Kaiserslautern and Rodenbach near Gernersheim. (ML III, 526.) G.H.

Rödern, a Mennonite congregation in Alsace: see Niederrödern.

Roderwolde, located near Roden (q.v.) in the Dutch province of Drente, is named in 1639 as the seat of a small Mennonite congregation which had its own preacher. Concerning the history of this congregation nothing is known, either before or after 1639. (ML I, 478b.) vdZ.

Rodloffhuben, a hamlet between Heubuden (q.v.) and Kalthof, near Marienburg (q.v.), West Prussia, Germany. Here the Mennonite congregations of Danzig (q.v.) and Heubuden established a Christian school in 1826 under the leadership of the teacher Friedrich Wilhelm Lange (q.v.) of Brenkenhoffsvalde (q.v.). The Lutheran clergy of Marienburg charged Lange with Pietism and had the school closed in 1836. It was then moved to Bröskersfelde (q.v.), near Neuteich. E.C.

Roelan(d)t Staey(a)ert was an Anabaptist martyr executed at Gent, Belgium, in 1569. Particulars about this martyr are lacking. Verheyden did not find his name in the official records. His name is commemorated in a hymn in the Offer des Heeren (edition of 1578), beginning "Alsmen schreef duyst vyfhondert jaer, ende twee en tsestich mede." Roelant is listed as No. 30 in this hymn. Roelantsz, Jan, a Dutch Mennonite, living at Haarlem about 1600, who was a partisan of Jacob Pietersz van der Meulen (q.v.) of the Flemish and who in 1605 negotiated with Hans de Ries and the Waterlanders to bring about a merger of the Haarlem Flemish congregation with the Waterlanders, which, however, failed. Roelantsz probably was a deacon of the Haarlem Flemish congregation. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 507, 510-14.) vdZ.

Roelof Martens: see Adam Pastor.

Roelofs (Rulfs), Berend, was called from Sluys (Oudesluis) in De Zijp, Dutch province of North Holland (q.v.), to the Hamburg-Altona (q.v.) Mennonite congregation in 1650 to serve as pastor. But on Nov. 30, 1659, he resigned his pastorate. He "spoke against baptism, communion, and the office of preaching with contempt, so that great sorrow arose in the congregation and offense outside" (Rosen). With his entire family he united with the Quakers (see Society of Friends), who were propagandizing in Hamburg. When this group was expelled from Hamburg, on June 24, 1660, Roelofs and his family went to Alkmaar (q.v.), his native town. Here or in Oudesluis an ancestor of Roelofs' had at the turn of the century, influenced by a debate between the Reformed and the Mennonites, left the Reformed Church to unite with the Mennonites, giving up his position as sexton in the Reformed Church, because he considered the Mennonite views more Scriptural, and had become a Mennonite preacher. Roelofs, Oeds, b. 1765 at Murmurwoude, d. Nov. 8, 1848, at Terhorne, both villages in the Dutch province of Friesland, served the Terhorne Mennonite congregation as pastor from 1791 until he retired in 1836. Roelofs had no special training for the ministry, nor did he receive a salary (perhaps, however, a small remuneration), but supported himself as a baker. Oeds Roelofs assumed the family name of Dantuma in 1810; a number of his descendants are still found in Friesland, many serving the church as deacons. Three uncles of Oeds Roelofs served as lay preachers of the Dantumawoude (q.v.) congregation about 1800. (Naamlijst 1792, 61; DJ 1837, 28.)

Roelofs, Rijkman, a member of the Rijkmans (q.v.) family, b. c.1750, was baptized at Zuidveen, Dutch province of Overijssel, by a preacher of the (New) Flemish Mennonite congregation of Giethoorn (q.v.) Zuid; but this baptism was not recognized in the Old (Danzig) Flemish congregation of Zuidveen. Disagreements of this sort led to dissension and division in the congregation, and thus also to strife about the meetinghouse and possessions of the congregation. Whereas the conservative congregation, which was much the smaller of the two, died out early in the 19th century, the larger one persisted, and built a new church at near-by Steenwijk (q.v.) in 1848. In this congregation Rijkman was a leader. In 1774 he was one of two deacons chosen by the congregation. In 1796, when a new preacher had been chosen, Roelofs was asked to confirm him as elder. On this occasion Roelofs presented the preacher, Reinder Pieters Veen, with three questions: (1) whether he considered his choice by the congregation good and in accord with requirements; (2) whether in his preaching he was willing to remain on the foundation of the Old and New Testaments and Anabaptist principles; and (3) whether he was ready to serve the congregation with the signs of the covenant, i.e., baptism and communion. The preacher answered the questions affirmatively and promised, with the help of the Lord, to fulfill these requirements.

In 1802, when an assistant preacher was considered necessary, Roelofs again circulated a document inquiring whether the appointment of a new preacher was considered necessary and how much the members would be willing to contribute to his support. The questions were answered affirmatively and a relatively high sum was collected. When the next pulpit vacancy occurred Roelofs appealed to Professor Hesselink (q.v.), of the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, since they did not want an untrained preacher. In other instances as well, Roelofs took serious interest in the welfare of the congregation, finally as secretary of the church council. In 1806 he and his sister gave the congregation an organ, and in 1816 he enlarged the church building at his own expense.

Roermond, an old city (1951 pop. 22,500) and fortification at the confluence of the Roer with the Maas, in the 16th century a part of the duchy of Gelre (q.v.), today belonging to the Dutch province of Limburg (q.v.), has been a Roman Catholic bishop's see since 1569. It is not known when Anabaptism arose in and around Roermond, but by 1540 Gillis van Aachen (q.v.) was preaching here. About 1545 Menno Simons had come by boat to Roermond from Visschersweert. Persecution of the Anabaptists set in only gradually. The court of Gelderland (q.v.) then moved to Venlo to cope better with the situation, and upon receiving a report from a commissar sent to Roermond moved into that city. Already at the end of July 1551 (not 1550) Tijs van Lind (q.v., more correctly Thys van Lin, but also Thijs Hille or Thijs op den Bergh) was burned here at the stake. Two other Anabaptists recanted. Heresy and persecution continued in this area. Many Anabaptists of Roermond are reported to have settled in the Wasenberg (q.v.) district. A report from Roermond dated 1565 mentions the wife and children of Tys van Lind, and also a weaver Lenart Boymers as having Anabaptist leanings. In that year the Anabaptists held meetings in or near the city attended at times by 100 persons. At these meetings Teuwalde (Theobald of Worms? Theodor was an elder of Worms; see Farwendel) and Henrich of Cologne, both about fifty years old, are reported to have preached. Hence it is probable that there was at this time a congregation in Roermond; but since nothing more is known about it, it likely died out soon after these events.

Roes(s)elare (Roulers), a town in the Belgian province of West Flanders, in which, according to information given by the Inquisitor Titelman (q.v.), there were Mennonites in 1561. Concerning the history of the Mennonites in this town not much is known. There was a congregation here in 1545, for in that year its deacons signed a letter written by Adriaen van Kortrijk (q.v.) to the Mennonite congregation at Antwerp. In 1556 Elder Jacob de Rore (q.v.) preached in Roesselare. After 1561 there is no evidence of the presence of Mennonites in Roesselare. It is possible that the congregation was wiped out in that year by Titelman. (Verheyden, "Mennisme in Vlaanderen," manuscript.)

Roeters, a Dutch Mennonite family, probably from Emmerich, Germany (a Pauwels Roeters was a cloth merchant there about 1650), found at Amsterdam since the early 17th century. One branch of the Roeters family belonged to the Old Frisian Mennonite and later to the Zon (q.v.) congregation. Another branch was Lamist (q.v.); one of these was Abraham Roeters (Roeters), a deacon of the Lamist congregation in 1667, who also took part in the meetings of the Collegiants (q.v.) and was a warm supporter of Pastor Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.). A number of other members of the Roeters family served as deacons of the Amsterdam Lamist church.

A lateral branch of this family is the Roeters van Lennep family, whose progenitor was Jacob Roeters van Lennep (1740-1808), the son of David van Lennep and Perina Roeters. He was a deacon of the Amsterdam congregation, as was also his grandson Herman Christiaan Roeters van Lennep (1820-79).

Rogge, a Dutch Mennonite family, found at Zaandam, Dutch province of North Holland. During the 17th and 18th centuries the Rogge family was outstanding in the area along the Zaan River in shipbuilding. Others were whalers or in other industries (lumber dealers and paper manufacturers). Jan Lijns Rogge (d. Feb. 9, 1759) was a merchant and shipowner at Zaandam and from 1721 until his death also a preacher of the Frisian Mennonite congregation of West Zaandam. He was well educated, though not specifically trained for the ministry. He knew many languages. In co-operation with the preachers Adriaan Loosjes (q.v.) of the Zaandam Nieuwe Huys congregation and Marten Schagen (q.v.) of Utrecht he translated the works of Josephus from Latin into Dutch.

Some members of the Rogge family served the West Zaandam Frisian congregation as deacons. Adriaan Rogge (c1735-1815), also a deacon of this church, was one of the leaders in the meetings held regularly in the church on Sunday evening during the winter, in which the Bible was explained both by the preachers and the lay members of the congregation, and in which every brother of the church was entitled to a free expression of his thought.

Grietje Rogge, who died unmarried in 1828, willed her considerable fortune to the Frisian Mennonite congregation of West Zaandam. A branch of this Rogge family was found at Amsterdam as early as 1690. vbZ.

Röggénacher, Anthoni, a furrier of Schwyz, Switzerland, and his wife Dorothea were among the members of the first Anabaptist congregation at Zürich (q.v.) in 1525-26. Roggenacher, who was baptized by Blaurock (q.v.) on Feb. 26, 1525, had given 100 crowns to the church, "that there might be no want." Interrogated concerning this gift he declared before the government officials that it was not his view that the believers should hold their property in common (das guot zuosammen schützen). In March 1526 he was in prison at Zürich with Felix Manz (q.v.) and others, but they escaped. Probably he was soon rearrested and recanted. (TA Zürich, passim.) vbZ.

Roggeveen, a Dutch Mennonite family, found from the 17th century in some country churches of the province of North Holland, now spread all over the Netherlands. Members of this family have served as deacons in many congregations. C. M. Roggeveen, of Blaricum, has been secretary of the Dutch Mennonite Missions Association since 1952. vbZ.

Rohrbach, a southern suburb of Heidelberg, Baden, Germany, where there were Anabaptists from the Reformation to the Thirty Years' War, and again since that war. About 1564 Georg Hailmann preached Anabaptist doctrine in the fields and elsewhere to numerous followers. About 1596 the Protestant pastor at Rohrbach wrote that the Anabaptists were increasing very rapidly, whereupon the Land-schreiber at Heidelberg received orders to investigate the matter, and, if possible, to arrest the leader. In 1605 "only one poor woman" is named as being suspect of Anabaptism; the rest had "partly died off, partly been converted, and had partly gone to Moravia."

It is worthy of note that after the Thirty Years' War it was at Rohrbach that the Anabaptist-Mennonites again found a gathering point. Throughout the 18th century the government lists of Mennonites mention Mennonites at Rohrbach. Some of the family names were Fellmann, Bühler, Stauffer, and Lehman, which are still found among the Mennonites of Baden and the Palatinate. There are today no Mennonites in Rohrbach. G.H.

Rohrbach, a small village in the Palatinate, Germany, situated near Kaiserslautern, between Sembach (q.v.) and Wartenberg (q.v.). Anabaptists were tolerated here even before the Thirty Years' War under Kolb von Wartenberg. An official report of July 25, 1605, says, "The deceased Konrad Kolb did not keep his agreement not to admit other Anabaptists after the death of the three living there then. In Rohrbach on the Kolb estate there is still an old Anabaptist, Hans Gramm, a miller with five sons, who have their meeting at Frankenstein; outwardly their attitude is friendly and neighborly, but they mislead the members of the parish who are employed in their service."

At Rohrbach there is still a Mennonite family, whose forefathers, however, came from Switzerland after the Thirty Years' War. G.H.

Rohrer, a Mennonite (MC) family name, meaning "inhabitant of the swamp land," originating in the Swiss Emmental. Gertrud Rohrer and Margreth Rorer, both farmers' wives, are named as early as 1529 as Mennonites. Anna Rohrer, of Habstetten, arrested in 1567 but released after recanting, was apprehended again in 1571; she was tried on Nov. 27, 1571, at Bern and gave interesting information concerning the congregational life of the Swiss Mennonites. Notwithstanding severe torture she refused to give the Bernese officials any information on other members of the church.

Among the Swiss Mennonites emigrating to the Netherlands in 1711 there was Barbara Rohrer (b. 1671), of Bollingen, the wife of the Reformed Veits Sagimann. She died on the journey at Amsterdam. In the 1690's some Rohrers emigrated to Alsace (q.v.) and from there c1732 to America.

The first Rohrer members to sail the Atlantic were Johannes and Johann Gottfried, who came Sept. 11, 1732. Johannes married Elizabeth Snively in 1735, settling in East Lampeter Twp., Lancaster Co., Pa. He had seven sons and a daughter, hence the name soon spread. A grandson Henry Rohrer (1784-1840) went to the Shenandoah Valley, Va.; a second grandson, Isaac Rohrer (1787-1840), located near Canton, Ohio, and another, Abraham Rohrer, an ordained preacher (1788-1878), moved to Medina County, Ohio, where he became bishop. Among the ordained men in Lancaster Conference were Ephraim Rohrer (1811-91) of Manor, John Rohrer (1827-1908) of East Petersburg, and Israel D. Rohrer. Michael Rohrer (1816-93), a bishop at Canton, Ohio, 1865-93, and Samuel D. Rohrer (1879-1955), a preacher of Wadsworth, Ohio, are among the ordained Rohrers. Hinke mentions thirteen Rohrer immigrants, but Johannes is the only one known to the Mennonite church. I.D.L., vDZ.

Rohrerstown Mennonite Church (MC), located 3 miles northwest of Lancaster, Pa., a member of the Lancaster Conference, started at Abbeyville about 1750 with Bishop Benjamin Hershey (q.v.), three Hans Brubachers, Peter Swarr, and others on the land immediately west of Hickory Town, now Lancaster. In 1791 they moved on Brubaker land, north of Rohrerstown, where a beautiful cemetery still marks the spot. After 63 years a new meetinghouse was placed on the same site. In 1895 a brick church was built on the third site south of the square in Rohrerstown, 50 x 75 ft. This building was completely renovated in 1955-56. These churches have been the scene of the spring sessions of the Lancaster Mennonite Conference from time immemorial until 1953, when it was first held at East Petersburg. This was the home of two bishops named Benjamin Hershey, Bishops Jacob and John Brubaker, Preacher John K. Brubaker, and John Shenk. It is a part of the Rohrerstown-Millersville circuit and in recent years most of the ministers were from the Millersville area. The membership in 1957 was 173, with Christian K. Lehman as bishop, Jacob G. Hess, J. Herbert Fisher, and Paul H. Gochbauer as ministers. I.D.L.

Rohrhof, an estate in the district of Schwetzingen, Baden, Germany, about 8 miles east of Mannheim, was formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation, usually called Rohrhof-Bruchhausen. A list of 1731 reports that the congregation consisted of 16 families and had Jost Eschbacher of Eppelheim (?) and Jakob Fälman of Bruchhausen as preachers, and Christian Neukomm of Rohrhof as deacon. Jakob Fellmann and his son (?) Jakob Fellmann, the latter from 1765, were its elders in the 18th century. In 1822 the congregation numbered 57 members, 22 of whom lived at Rohrhof. After the emigration of most of the Rohrbach Mennonites to America in the 1830's, meetings were held only at Bruchhausen and by 1840 the congregation of Rohrhof had disappeared. Rolette County (N.D.) Old Order Amish Settlement, now extinct. In the spring of 1894 four Amish families and an unmarried man left their homes in Lagrange County, Ind., and moved to Rolette County, N.D.—John D. Bontrager, Rudolph A. Yoder, Joni Hershberger, Moses H. Hochstetler, and John A. Yoder. Four of these soon left the community. In 1895-1900 a number of Amish came to North Dakota, among them Eli J. Bontreger, who had been ordained in Indiana, until by 1900 there were some fifty families located there. Ministers ordained there were Eli D. Weirich 1895, Moses S. Miller 1907, Eli N. Hochstetler 1900, Reuben L. Bontrager 1901, Daniel J. Miller 1902, Moses M. Yoder and Rudolph A. Yoder 1903, Jacob Graber 1907. In June 1901 Eli J. Bontreger was ordained bishop, but moved to Wisconsin in 1910. By that time a number of families including some of the ministers had moved away. Other ordinations were as follows: Abraham Gingerich 1910, Jacob Graber (d. 1921), bishop 1913; Abraham Gingerich (d. 1930), bishop 1922; John C. Gingerich was ordained 1930; Mahlon Yoder 1932, bishop 1935; and Amos Graber 1937. About 1930 Dan Coblentz, a deacon, moved in from Montana. The other ministers all moved away. Until 1938 the former bishop Eli J. Bontreger returned occasionally to help in the church. After 1938 conditions arose that caused more and more families to leave; in 1948 preaching services were discontinued. E.J.B.

Rolfe (Iowa) Amish Mennonite settlement, now extinct, was established in Pocahontas County in 1897-98, when families from Illinois and Minnesota located near the town of Rolfe. Among the family names were Good, Zimmerman, Miller, Horsch, and Shantz. Sunday school was held regularly in a schoolhouse on Joseph Good's farm, 3½ miles northwest of Gilmore City, but there was never an organized church, although ministers from Henry County, Iowa, preached there occasionally. The first family left the community in 1902 and the last one perhaps thirty years later. M.G.

Romanovka, a Mennonite village name found in the Russian settlements of Ignatyev and Olgino, Ukraine; Orenburg and Auli Ata, Central Asia (see Villages). C.K.

Romanovka, a village near Olgino (q.v.), province of Stavropol in the foothills of the Caucasian Mountains, Russia, was established in 1895 by fifty families of the Temple Church (q.v.) who had previously resided at Orbelianovka (q.v.) near Tempelhof. The Romanovka Temple followers were of Württemberg separatistic background and not Mennonites like those of Olgino. C.K.

Romanovka Mennonite Church, located near Aulie-Ata, Central Asia, was organized in 1884 under the leadership of Abraham Peters (q.v.) by a group who had left the Molotschna settlement in the Ukraine to meet Christ at His second coming in Central Asia. Most of the settlers of Aulie-Ata (q.v.), which was founded in 1812, had come from the Molotschna. Peters was succeeded as leader by Johann Regehr (q.v.). In 1905 Regehr was assisted by the following ministers: Hermann Epp, Franz Abrams, Gerhard Kopper, Hermann Wall, Kornelius Wall, and Jakob Hamm. At that time the total membership of the church was 406, of whom 196 were baptized. Before World War I some of the members came to America, settling in the Newton, Kan., and Beatrice, Neb., areas. According to a report published in Unser Blatt (1925) the congregation was also known as the Köppental Mennonite Church, and had a membership of 197 in 1925. By that time the congregation had introduced baptism by immersion. In addition to this congregation there was at Aulie-Ata the Gnadental Mennonite Brethren Church and the Nikolaipol Free Church. Rombout Smit, an Anabaptist martyr: see Rommecken.

Römer, Hans, an Anabaptist of Hesse (q.v.), Germany, a native of Eisenach in Thuringia, a furrier by trade, at first a follower of Thomas Müntzer (q.v.), was expelled from his native town for participating in the Peasants' War; leaving his wife behind, he began a life of wandering. With his fellow Anabaptists, Christoph Peisker (q.v.), Volkmar Fischer (q.v.), and Christoph von Meissen (q.v.), he was an unusually successful propagandist for the Anabaptist cause. After Müntzer's death he attached himself entirely to the peaceful Anabaptists. In August 1534 he was taken prisoner in Göttingen. By recanting he escaped a martyr's death, and was probably punished with a prison term. (Wappler, Thüringen, 40 ff.; ML III, 531.)

Rommecken, an Anabaptist martyr, who was burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, in 1555. His name is found in hymn No. 16, "Aenhoort God, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), of the Lietboeckken. Van Braght's short account in the Martyrs' Mirror, which states that he died valiantly, follows the information given in the Offer. The exact date of the execution and a number of details about this martyr have been published by P. Génard in the Antwerpsch Archieven-blad. His official name was Rombout Smit, and he was a native of Antwerp, by trade an engraver on glass. He was a master craftsman and from 1543 a member of the painters' guild of St. Luke. He was burned on the market place of Antwerp on Dec. 10, 1555. vdZ.

Ro(o)leeuw, a Mennonite family of Amsterdam, Netherlands. Anthony Rooleeuw is found there in 1625 as a deacon of the (Groningen) Old Flemish congregation. But most of the members of the Rooleeuw family were somewhat liberal, and belonged to the Waterlander Toren (q.v.) congregation, and after the merger of this congregation with the Lamist church, in 1668, to the United Lam and Toren congregation.

Isaac Jacobsz, b. about 1600 at Amsterdam, was a son of Jacob Theunisz (q.v.) and a brother of Anthoni Jacobsz (q.v.) Roscius and Lambert Jacobsz (q.v.). He married Itien Reiniersdochter and adopted the family name of Rooleeuw (after the house in which his father lived, which had the sign of a red lion—Roode Leeuw). He had a silk business and was a member of the Waterlander congregation.

Isaac's youngest brother was Jacobus Rooleeuw (c1605-70), who was a lay preacher of the Waterlanders. The years of his service are uncertain; he is said to have been called to the ministry in 1628, but he was definitely appointed in 1638, in which year he, however, requested some delay. In 1647 and in 1652 he was at any rate actually serving. By trade he was a dyer and cloth merchant. He married Catharina Hooghsaet (q.v.), usually called Trijn Jacobs, whose portrait was painted by Rembrandt (q.v.) in 1657. Like his father Jacob Theunisz he was a friend of the poet Joost van den Vondel (q.v.). He seems to have been a man of somewhat advanced ideas.

Some members of the Rooleeuw family served as deacons in the Waterlander congregation and also later in the Lamist church. Among these was Anthony Rooleeuw (d. 1700), a son of Isaac Jacobsz and married to Cornelia Block; he was a leading textile merchant; in 1672 he was delegated with three other deacons of the Amsterdam congregation to visit the Swiss refugees in the Palatinate, Germany, to investigate their living conditions. Both he and his wife participated in the Collegiant (q.v.) movement and attended the Collegiant meetings, which were for some time held in his home on the Keizersgracht.

To this family also belonged Abraham Rooleeuw, also a son of Isaac Jacobsz, b. c1636 at Amsterdam, d. there in 1693, married to Elisabeth van Alderwerelt, of an old Mennonite family. Abraham Rooleeuw, a wealthy man who conducted a textile business, was a member of the Mennonite church, but his sympathies were largely with the Collegiants, whose meetings were for some time held at his house. In 1675 he was one of the founders of the Oranjeappel (q.v.) Collegiant orphanage, to which he contributed a large sum of money.

Reinier Rooleeuw (Amsterdam, 1627-84), also a son of the above Isaac Jacobsz, unmarried, was a physician at Amsterdam. He was an interested participant in the Collegiant meetings and also promoted the founding of the Oranjeappel orphanage. He is particularly to be mentioned here for a number of his writings, including De Schat der Ziele ofte Begeerden (Amsterdam, 1678; 3d ed. 1684), which was illustrated with the oldest known engravings of Jan Luyken (q.v.), and a songbook entitled Schriftuurlyke Gezangen, gerijmt en op nieuwe Zangwijzen gesteld (four editions, 1681, 1686, 1702, 1725, all at Amsterdam). A number of hymns of this songbook were included in the Mennonite hymnal Liederen en Gezangen (Haarlem, 1713). For the Stichtelyke Rijmen by D. R. Camphuysen (q.v.) Reinier Rooleeuw composed new melodies (editions Rotterdam 1688, Amsterdam 1690, Rotterdam 1702, 1713, 1737, and 1759; besides these a few editions without place or date of publication). He also translated the New Testament from Greek into Dutch (published after his death, Amsterdam, 1684). Kühler believed that Reinier Rooleeuw was influenced by the Racovian Catechism (q.v.) of the Socinians (q.v.). vbZ.

Ro(o)man, Gillis (d. c1610), a printer of Haarlem, Holland, who printed a number of Mennonite books, particularly letters and confessions of the martyrs. Probably as early as 1577 he printed (and published?) Sommige Belydingen . . . by Reyts Aysesz (q.v.). In 1579-88 he printed Martelaersbrieven, a collection of letters written by martyrs, which included letters by Hendrick Alewijnz (q.v.), Jacob de Keersmaecker (de Rore, q.v.), Joost Verkindert (q.v.), Thijs Joriaensz (q.v.), and Jan Woutersz van Cuyck (q.v.). In 1588 he published Tgetuygenisse ende de naeghelaeten Schriften van Christiaen Rijcen (Christiaan de Rijcke, q.v.). Some of this material was printed in the Dutch martyr books, including van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror. Gillis Rooman was probably also the printer of the "Schottland Bible" (q.v.) for Krijn Vermeulen (q.v.) at Danzig in 1598.

It is not known whether or not Gillis Rooman was a Mennonite. His son and successor Adriaen Rooman obviously was not, for in 1617 he printed the second edition of the Dutch translation of Heinrich Bullinger's (q.v.) book, supplemented by Gerardus Nicolai (q.v.), Teghens de Wederdooopers, which violently attacks the Mennonites. vbZ.

Roos, a common Dutch family name. There have been a number of Mennonite families with this name, some apparently unrelated; nearly all have died out.

A branch of the Roos family was found at Middelie and Edam in the province of North Holland. Dirk Cornelisz Roos (d. 1729) was a preacher in the Frisian congregation at Edam in 1724-29, and Pieter Cornelisz Roos in the Waterlander congregation of Wormer-Jisp in the early 18th century.

Other branches were found at Amsterdam, Haarlem, Groningen, Harlingen, Workum, and Sneek. The Haarlem branch had probably come from Flanders, Belgium, in the early 17th century (see Roose). A part of the Amsterdam family seems to have been related to this Haarlem branch. Another part of the Amsterdam family, as well as those in Groningen, Harlingen, Sneek, and Workum, seems to have had a common progenitor, Harke Roos, who lived in Workum, Friesland, about 1600. His descendants living in the last four cities were usually in business, such as lumber. Most of the Workum Roos family in the 17th and 18th centuries were shipowners. Some of them, e.g., Jelle Sipkes Roos (d. 1789), a deacon of the Workum Mennonite congregation, were very wealthy. Epke Sipkes Roos, b. 1702 at Workum, d. 1794 at Sneek, probably a brother of Jelle, founded a fund for the training of young men of the congregations of Sneek, Workum, and Grouw for the ministry at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary. Other members of the Roos family at Sneek were among the last members of the conservative Old Flemish congregation.

At Amsterdam some of the Roos families were members of the Lamist congregation and Collegiants (q.v.) at the same time. Others belonged to the conservative Old Frisian "Arke Noë" congregation; their descendants joined the Lamists (q.v.) about 1730.

Some branches of the Roos family, especially that of Haarlem, may have been related to the Mennonite Roosen (q.v.) family. Members of this family occasionally spelled their names Ro(o)se or Ro(o)sen; but hasty conclusions must be avoided, for the spelling of Dutch family names was very slovenly, often as late as the 19th century.

A Mennonite de Roos family is still living at Staveren, Friesland. vbZ.

Roose (Rose, Ro(o)sen, Rooze), a Mennonite name found in Flanders, Belgium, and after their emigration because of persecution, in Holland. Gilles (q.v.) Rooze, of Bellegem near Kortrijk, died as a Mennonite martyr at Brugge, Belgium, in 1568. In 1583

Vincent Rooze, a Mennonite citizen of Gent, Belgium, when this town was under a (temporary) Calvinist government, was banished forever, because he had refused to swear an oath of allegiance, professing that his faith forbade him to swear an oath. From the early 17th century the Roose family, sometimes spelling their name Roos, no doubt having emigrated from Flanders, were found among the members of the Mennonite Flemish congregations of Leiden and Haarlem, and soon after also of Amsterdam. Jan Rose (Roose) was a preacher of the Leiden Flemish church from shortly after 1600 until at least 1640. He was extremely conservative, and with some adherents, called Jan Rosensvolk (q.v.), split off from the main Flemish church. In 1669 a Samuel Rose is mentioned as a member of the Mennonite congregation of Rotterdam. Among the Mennonites at Königsberg, Prussia, were Johann Roos(e) and his son Cornelius Rose (b. 1753), both brandy distillers, mentioned in the reports of the city in 1751 and 1809 respectively. Whether some of these Rooses were related or not with the Hamburg Roosen (q.v.) family could not be ascertained. vñZ.

Roosen, a prominent German Mennonite family attached since 1532 to the Anabaptist movement. Its progenitor Coord Roosen (1495-*c*1533) joined the Anabaptists in his home town of Korschbroich in the duchy of Jülich-Cleve, Germany, and fled to Holstein with his four children when persecution set in. He settled in the village of Steinrade near Lübeck and supported his family by farming and manufacturing gunpowder. His fifth son, Gerlinck (Geerlinck, Geerling), born in 1532 in Korschbroich soon after the flight to Holstein, followed the family to Holstein in 1554 when his mother died. By that time his father was also dead. In 1566 Geerlinck leased the farm Holskamp near Lübeck, united with the Lübeck or Fresenburg Mennonite congregation, and in 1565 married Elisabeth von Sintern. He without doubt met Menno Simons, who was living at Fresenburg. He died in 1611. Geerlinck's oldest son and then his oldest grandson leased the farm Holskamp after him. His fourth son, Paul (1582-1649), married to Janneken Quins, settled in Altona in 1611 as a tanner and leather dealer became quite well-to-do, and acquired considerable property, which the Count of Schauenburg placed at the disposal of Mennonites, Reformed, and other victims of persecution, and which was called the "Freiheit." The congregation was at that time known as Flemish, since it was largely composed of Mennonite immigrants from Flanders. Later the congregation called itself the United Congregation of Flemish, Frisians, and High Germans, toward the end of the 17th century "Mennonisten," and one hundred years later "Mennoniten." Paul Roosen became a deacon in this congregation. He placed a building at its disposal for use as a meetinghouse, which the congregation later bought. On this site the congregation built a church in 1674, and after the razing of Altona by the Swedes in 1714, another church, which was used until within the 20th century. Of Paul Roosen's sons, Gerrit Roosen (q.v.), the oldest, became the most important member of the Roosen family. His brother Herman (1627-96), married in 1657 to Maria Stockmann who was an important merchant in Hamburg, was also a deacon, and for a short time a preacher as well. Herman's daughter Anna (1670-1714) married Gabriel Otto Rahusen, a well-known Mennonite merchant of Hamburg, in 1695.

In the following century two of Gerrit's grandsons, Berend and Salomon Roosen, were deacons in the Altona congregation. Berend Roosen (1705-88), married to Elisabeth Kramer, became the greatest merchant of the family and one of the greatest of Hamburg. He lived at 3 Vorgesetztenstrasse, in a house built by Sonnin, the architect of the Michaeliskirche in Hamburg. He owned about twenty ships. A major part of his business was Greenland shipping and whaling, which was engaged in by most Mennonite merchants of the late 17th century and all of the 18th. He owned a wharf on the Reiherstieg, a canal which connected Hamburg with the Elbe. Salomon Roosen (1717-95), married to Sara Koopman, was likewise a wealthy merchant of Hamburg. The business of the brothers was carried on for several generations by their heirs, many of whom served the congregation as deacons. Roosen Bridge was named for Berend.

In the next generation, which included the trying period of the French occupation, two Roosens were deacons in the Altona congregation: Hermann Roosen (1778-1853) and Berend Roosen (1757-1820), both merchants. The latter was married to Elisabeth de Vosz. In the next generation, which experienced the great Hamburg fire, five Roosens were deacons: Berend Roosen (1778-1853), Hermann Roosen (1786-1864), B. Paulus Roosen (1792-1875), Salomon Roosen (1793-1863), and Berend Roosen (1795-1860). In the second half of the 19th century there were again several deacons of the Roosen family: Johannes Roosen (1823-1907), the architect B. Otto Roosen (1832-1912), and the shipper Berend Roosen (1835-87). Of special importance to the congregation was Berend Carl Roosen (q.v.), a preacher. The 20th century also lists two Roosens as deacons of the Mennonite congregation of Hamburg: the merchant brothers Paul Roosen (1867-1907) and Hermann Roosen (b. 1861).

Government positions were not accepted by the Mennonites of the 17th and 18th centuries. Article 28 of the Glaubenslehre der wahren Mennoniten (Hamburg, 1776) by Cornelis Ris (q.v.) is an express warning on this point. But in the progressive 19th century men of the Roosen family accepted honorary positions in the government, served as members of the popular "Bürgerschaft," and in 1890 the merchant Rudolf Roosen (1830-1907) was chosen senator of the Free City of Hamburg. In 1700 a Paul Roosen and his wife Anna, Mennonites of Hamburg, leaving Altona on March 5, 1700, emigrated to Germantown, Pa., but soon after returned to Hamburg. No member of the Roosen family born since 1901 is now a Mennonite. G.A.R.

Roosen, Berend Carl (1820-1904), a Mennonite minister of Hamburg, Germany. After the completion of his theological studies he was chosen as pastor of his home church, the Hamburg-Altona congregation, on Oct. 12, 1845, serving for nearly sixty years until his death. Roosen is said to have been a man of short stature with a kind face and vivid eyes. He was a man of sincere, moderate, somewhat liberal convictions. The long period of his service was one of great calm. Materially the church prospered and its spiritual life also flourished under Roosen's intelligent leadership. Roosen maintained friendly connections with the Lutheran pastors of Hamburg and Altona and enjoyed their high regard. He was active in many areas of church life, including home missions. In his honor the meetinghouse of the home mission society organized by Wichern, which was located in the section of Hamburg known as Winterhude, was named the Roosenhaus. He also was much interested in the foreign Mennonite missions, vigorously supporting the Dutch Mennonite Missions Association (q.v.) at Amsterdam, of which he was a trustee. He died at Hamburg on Dec. 20, 1904.

Roosen published a biography of Menno Simons: Menno Symons den evangelischen Gemeinden geschildert (Leipzig, 1848); his biography of his ancestor Gerrit Roosen (q.v.) appeared in 1854 at Hamburg: Gerhard Roosen weiland Prediger der evangelischen Mennoniten-Gemeinde zu Hamburg und Altona, geb. 1612, gest. 1711, geschildert. His Geschichte der Mennoniten-Gemeinde zu Hamburg und Altona I and II (Hamburg, 1886, 1887) is the product of serious historical study. In 1893 he wrote a history of his family, which was published by his daughter after his death: Geschichte unseres Hauses (Hamburg, 1905). A sermon of his, Neujahrspredigt gehalten am 1. Jan. 1886, was published in the Mennonitische Blätter of 1884, No. 4. vdZ.

Roosen, Gerrit (Gerhard; he signed one of his writings as Geerritt Roosen), b. at Altona, near Hamburg, Germany, on March 8, 1612, d. there Nov. 20, 1711, a wealthy businessman; one of the industries in which he was dominant was whaling in the waters of Greenland. He lived on Blömken Street in Hamburg. In 1640 he married Maria (Mayken) Amoury, the daughter of the Mennonite deacon and merchant Hans Amoury. His grandmother had had personal contact with Menno Simons. Through his life of nearly a century Gerrit Roosen spent much of his time, devotion, and money for the Mennonite congregation of Hamburg-Altona. He was chosen as deacon in 1649 and as preacher in 1660. For 50 years he served as preacher and from 1664 as elder, delivering over 700 sermons, and defending his flock in all internal controversies and against all attacks by the Lutheran clergy. At the age of 96 he still administered communion. He began a church record of Hamburg-Altona in 1650 and continued it until he was 88 years old. Besides caring for his own congregation, he gave much attention to the brotherhood in general, traveling through Holstein and the Netherlands and in 1676 visiting the churches in Prussia and Poland with Preacher Jan Sibes Potbacker of Harlingen. During their stay of 42 days they visited the congregations of Orloff, Nieschewski, Montau, Kassou(?), Lunau, Markushof, and Danzig. In all these congregations they administered communion and in some of them they baptized. Roosen was interested in the difficulties of the oppressed Mennonites in Switzerland and the fate of the refugees in the Palatinate. He seems to have promoted the idea of colonizing the Swiss Mennonites in Prussia.

Roosen was a man of deep piety and moderate views. He preached in the Dutch language, but gave his catechetical instruction in German. He published a catechism, Christliches Gemüths-Gespräch von dem geistlichen und seligmachenden Glauben (1st edition 1702; it went through at least 22 editions, from 1857 also in English; see Christliches Gemüths-Gespräch). It was much used in the congregations of Germany as late as the 19th century. He also published a defense of Mennonitism, which had erroneously been accused of Münsterite tenets. This book bears the title Unschuld und Gegen-Bericht der Evangelischen Tauff-gesinneten Christen, so Mennonisten genandt werden (Ratzeburg, 1702). Parts of this book were published in the Dutch language in Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis III. This same volume also contained a confession of faith in twelve articles drawn up by Roosen from the Dutch Algemeene Belydenissen (q.v.). Besides this Roosen published Predigt . . . gehalten am Sonntage nach Ostern in der Tauffgesinneten Gemeine (zu Altona) (Ratzeburg, 1702).

Roosen retired in 1708. On his 98th birthday he presented a manuscript to his relatives and the ministers of the Hamburg-Altona Mennonite congregation, a kind of spiritual testament, in which he rendered an account of his church leadership. Unable to write because of poor vision he dictated it to a friend. This writing was also reproduced by Schijn-Maatschoen, Geschiedenis III.

Roosen made several liberal endowments to the congregation, but he did not forget his home town, partly financing, for example, the tower of St. Michael's church (Lutheran) at Hamburg.

Ro(o)sevelt, Hendrik van, was a Mennonite elder in Flanders, Belgium. Concerning his life and work little is known. In 1566, probably shortly after Easter, on the invitation of the Mennonite emigrants from Flanders to the Dutch province of Friesland, he went to Friesland and stayed in Harlingen or Franeker until August 1566. The Flemish had invited him to help in settling their discord with the Mennonites of Friesland, who had received them kindly but soon objected to some differences in the manner of dress and living. Van Roosevelt tried to mediate, but he showed partiality to the Flemish. The discord culminated in a schism and the Frisian Mennonites were banned by Dirk Philips; then Hendrik van Roosevelt likewise banned the Frisians. In 1568 van Roosevelt stayed in Emde, East Friesland, and in the fall of 1569 he was sent with Jan van Ophoor (q.v.), an elder of Emde, and a certain Laurens, an elder at Franeker, to Cleve to arbitrate a dispute in that congregation. At that point van Roosevelt disappears from history. He probably returned to Flanders, where under his influence the congregations, particularly those of Antwerp and Gent, sided with the Flemish party against the Frisians. This Hendrik van Ro(o)sevelt may be the Hendrik (van) Rosenfelt, of Antwerp, who came to Montau (q.v.), West Prussia, in 1586, and was the progenitor of the Mennonite Rosenfeld (q.v.) family. vbZ.

Rosanna of the Amish (319 pp.), a semifictionized biography, written and published in 1940 by Joseph W. Yoder, of Huntingdon, Pa., himself a lifelong member of the Mennonite Church (MC), relates the life story of his mother, an Irish Catholic orphan, who was reared in an Old Order Amish home, married a young Amishman, Crist Yoder, and remained a loyal member of the Amish church until her death. The book gives an unusually clear and accurate picture of the brighter side of Amish life and culture. It is frankly autobiographical and contains the name of only one fictitious character, Simon Riehl, who is introduced to describe an Amish excommunication and the consequent "Meidung." Commendable Amish traits, German, perhaps, as well as Amish, receive proper emphasis: honesty, frugality, humility, hard work, joy in the completion of a task well done, friendliness, and neighborliness, all suffused with a deep religious piety. The volume catches with remarkable success the happy, joyous community spirit where interest in the simple, homely virtues and in one another's welfare enables the group to face life with an upward look and a clear conscience. It also records faithfully the religious and cultural practices of the Old Order Amish in Mifflin County, Pa. In spite of evident literary shortcomings the volume deserves the popularity that has made numerous reprintings necessary. The pen sketches by George Daubenspeck add interest and value to the volume. Rosario, Mexico, a former settlement of refugee Mennonites from Russia after World War I, located some miles west of the large Old Colony Mennonite settlement in the state of Chihuahua about 240 miles south of El Paso, Tex. The settlement was made in 1924 on a ranch which, with help of the Mennonite Board of Colonization in the United States, was rented with an option to buy. The original group consisted of 36 families but a number of families joined later. The Rosario settlement effort resulted in failure. Some of the families moved to Irapuato (q.v.) and others who were able to get Mexican citizenship after two years of residence in Mexico emigrated to Canada. Within two years the last of the Mennonite families had left Rosario. J.W.F.

Röschingen in Württemberg, Germany, is named in the Naamlijst of 1775 as a Mennonite congregation with David Musselmann as preacher from 1772. In later issues (1784 ff.) Röschingen is included in a united Willenbach, Prutzenhof(?), Dürrhof, and Röschingen congregation, of which Abraham Zeisset (q.v.), of the Rauhof, was the elder and David (from 1772), Michael (1781), and Christian Musselmann (1783) the preachers. vbZ.

Roseburg (Oregon) Civilian Public Service Unit No. 151 was authorized by Selective Service in December 1945, the last camp approved by this agency. Under Mennonite Central Committee administration, a unit of twenty-four men arrived in Roseburg in January 1946. The men worked in the Roseburg United States Veterans' Hospital, serving the mental patients in this institution, until the close of the unit in December 1946. M.G.

Roseburg Conservative Amish Mennonite Church (independent), Sutherlin, Oreg., was first listed in the 1950 Mennonite Yearbook, with 32 members. In 1953 its name was changed to Pleasant Valley (q.v.), with 17 members; it is one of the "Sleeping Preacher" congregations. M.G.

Rosedale Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, located at Crooked Creek, Peace River District, Alberta, was organized in 1939. Church services began in 1930 with the coming of Gerhard de Veer from Swalwell, Alberta. The first church building of 1931 was followed by another in 1938, built of logs, with room for 150 persons. One minister and two deacons have been ordained in the history of the church. The meetings include weekly Sunday morning services, biweekly Sunday evening services, a monthly Christian Endeavor, and mid-week Bible study. The church in 1957 had a membership of 127; the ministers in charge were Peter I. Thiessen and Alvie Esau. J.T.E.

Rosedale Hutterite Bruderhof of the Schmiedeleut group, located near Mitchell, S.D., was founded by several families from the Milltown Bruderhof, including Joseph Hofer, a minister. In 1904 Paul Gross was chosen as preacher. In 1918 this Bruderhof was sold, and the Brethren moved to Canada and established the Rosedale Bruderhof near Elie, Man. In 1945 Joseph Waldner Sr., with ten families from the Rockport (S.D.) Bruderhof, bought the original Rosedale farm and re-established the Bru-derhof. Joseph A. Waldner, chosen to the ministry in 1950 and ordained in 1957, was the minister in 1958. In 1947 there were 30 baptized members and a total population of 87; in 1958 there were 47 members.

Rosedale Mennonite Brethren Church, located 10 miles west of Bakersfield, Cal., a member of the Pacific District, was organized in November 1911. The church was the host church of the first conference session of the Pacific District in the late fall of 1911. The first pastor of this church was John Boese from Colorado. Ministers who have served this church were John Boese, John Berg, Henry Kohfeld, K. G. Neufeld, J. D. Hofer, H. D. Wiebe, Walter L. Penner, and P. N. Hiebert, who was still serving in 1957, with a membership of 173. The first missionary couple, Mr. and Mrs. Ivan Elrich, of this church were sent to the foreign field in 1955. P.N.H.

Roseland (La.) Mennonite (MC) Church, now extinct, located 70 miles north of New Orleans, was reported in the Herald of Truth of Oct. 1, 1894. Sunday school and church services were held every Sunday. Their first communion service was observed in October 1894. Jonas T. Nice, the minister, was last listed under Louisiana in the 1899 Family Almanac. M.G.

Roseland Mennonite Church (MC), located near Roseland, Neb., a member of the Iowa-Nebraska Conference, was organized on March 20, 1880, with 26 members, with Albrecht Schiffler as bishop and Samuel W. Lapp as deacon. A meetinghouse was built about two years later, replaced in 1898 by a new one, at which time the membership numbered 160. Daniel Lapp was ordained bishop. Ministers who have served the congregation are John L. Reasoner, Jonas Nice, Andrew Good, John M. Nune-maker, Abraham Stauffer, Samuel G. Lapp, Noah Ebersole, J. Kore Zook, Edward Diener, and Alton Miller. Missionaries from this church sent to India were Mahlon C. Lapp, Jacob Burkhard, George Lapp, Esther Ebersole Lapp, and Velma Lapp Hostetler. In 1957 the bishop was Peter R. Kennel, and the membership was 17. S.S.B.

Roselawn Mennonite Church (MC), Elkhart, Ind., was established in 1949. It is an unorganized mission congregation under the Prairie Street (q.v.) Mennonite Church. In 1957 it had 52 members, with Verle Hoffman as its pastor. M.G.

Rosemary (Alberta) Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, was organized in 1945. The group had previously been affiliated with the M.B. Church at Gem, Alta. The last leader and minister of the Rosemary church was F. Friesen and the membership was 16; in 1950 it ceased to exist. A.A.T.

Rosenberger, a Mennonite family found largely in southeastern Pennsylvania, especially in the Franconia Conference (MC), and also in the Brethren in Christ Church in Bucks and Montgomery counties, Pa. According to tradition the family came from Zweibrücken, Germany. The first immigrant by this name was Henry Rosenberger Sr. Henry Jr., Benjamin, Daniel, and John Rosenberger are thought to have been his sons; his daughters were Mary and Sarah. John Rosenberger (1724-1818) was a Mennonite trustee in the Lexington congregation of the Franconia Conference. Henrich Rosenberger (1725-1809) was a deacon in the Franconia congregation (MC). John Rosenberger (1790-1883), a son or grandson of the above John, was a Mennonite farmer in Hatfield Twp., Montgomery Co., Pa. One of his sons was John H. Rosenberger (1832-1910), preacher in the Lexington congregation; another son was Henry H. Rosenberger (ordained bishop at the Silverdale, Pa., Brethren in Christ Church in 1886); and a third son was Samuel H. Rosenberger (1836-1918), who helped build the Silverdale Brethren in Christ house of worship in 1883, where he was ordained a deacon in 1886, and a preacher in 1891. Samuel H. Rosenberger had a son Edwin C. Rosenberger (b. 1886), who is also serving as a Brethren in Christ minister in Silverdale and Souderton. Henry B. Rosenberger (1844-1921) was an unusually influential man in the Blooming Glen Mennonite congregation and community; he was ordained preacher in 1885, and bishop in 1895. One of the leaders of the Eastern District Conference (GCM) is Arthur S. Rosenberger, minister in Quakertown, Pa., and sometime president of Bluffton College. The family is also represented in Canada, Virginia, and other areas to which migrations took place from eastern Pennsylvania. J.C.W.

Rosenhof (Rosenort) Evangelical Mennonite Church (Kleine Gemeinde), located near Morris, Man., between the two school districts, formerly villages, Rosenhof and Rosenort, west of the Red River, was founded in 1874 by K. G. immigrants from Russia. Church services were held in the village schools from 1874 until about 1920, when the meetinghouse was erected between the school districts. Jacob B. Kroeker served as bishop 1923-54, followed by P. L. Friesen. The ministers serving in 1957 were Jacob B. Kroeker, Franz B. Kroeker, Cornelius P. Dueck, P. J. B. Reimer, and Frank P. Kroeker; the baptized membership was 501, most of whom were rural people. D.P.R.

Rosenort Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, located 10 miles northwest of Morris, Man., and near the village of Rosenort, was started in 1882 with a membership of 36 as a part of the group that withdrew from the Kleine Gemeinde (q.v.). John Enns was the first residing minister, serving 1882-d. 1917. Other ministers who served were Abr. Klaassen, David Hiebert, and G. K. Goossen (1906-d. 37). Services were held in homes and schoolhouses until the first church was built in 1919. The present church, seating capacity 300, was built in 1949. The present ministers are G. F. Goossen and J. D. Penner, both ordained in 1924, and J. P. Isaac and W. P. Goossen, ordained in 1943. Most members are farmers and are predominantly of Molotschna descent and speak Plattdeutsch in their homes. Church services are now mostly conducted in English. Midweek Bible study and singing meetings are held. Musical instruments are not used. Footwashing is practiced at communion services. The membership in 1958 was 188. J.D.P.

Rosenort Home for the Aged, at Rosthern, Sask., was established in 1944, when Isaac P. Friesen gave his house in Rosthern for this purpose. The Rosenort congregation (GCM) owned another house in Rosthern for the same purpose, in which the boys of the Rosthern Bible Academy lived for a few winters while the Academy girls lived in the Friesen house. In 1945 the house was dedicated as a home for the aged, and was gradually filled with aged persons, who could help themselves. The others were taken into the Invalid Home on the Youth Farm. In 1953 an addition was built to the Rosenort Home, making accommodations for 16 persons. J.G.R.

Rosenort Mennonite Church, a congregation in West Prussia, Germany, originally a part of the Gross-Werder congregation, originated south and east of the town of Tiegenhof (q.v.) through the immigration of Dutch Mennonites, to whom the banking firm of Hans Simon and Steffen Loysen (q.v.) in 1562 granted land near Danzig to be made arable. At first the congregation, belonging to the Flemish wing, was served in communion and baptism by the elders of the Danzig (q.v.) church. After 1639 they chose elders of their own. The first elder was Hans Siemens (d. 1644), chosen on Sept. 22, 1639.

Until the middle of the 18th century the Dutch language was used in the religious services. Their meetings had to be held in their homes, granaries, barns, and sheds. On anniversaries and festive occasions there were sometimes 1,000 persons at a meeting, as in July 1741, when 51 persons were baptized. Not until 1754 did the congregation receive permission to build a church in Rosenort. The first communion service in the new church, held on March 2, 1755, was observed by 1,566 members. By 1787 the congregation had grown to a membership of 1,836. They were almost exclusively farmers, but in 1774 they together owned only 129 Hufen and twelve Morgen of land, or a little more than two Morgen per person.

In order to improve their condition they sent two members to Berlin in 1787, Cornelius Warkentin and Elder Donner, to negotiate with the government concerning their old charter and also to get permission to acquire more land. During their ten weeks in Berlin they found little understanding. Therefore, many families of the West Prussian Mennonites accepted the invitation of Catherine the Great (q.v.) to settle in Russia. The first train of emigrants, 152 families with 919 persons, including 41 families of the Rosenort congregation, gathered on July 28, 1788, for a great farewell service in the Rosenort church. The Mennonite emigration to Russia continued for 50 years and took all the overflow of the West Prussian congregations to the still uncultivated steppes of South Russia (q.v.). How difficult it was for the Mennonites to take up the wanderer's staff is made clear in a petition presented by the Rosenort congregation in 1791, which asks: "Do the king's most loyal subjects not need to fear to leave the land into which we did not push ourselves, but into which our forefathers were invited more than two hundred years ago, the land which our forefathers for the most part made arable?" (Regehr, 6). The name Rosenort was repeated in their new homelands, as in the Molotschna (q.v.), Saskatchewan (q.v.), Manitoba (q.v.), in Mexico (q.v.), and in Paraguay (q.v.).

On Jan. 19, 1812, the church in Rosenort burned down, but was rebuilt and put into service on Nov. 20, 1814. It seated 600. In the fire the church records kept from Nov. 1, 1772, to 1809, were destroyed. Later the record of 1840-55 was lost in a flood. All that remained were the notes of 1810-40 and the record begun in 1857. After 1754 the cemetery around the Rosenort church belonged to Rosenort and after 1883 another was acquired in Zeyersvorderkampen, both of which had a funeral hall. Several times the Rosenort congregation suffered severe damage by floods, e.g., in 1681, 1848, and 1888.

The baptized membership stood at 622 in 1852, 636 in 1882, and 606 in 1887 (plus 335 children); number of souls was 725 in 1928, and about 800 in 1941. The last elders of the congregation were Peter Regier, of Rückenau, preacher 1879, elder 1887, Eduard Dyck, of Tiegenhof, preacher, 1894, elder 1908, and Ernst Regehr, of Rosenort, preacher 1930, elder 1934, who migrated to Uruguay in 1948.

In the last years before the collapse of 1945 the congregation was served by an elder and five preachers, and in 1942 had a membership of 514 besides 291 children, living in 32 villages. The congregation was a member of the Conference of the East German (West Prussian) Mennonite congregations and also of the Vereinigung (q.v.).

On Jan. 24, 1945, the area between the Vistula and the Nogat was evacuated before the oncoming masses of Russians. Four hundred years of history of the settlement and over three hundred years of congregational history found its close on these days. Of the 800 souls in the Rosenberg congregation in 1939 not even 150 announced their arrival in the western zones of Germany and in Denmark in 1947. Many fell in the struggles lasting many years, many froze to death on the flight over snow-covered roads or in the floods of the Baltic Sea, many died of starvation or were killed at home, many lost their lives on the road to Siberia or in hopeless imprisonment.

Rosenort Mennonite Church (GCM), located in the Rosthern district of Saskatchewan, 50 miles north of Saskatoon, began in 1891, when five families came to the prairies at Rosthern. On July 2, 1894, Elder Peter Regier (q.v.), who had come from the Rosenort church in West Prussia the year before, helped the Rosenort Mennonite Church to organize. In 1896 the first Rosenort church was dedicated in Eigenheim, six miles west of Rosthern. It was rebuilt in 1902. The next year the church in Rosthern was built. In 1910 three churches were built: in Aberdeen (on the right side of the South Saskatchewan River), about 25 miles south of Rosthern, and in Laird and Tiefengrund, 13 miles and 18 miles west and northwest of Rosthern. In 1911 Hague, about 14 miles south of Rosthern, built a church. All of these belonged to the Rosenort congregation. In 1913 David Toews (q.v.) was elected as elder. In 1929 Johannes Regier, son of Elder Peter Regier, was elected as elder to help David Toews, who was commonly called bishop, especially by the government and the daily papers. Eigenheim became self-sustaining in 1929. Besides Hague, churches were acquired at Hochfeld and Neuanlage. The church in Hague was rebuilt in 1929. In 1945 a church was built at Hochfeld and in 1946 the old Hague church was moved to Neuanlage. The Osler church, about 10 miles south of Hague (built in 1928), joined the Rosenort church in 1931. In 1932 Saskatoon organized a congregation which joined Rosenort until 1938. Capasin, about 100 miles northwest of Rosthern, built a church in 1933. The Garthland and Horse Lake (about 25 miles north of Rosthern) congregations, which have their own meetinghouses, also belong to Rosenort. In September 1946 Johann G. Rempel was ordained as elder.

In 1954 the Rosenort congregation divided into two parts because of its unwieldy size. The congregations are now known as the Rosenort Mennonite Church (Tiefengrund, Garthland, Capasin, Hague, Hochfeld, Neuanlage, and Aberdeen) with Arthur Regier of Tiefengrund as their elder, and the United Mennonite Church of Saskatchewan (Rosthern, Osler, Laird, and Horse Lake) with Jacob C. Schmidt of Rosthern as elder. They were both ordained at Rosthern by Elder Johann G. Rempel on Aug. 8, 1954. The United Mennonite Church has about 700 members, and the Rosenort Mennonite Church has about 650 members. Assistant ministers of the Rosenort Mennonite Church are Henry T. Klassen (Hague), John Janzen (Neuanlage), Frank Koop (Aberdeen), A. E. Regier (Tiefengrund), J. J. Pauls (Garthland), George Heppner (Capasin), and of the United Church they are Art Friesen (Laird), Willie Janzen (Horse Lake), and J. H. Pauls (Osler). J.G.R.

Rosental Evangelische Mennoniten-Gemeinde, commonly known as Allianz-Gemeinde (q.v.), was organized in Rosental near Chortitza, Ukraine, in the 1920's under the leadership of A. G. Klassen (b. March 12, 1883, d. in exile) and patterned after the Evangelische Mennoniten-Gemeinden (q.v.) elsewhere. This group was characterized by a more tolerant attitude than the Mennonite Brethren toward other Mennonites and a strong evangelistic emphasis. The movement spread into other villages such as Schöneberg, Osterwick, Einlage, and Neuenburg. The Council of Elders (Aeltestenrat) consisted of A. G. Klassen, A. Froese, and B. B. Dyck, who were assisted by the following ministers: J. K. Janzen, P. G. Klassen, Dietrich Klassen, and G. P. Schröder. The group was very active also among the Russian population. A. G. Klassen, B. B. Dyck, and others perished in exile, while other ministers and members of the group found their way to Canada and South America. C.K.

Rossitz, a small market town and manorial estate ten miles west of Brno (q.v.), Moravia. In the 16th century it belonged successively to the noble lords of Pernstein (1522-49), of Lipa (1549-60), and of Zierotin (q.v.) (1560-1628). In 1527 Anabaptists under the leadership of Gabriel Ascherham (q.v.), of Silesia, began to settle there, and in 1529 started a communal Bruderhof in Rossitz where they flourished until they were expelled in 1535. Then they returned to Silesia. In 1527-29 Philip Plener (q.v.), of Baden, and his group, known as the Philippites, also lived in Rossitz together with the Gabrielites, but they separated later and set up their own Bruderhof in Auspitz (q.v.), 12 miles east of Brno. The third group, the Tyroleans, since 1533 called Hutterites (q.v.), settled in Auspitz and Austerlitz (q.v.) but not at once in Rossitz. In 1533 a serious conflict arose between the Hutterites and the two other groups. Ascherham thereupon called a conference of all three groups to Rossitz, which however ended negatively in a complete break of fellowship between these groups, at least for the time being. After the exodus of the Gabrielites and the cessation of persecution about 1536-37, the Hutterites began to settle in Rossitz under the tolerant lords. This Rossitz Bruderhof then existed uninterruptedly until 1622, when Anabaptists were expelled completely from all of Moravia.

According to Beck, Bohemian Brethren (q.v.) or Piccards had also settled in Rossitz, but nothing is known about contacts between Hutterites and Bohemian Brethren. This may be due to two reasons—the language barriers (German and Czech) and the differing genius of the two groups. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 69; Zieglschmid, Chronik; ML III, 549.)

Rossmere Mennonite Mission (MC), in the north-eastern sector of Lancaster, Pa., was opened by David B. Groff in 1935. He with Jere Fenninger, under the East Chestnut Street Mennonite Church, conducted the work in rented quarters until their brick meetinghouse, 30 x 50 ft., on Janet Avenue was dedicated on Jan. 1, 1940. Earl W. Mosemann was ordained as pastor on Dec. 21, 1941, and was followed by Daniel E. Miller, ordained Nov. 3, 1946, who was still serving in 1957, with a membership of 42. I.D.L.

Rossville and Buck Creek (Ind.) Mennonite settlement, now extinct, was located in two distinct districts, one near Rossville and the other near Buck Creek. Their farms were located in the counties of Tippecanoe, Carroll, and Clinton. They were attracted to this area by cheap land and good springs.

The first Mennonites in this area were the brothers John and Christian Zimmerman, who came from Missouri in 1870. Both were ministers. They organized the first congregation of Mennonites, which soon became affiliated with the "Egley-Amish." Other families moving there in the 1870's and 1880's and likely of Amish background were the Schonbecks, Gerbers, Ehresmans, Schrockes, Hirsheys, Gingerichs, and Wises. The Swiss Mennonite settlement in Putnam County, Ohio, contributed a large number of families, including the following names: Amstutz, Mellinger, Basinger, Bucher, Lutz, and Lehmann. Some of these soon left the Mennonite Church and joined the German Reformed Church or Dunkard Church near by. Until 1890 the Mennonite church services were held in the homes. At that time a meetinghouse was erected near Buck Creek on the Chris Schonbeck farm. The membership varied from 30 to 35 in 1906-28. Besides the Zimmerman brothers, other ministers were Christian Gerber, Levi Mellinger, Sam Ehresman, and John Rediger. In 1944 the last church services were held in Buck Creek. In 1941 a Defenseless Mennonite Church was started in Lafayette, some 15 miles away. Most of the families from Buck Creek and Rossville have moved away. Some of the remaining ones worship at Lafayette.

Rosthern, Sask., is a town (pop. 2,000) half way between Saskatoon and Prince Albert. It was started in 1902 by Gerhard Ens; the first settlers were Mennonites. Now it has many nationalities and ten churches, of which the Mennonite church is the largest. Most of the stores are owned by Mennonites, especially Friesens. Rosthern was also the seat of the Canadian Mennonite Board of Colonization 1922-47, the time when David Toews (d. 1946) of Rosthern served as chairman, through which over 20,000 Mennonites were brought into Canada, mostly from Russia, and the seat of Der Bote, which has been printed and published here from the beginning.

Rosthern Bible School dates back to 1932, when it was established as a supplement to the Rosthern Junior College (q.v.), then called the German-English Academy. For the first three years Jacob J. Nickel of Aberdeen taught this school, which had a term of about 5 months (November-March). In later years a month was added. In 1935-49 John G. Rempel served as principal of the Bible School. The number of students rose from about a dozen to over 50. In 1939 the Bible School moved into a separate house. H. T. Klassen is now the principal of the Rosthern Bible School. In 1956 it had 25 students.

Rosthern Junior College dates back to 1905. For many years this school was called the German-English Academy. Its purpose was to keep Mennonitism alive; study of the Bible and of German were to help in achieving this aim. The first meeting was held by Elder Peter Regier, but soon Elder David Toews was the leader in this affair. The opening of the school took place on Nov. 14, 1905. There were 24 students that year. Herman Fast ("with a beard") was the first teacher, then David Toews took the leadership of the school, teaching until 1917, when he resigned to give his time to the alternative service program. Cornelius D. Penner taught in this school and served as principal in 1921-23 and 1925-31. Another teacher was Kornelius G. Toews, in whose time 1938-51 the enrollment of the school went over 150. David Toews (d. 1946) was chairman of the school board until 1944. A new school building was erected in 1910. Lack of money hindered the school for many years. In the summer of 1945 a dormitory with three stories and a basement was built for the girls and shortly afterwards one for the boys. The enrollment in 1957 was well over 100; it had eight teachers, nearly all of them with a B.A. standing. The principal was Elmer Richert. About 70 per cent of the students, boys and girls, live and board at the school. The four grades of high school are taught. J.G.R.

Rostock, a city (pop. 114,869) in Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Germany. The Anabaptist movement found entry to this place very early. Evidently the soil had been prepared by the Bohemian Brethren, who had members living in the city and its vicinity for many years. The pastor of the church of St. Mary and Dr. Johann Oldendorp, the syndicus of the city, were friendly toward the Anabaptists. The mandates of the Hanseatic League were for a while not published. All violent measures were avoided. However, in 1535, Rostock was represented at a conference of Protestant theologians at Hamburg, which stated that God was punishing the world with the Anabaptists and asked the government to make Anabaptism punishable by law.

The idea that Bernhard Rothmann (q.v.) was living in Rostock (derived from a letter written by the council of Löeck to that of Rostock on June 6, 1537) is probably an error. It is more likely that Obbe Philips (q.v.) lived here for a time. This was reported to Johann Gartzten, pastor of the church of St. Peter in Hamburg, by Joachim Kükenbiter, a pastor in Schwerin in 1538, with the information that Philips was trying to lure his brethren in other towns of Mecklenburg to Rostock. Obbe Philips presumably wrote his important confession (Bekentnisse, q.v.) in Rostock. From this place twenty important tracts were sent to the Mennonites in Holland.

On July 28, 1548, the council of Rostock issued a new decree against the Anabaptists. All persons who had come to the city from the Netherlands within the previous four years were required to present to the authorities within eight days a testimonial from their former residence showing that they were not poisoned by the wicked error of Anabaptism and had lived an honest life there. Those who were unable to do this were requested to leave the city and its environs within eight days. From that time nothing more is heard of Anabaptists in Rostock. They may have remained quietly in the city for a long time; a large part of them migrated to Prussia and Lithuania or joined the Lutherans. In 1912 fifteen Mennonites were counted in the city. NEFF.

Rotgans, a Dutch Mennonite family found on the island of Terschelling (q.v.) from the 17th century, and from c1720 also on the island of Ameland (q.v.). They were usually skippers. One of them was Gerit Siebesz Rotgans, of Terschelling, who in 1733 transported a number of Mennonite expellees from Lithuania (q.v.), with their furniture from Danzig to Holland. Theunis Cornelisz Rotgans, also a skipper, was a resident of Königsberg in East Prussia c1800. Both at West-Terschelling and Nes on Ameland some members of this family served as deacons. A noted member of this family is Jacob Wybrands Rogtans (Terschelling, 1859-Baarn, 1948), who studied medicine, practiced in Groningen, thereupon becoming professor of surgery at the Amsterdam University. Some Rotganses moved from Terschelling to Amsterdam c1745, where they were members of the Lamist (q.v.) church. vdZ.

Roth, a Mennonite family name of Swiss origin, found in France and North America. Jakob Rott, a farmer of Bülach, canton of Zürich, and Nesy Rott, of Bipp, canton of Bern, are named among the early Swiss Anabaptists in 1533 and 1538. As early as 1527 Hans Roth preached at Kitzbühel, Austria, and baptized a number of persons at Münichau. Othmar Rot(h), of St. Gall, is the author of hymn No. 53 in the Ausbund (q.v.), composed in 1532. In the 17th century Mennonite Roths were living at Diesbach in the area of Thun, and a Mennonite Rot family in the lower Aargau. Hans Roth was among the Mennonite emigrants to the Palatinate in 1670, and other Roths emigrated from Switzerland to the Alsace at the end of the 17th century. Among the Swiss Mennonites settling in the neighborhood of Groningen, Netherlands, in 1711, were Ulrich Roth, of Diesbach, with his wife and three children, and another Ulrich Roth, a miller of the Emmental, aged 55, with his wife Elsbeth Steyner and four children. In the 18th century a Martin Roth is mentioned, who was a preacher of the congregation at Alwinc (q.v.) in Transylvania, and who under the threats of the Jesuit priest Delphini (q.v.) left the church.

In 1750 the Montbéliard Mennonite church record lists Hans Roth, formerly of Aux Gouttes, later at Exincourt, likely the progenitor of Nicolaus Roth, who married Veronica Zimmerman in Europe and died in 1834, leaving seven children. His widow came to the United States in 1837, probably from Baden, Germany. Several of his children immigrated to America, settling near Hamilton, Ohio, before his widow came to Hamilton in 1837 with the remaining children, several years later moving to Morton, Ill. One daughter, Barbara Roth, who married Joseph Zehr in Europe, settled near Tavistock, Ont. Descendants of Nicholas Roth are found most frequently in central Illinois, since six other children settled in localities of Morton, Groveland, Fairbury, El Paso, and Gibson City, although descendants are scattered throughout the United States. There were in 1955 approximately 2,364 descendants of Nicolaus Roth with approximately 300 bearing the Roth name. Outstanding personalities bearing the family name are Daniel Roth, youngest child of Nicolaus, who served as the minister of the Pleasant Grove (Amish) Mennonite Church at Tremont, Ill., and his grandson Roy Daniel Roth, former pastor of the Pleasant Hill Church at East Peoria, Ill., now president of Hesston College. A Genealogical Study of the Nicolaus and Veronica (Zimmerman) Roth Family (1834-1954), written by Ruth C. Roth and Roy D. Roth, published under auspices of Daniel Roth Family Reunion in 1955, is the first work written regarding the Nicolaus Roth family.

Obituaries in the Herald of Truth and other Mennonite periodicals reveal that Roths have lived in sixteen states and provinces, with Iowa, Ohio, Nebraska, Ontario, Oregon, Pennsylvania, and Illinois leading in this order. These are mostly descendants of many 19th-century immigrants from Europe, who were not necessarily closely related to each other. Paul M. Roth, Mennonite minister of Masontown, Pa., is a grandson of one of these immigrants, Benjamin Roth from Alsace, who settled at Bellefontaine, Ohio. His brother Daniel's descendants live principally in Oregon. Their half brother Joseph settled in Wayne County, Ohio, in 1868, but his descendants live principally in Henry County, Iowa. In 1947 there were 19 Roth Mennonite ministers in North America and Europe, of whom 13 were serving in the Mennonite Church (MC). R.C.R., vDZ.

of the archival documents relating to the Augsburg Anabaptists. (ML III.) NEFF.

Roth, Leonhard, a Hutterite song writer, who was seized with 150 brethren at Steinabrunn (q.v.), Austria, on Dec. 6, 1539, and taken to the Falkenstein castle (q.v.), where they were held for six weeks and subjected to repeated rigorous examination. Thereupon Roth was sent to the galleys at Trieste with ninety of the Brethren; with several others he escaped and returned to Moravia. In the following year (1541) he died at Schackowitz (q.v.). In the Falkenstein prison and in Trieste he wrote three letters to the brotherhood. He also wrote the following three songs: "Ach Gott im höchsten Reiche, Du starker Schirm und Schild" (15 stanzas), "O Gott Vater in Ewigkeit, Dir sei ewig Lob, Ehr bereit" (29 stanzas), "Herr Gott Vater vom Himmel, wir bitten dich gemein" (25 stanzas), called the Steinabrunn hymn. Several stanzas of the first hymn are found in the new German Lutheran hymnal, hymn No. 203. NEFF.

Rothen, David, a schoolteacher and hymn writer of the Palatinate, Germany, stemmed from Switzerland and was received by baptism in the Mennonite congregation at Friedelsheim (q.v.) on May 21, 1830, and then served as a teacher on the Branchweilerhof (q.v.). In 1832 he emigrated to America. Eight of his hymns were adopted into the hymnal of the Mennonites of South Germany. (ML III, 551.)

Rothenburg ob der Tauber, a town (pop. 11,200) in Bavaria, Germany, in which there were a few Anabaptists in the early 16th century. As an imperial city since 1172 it had some rural territory attached to it. Karlstadt's (q.v.) presence here from December 1524 to the end of May 1525 had some influence. Anabaptist preachers and teachers penetrated Rothenburg territory in 1527/28 from near-by Windsheim, among them Georg Nespitzer (q.v.), a weaver of Passau, George Utz, a dyer of Munich, and Marx Maier from Alt-Erlangen. In 1529 several Anabaptists were arrested in Rothenburg—Hans Bassauer, a blacksmith, Hans Hartmann, a tailor, and Christine, the wife of the dyer Veit Merkur. Both men recanted and were expelled. In 1529 Markus Schmidt, the leader of a small Anabaptist congregation in Schmerzbach, a rural village below Rothenburg, was forced to recant but was not expelled. In 1536 the Anabaptist Endres Kentlein (Keller), a citizen of Rothenburg, was arrested and submitted an extensive confession of faith (16 printed pages), but finally swore the required oath promising to leave and not return (Urfehde). In 1564 the Anabaptist Hans Kress, a brewer, was expelled from the city. Schattemann concludes that the Anabaptist movement never played a major role in Rothenburg, and that there were only scattered individuals of the group. E.C.

Rothenfelder, Jörg Propst (also called Jörg Maler), the compiler and copyist of the recently (1955) discovered Kunstbuch, a codex containing 42 epistles written by members of the Marpeck brotherhood, and a hitherto little-known Anabaptist leader. He became an Anabaptist in 1532 when he was baptized by Sebold Feichter in the home of George Nessler in Augsburg. Feichter's recantation on March 29, 1533, may have had a negative effect on Maler's stability. At any rate the Augsburg Straffbuch shows that on Sept. 18, 1533, Maler also recanted and took an oath (Urfehde), after which he was expelled from the town. It is in this period that a "recantation" by Maler belongs which is now in the Augsburg Archives (III Fasc. No. 24. Ms. Copy from Box Catalogue in Schwenckfelder Library, Pennsburg). In this statement Maler said that he would reply to the five articles submitted to him.

(1) Concerning the place of the external Word Maler cites Romans 10 and says that it refers to both the inner and the outer word; Peter's sermon at Pentecost, Philip's sermon to the Eunuch, and other passages of Scripture show that the inner and the outer word cannot be separated. (2) Concerning infant baptism, he said that under the influence of the Anabaptists he had hitherto considered it to be a human ordinance, and had allowed himself to be baptized. Since the important matter is the content of baptism, not the time, he would not quibble about it. Salvation does not depend on the external element in any case, but rather on the death of Christ. By this he did not wish to invalidate what Christ had commanded, for good deeds to friends and foes would endure. (3) Concerning the Lord's Supper, the important thing is faith. To the extent that a man believes he will partake of Christ. (4) Concerning government, Maler did not deny that a ruler could be a Christian, for after all, as one can be a father who rules his family, so also a ruler can be a Christian, as Paul wrote in I Tim. 6. (5) When asked if a Christian can swear an oath, Maler replied, "Yes, wherever it relates to the honor of God and love for the neighbor." The Christian has no law, even though he is subject to the law of God. Over perjurers stands the law of wrath. He did not understand either Christ or James as prohibiting the oath, but rather swearing by creatures as the scribes had done. He says that according to the understanding of many Anabaptists Paul must have erred (II Cor. 2) when he called God to witness over his soul. Maler closes with a prayer that God might be merciful to the many Anabaptists who were still imprisoned in the chains of conscience.

The striking similarities between this recantation and Hans Denk's appear to indicate literary dependence. Fortunately, Maler himself explained this recantation in 1550 when the Augsburg Council questioned him about it. He told them that when he had just come to faith (1532) and was in prison, Musculus (q.v.) and other preachers were unable to move him. Then Bonifacius (Wolfhart), the pastor of St. Anne's Church, tricked him into signing the four or five articles by stating that they meant little since the council was divided between papists and Lutherans. Maler admitted that he had not given sufficient thought to the matter and that he had been hypocritical in not denying and opposing the letter which was read to him; therefore he had soon been found again among the Anabaptists (1535) and again asked to desist. This time he refused because his conscience would not allow him to comply. He learned then that the council did not agree with Bonifacius' presentation of the matter to him in prison. Other than that, Maler insisted he had never openly recanted.

Maler was apprehended at a large Anabaptist meeting at Augsburg on April 4, 1535, in a ravine (Grube) in Rosenau. His court records of April 5 and 7 indicate that since his earlier stay in the city he had been in Switzerland and Moravia, and was suspected of bringing a letter from there to the brotherhood at Augsburg. On April 15 he was driven out of town with a whip.

For six years following this (1535-41), Maler lived in St. Gall, and then for nearly eight years (1541-48) in Appenzell. While here he was in correspondence with Pilgram Marpeck, whom he had learned to know through his excellent work at St. Gall in getting water to a fulling mill. While in Appenzell he received a letter from Pilgram Marpeck attempting to iron out some difficulties among the Appenzell Brethren (Kunstbuch, #8, dated 1543). Maler was apparently an elder here, for he baptized two persons. He learned the trade of weaving. He left Appenzell on account of some disagreement. The Brethren there, for example, rejected the oath entirely; he thought that where it served the needs of the Brethren and contributed toward the preservation of righteousness or truth it was permissible. The Brethren rejected all bearing and use of the sword; Maler rejected only its misuse. The Brethren would not concede that one could take an unbelieving wife or one with whom one did not agree, but Maler thought this wrong in view of Paul's advice. The Brethren did not want any of their number who was a weaver to weave anything colored or bold; Maler could see no wrong in it. The Brethren felt that one should not punish or strike his wife, no matter how angry he became; Maler believed punishment of one's wife to be justified in certain cases just as a father punishes his child. Finally, the Brethren refused to report their marriages to the government, whereas Maler felt that since the government was instituted by God and had authority over adultery, it should also be informed about marriages. That Maler was nonresistant is clear from his refusal to answer the call to arms to protect Appenzell, which resulted in an order to leave the city. He arrived in Augsburg about Feb. 7, 1548, and joined Marpeck (q.v.).

When Maler was taken into custody on April 23, 1550, he was stronger in faith than he had been on his previous arrest (1533) and refused to recant. He was then imprisoned, and since a visit by the preachers in October 1551 failed to bring results, he was ordered to remain in prison until April 22, 1552. The visit of the clergy is no doubt the one described by Maler in the Kunstbuch (fol. 164), when he was sentenced to remain in prison until he recanted. But on May 5 they had spared him torture because he had a very sore leg, which had recently deteriorated, and because he was weak in constitution.

When he was summoned on April 22, 1552, the judges, out of pity for his condition, wanted to release him. On April 25 they promised to do so if he would refrain from propaganda or holding meetings, either within or without the city limits. Although such a proposition must have been a severe temptation to the sick man, he replied that he understood the proposition well, and had given it careful consideration, but because of his conscience he could not accept it, since he did not know what God desired to do with him. Otherwise, as far as temporal matters were concerned, he was happy to obey the government, even as his life has hitherto been blameless, only he must be unrestricted as far as God's Word and his faith were concerned. The council decreed that he must leave town and re-enter it only upon pain of corporal punishment. On July 4, 1553, Sigmund Bosch addressed a letter of comfort to Maler admonishing him to be patient in all tribulation (Kunstbuch, #26).

That Maler was considered a leader in the brotherhood (Kunstbuch, fol. 164, 168 f.) is indicated by references to him in the correspondence between Marpeck and the Moravian Anabaptists. Marpeck reported that he was sending Maler to them, and they replied that they were happy to have him come. Since this was written soon after Maler was released from prison, it can be assumed that he resumed his church work at once.

Besides the Kunstbuch Maler left two confessions of faith, probably written because of differences with his colleagues, and an important epistle to Ulrich Agemann. The first confession, Rechenschaft des Glaubens (Fol. 228-35b in the Kunstbuch), was written at Appenzell in 1547. It is a typical Anabaptist confession of faith in that it consists almost entirely of a series of Scriptural quotations dealing with such matters as the necessity of suffering and cross bearing, discipleship, and the purity of the church. The margin contains many citations from the Old and New Testaments as well as the Apocrypha. There is no indication of the context within which this confession was drafted, but throughout it breathes the spirit of Anabaptism.

The second confession of faith, the Bekentnis des Glaubens, dated 1554, is also brief (Fol. 331b-35b) and is patterned on the Apostles' Creed. The margins again are filled with references to Scripture passages; it is the concordance type of confession very common among Anabaptists. The union of his confession with the Apostles' Creed indicates also the interest of many Anabaptists in the Christian creeds. At this point they were definitely not heretics but part of the universal church. In all points this confession of Maler's is in harmony with Anabaptist theology.

The third writing by Maler in the Kunstbuch is his epistle to Ulrich Agemann, who was friendly toward the Anabaptists but never joined them. This epistle, dated at St. Gall on Oct. 15, 1562 (Fol. 144-57), urges Agemann to make an open confession of faith, accept baptism, and become a member of the covenant community, Christ's suffering body. He begins by pointing out that the kingdom of Christ is not one of force, but one which each member has joined of his own free will. Maler's second point, stressing the importance of a clear distinction between the church and those without, leads him to discuss the nature of Christian baptism, in which he again stresses the nature of the covenant. Baptism is not for the unknowing, as practiced among those opposing Christ (the term "Widerchristen" used here was obviously a reply to the term "Wiedertäufer" and had been used by Eleutherobion—q.v.—in 1528), but only for those who have faith. The order (Ordnung) of Christ must be observed, and the three witnesses (spirit, water, and blood) must be kept together. Nor should one have only the inner baptism (as certain perverted spirits teach); rather, the inner faith demands an outer witness, else faith is dead. Outside the order of the Holy Spirit and of Christ there is no grace, good pleasure, or forgiveness of sin. Maler further details the order of Christ, using the same general approach found in all South German Anabaptism—Denk, Marpeck, Hut, etc. The order is derived from Mark 16 and Matt. 28 and insists that teaching must precede baptism.

Inserted after this epistle (Fol. 157) in the Kunstbuch is a discussion of the oath in reply to a question put to the author. This was likely also written by Maler, and represents a variation from the typical Anabaptist position, at least as it was expressed at Schleithem (q.v.). The position expressed is, however, in harmony with the position of Hut (q.v. in ML but not ME), Denk, and Marpeck in the Kunstbuch. Whereas Schleithem insisted that the asseverations of Paul were merely instances of calling God to witness, and hence not oaths, Musculus (q.v.) in his booklet on the oath in 1533 had argued that Paul and Christ both used the oath; hence the restrictions on the oath enjoined in the Sermon on the Mount and in James are not to be taken in an absolute sense. This argument, starting from a Biblicistic presupposition, must have had an appeal to Anabaptists like Maler. At any rate the statement in the Kunstbuch reflects the position of Musculus.

The relationship of Maler to the larger Anabaptist movement is not too clear. Along with his copying of the Kunstbuch, there are also some critical comments against Marpeck and his group, as well as positions which directly oppose the Marpeck brotherhood's position. This is true of his interpretation of II Cor. 2, "The letter kills," which Scharnschlager (q.v.) and Marpeck both insisted refers only to the Old Testament. In the Kunstbuch (Fol. 152b) Maler takes the opposite position, although he does not develop it in polemical opposition to anyone. This may indicate that after Marpeck's death and Scharnschlager's removal from Augsburg, Maler developed in a direction not completely in harmony with their position.

George Maler is not to be identified with Gregory Maler (q.v.) of Chur; their names preclude such identification, although some reasons for their identification can be adduced.

The date of Maler's death is not known. Since the Kunstbuch (assembled in 1561) contains a letter written by Maler in 1562, it is probable that he died soon after that somewhere in Switzerland, possibly in St. Gall.

Rothenfels (Königseck-Rothenfels), since 1805 belonging to Bavaria, Germany, previously a gravure in Allgäu (capital, Immenstadt). In the spring of 1528 horsemen and several hundred foot soldiers were organized to find Anabaptists. A number of the Anabaptists were caught, but most fled. They were probably refugees from Switzerland (Bern, Zürich, and St. Gall). The magistrate and officials of the strictly Catholic lords of Montfort had the prisoners tried by the executioner of Kempten, who had long been willingly handling such cases. He was to proceed in accord with the decision of the Swabian League (q.v.) of February 1528, which stipulated that persons suspected of Anabaptism were to be removed from their proper jurisdiction and put to death without trial. The executioner could not make up his mind to do this. After a consultation lasting four hours his superiors rejected the decision of the League; they wanted to execute only those who refused to recant. The Rothenfels authorities turned to Memmingen to find an executioner, but very likely in vain. Probably it was impossible to eradicate the Anabaptists. The communities were all Protestant when, in 1546, a Smalkaldian army camped in Allgäu. The preachers were then admonished to convert the Anabaptists. If the Anabaptists were obstinate they were to be banished from the country and their possessions given to their children. In the adjacent Rettenberg territory (in the south of the bishopric of Augsburg, now Sonthofen district) Anabaptists were arrested in 1566 and 1568, who maintained contact with Moravia (q.v.). In 1595 a church inspection revealed that "Anabaptists have again taken root . . . and had protection and lodging from our people." Books were confiscated, and their owners banished and threatened with loss of property and life. The neighboring prince-abbot of Kempten (q.v.) had seven Anabaptists executed at that time. In 1630 some Anabaptists were found in near-by Alpeee; this is the last evidence of Anabaptists here.

Rothmann (Rotmann, Rottman), Bernhard (Bernd) (c1495-c1535), a theologian and an Anabaptist of Münster, Westphalia, Germany, was born at Stadthohn in the bishopric of Münster. He served as a teacher in Warendorf, pastor of the church of St. Moritz at Münster after 1529, went to Wittenberg where he became a friend of Melancthon, traveled over South Germany, especially Speyer (q.v.) and Strasbourg (q.v.). He returned to Münster and was appointed pastor of the Church of St. Lambert, and introduced the Reformation into the city in 1532. He joined the "Wassenberg" (q.v.) preachers in 1533 and finally allied himself with Jan Matthijs van Haarlem (q.v.) and Jan Bockelson van Leyden (q.v.), who had come from Holland in early 1534, in whose service he wrote a number of important pamphlets. Nothing definite is known about his death, but it is very likely that he lost his life in the siege of the city in June 1535. His most important works are as follows (all in Low German):

(1) Bekentnisse van beyden Sacramenten, Doepe unde Nachmaele der predicanten tho Münster (Münster, November 1533). A copy is to be found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library; reprint, H. Detmer and R. Krumboltz, Zwei Schriften des Münsterschen Wiedertäufers Bernhard Rothmann (Dortmund, 1904) 1-85. It is a declaration by Bernhard Rothmann, Hendrik Rol (q.v.), Johann Kloppeis (q.v.), Dionysius Vinne (q.v.), Hermann Stappade (q.v.), and Gottfried Stralen (q.v.); it was printed in Rothmann's own print shop on Nov. 8, 1533, and showed Rothmann (according to Detmer) as an Anabaptist of the peaceful wing.

(2) Eyne Restitution edder Eine wedderstellinge rechter unde (in another edition vnnde gesunder Christliker leer gelouens unde leuens vth gades genaden durch de gameynte Christi tho Munster an den dach gegeuenn (Münster, 1534). It is to be found at The Hague; reprint: Bernhard Rothmann, Restitution rechter und gesunder christlicher Lehre, published by Andreas Knaake in Flugschriften aus der Reformationszeit VII, in Neudrucke deutscher Literaturwerke des XVI. und XVII. Jhs. 77/78 (Halle, 1888).

The Restitution (q.v.), Rothmann's most important work, is imbedded in a presentation of his view of history; viz., the fall of man in the old covenant from Adam on, and the restoration by Christ, was followed by a second fall in the new covenant from the second century on by scholars and by princes, and a second restitution from Luther (q.v.) to Melchior Hofmann (q.v.), Matthijs, and Bockelson; but now not only some parts, but all must be restored, not by and for the learned, but precisely for the common man. The Beschlussreden, however, deal with the resisting and avenging hand of Christ and several miraculous acts of God; i.e., the events in Münster since the beginning of 1534. Many a chapter has a genuine Anabaptist tone. Again and again stress is laid on doing the will of God, whatever it might cost. But then again there are chapters from which Melchior Hofmann speaks: in Chapter 4 is the doctrine of the Incarnation, claiming that Christ did not assume sinful flesh from Mary; Chapter 11 teaches that a voluntary sin committed after conversion cannot be forgiven; Chapter 17 teaches the imminent coming of Christ. Besides these there are the outspokenly Münsterite ideas. In Chapter 3 we read that the Old Testament is by no means antiquated. Chapter 12 teaches community of goods. "We have not only made all our possessions common by placing them into the hands of the deacons, but are also ready to promote one another with service of all kinds. All that has served selfishness and possession, buying and selling, working for money, income and interest, misusing our neighbors by fattening ourselves by their labor, etc., has been completely done away." Chapter 15 proclaims that a man has the liberty of having more than one wife; this teaching is based in part on the Old Testament example and the creation, in part on the idea that a man should be allowed to express himself with a good conscience. Chapter 18 teaches that the true and Christian government has received authority from God to act as a servant of God, protector of the innocent and just, avenger of evil, and then shows from their own history where Christians are permitted to use the sword against an ungodly government. These ideas do not originate with Rothmann; but he believes, after conscientious examination, that he can adopt the most radical of them and prove them theologically, indeed, that he must do so, on the basis of his pronounced power over the masses. Philip of Hesse (q.v.) rejected this book and Rothmann's former friend Melancthon wrote Etliche Propositiones wider die lehr der Wiederteuffer, precisely against this Restitution.

(3) Eyn gantz troestlick bericht van der Wrake vnde straffe des Babilonischen Gruuels, an alle ware Israeliten vnd Bundtgenoten Christi, hir vnde dar vorstroyet, durch de gemeinte Christi tho Munster, Anno M. CCCCC. xxx iij yn Decembre. This book was printed in Münster, but has been preserved only in a manuscript copy found in the Staatsarchiv of Düsseldorf. Reprinted in Karl Wilhelm Bouterwek (q.v.), Zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer, besonders in den Rheinlanden (Bonn, 1864) 66-80. This pamphlet heightens the language concerning the time and place of vengeance found in the Restitution, since distress has been increasing: "Therefore, dear Brethren, arm yourselves for the battle, not only with the humble weapons of the apostles for suffering, but also with the glorious armor of David for vengeance (the day of the return of Christ is the day of vengeance!) in order with divine strength and help to eradicate all ungodliness."

(4) Van verborgenheit der schrift des Rykes Christi, vnde van dem daghe des Heren durch de gemeinte Christi tho Münster (Münster, Februar 1535). This pamphlet is extant in two printings (Catalogus Amst., 62); reprint in Bernhard Rothmann's Schriften, ed. K. W. H. Hochhuth (Gotha, 1857). As the true key for the understanding of the Scriptures this work—Rothmann's last—he claims "the live understanding of the Spirit, which is won by the actual accomplishment of the divine will," as was the case in Münster. In sharp polemics against Catholics and Protestants it proclaims, certain of victory, the assurance that now "a new heaven and a new earth" are coming, "in which righteousness dwells" (Detmer, 127-99).

(5) Van erdescher vnnde tyliker gewalt (May 1535). A manuscript copy of this writing is found in the Staatsarchiv at Münster. It is printed in Heinrich Detmer and Robert Krumboltz, Zwei Schriften des Münsterschen Wiedertäufers Bernhard Rothmann (Dortmund, 1904) 86-129. This unfinished fragment takes up ideas of the Restitution (Chapter 18): Temporal force became necessary only through the sin of man and must be abrogated in the dawn of the new kingdom (Detmer, 127-99).

In these works of Rothmann the Protestant zur Linden (q.v.) found a gaping abyss between the current presentations of the Münster revolt and the spirit prevailing in the Münsterite writings. Also the Protestant Detmer (q.v.) pointed out not only the graphic Low German language of Rothmann (127-99), but, in spite of all his disagreement with the ideas, also speaks appreciatively of the earnestness with which the deepest religious problems are treated. Detmer says that in this misled misleader the religious side of the entire movement is incorporated (129-201). The Catholic Hast (q.v.) even calls Rothmann one of the most outstanding men of his time.

Modern historians dealing with the person and life of Rothmann are unanimous in their praise of the genius of this man, a trained theologian and one who early assumed a position of leadership in the evangelical church at Münster. Rothmann's travels, which were meant to keep him faithful to the Reformed cause, served rather to broaden his outlook. He was thrilled with what his friend Capito (q.v.) showed him in Strasbourg (q.v.) in 1531, where he also met Schwenckfeld (q.v.; although Schwenckfeld never admitted this acquaintance; he said he had seen Rothmann once). Likely he did not meet Bucer (q.v.) personally since Bucer was out of the city when Rothmann visited there. Rothmann called Strasbourg the crown and palm of all Christian cities and churches. Of his time spent traveling from April to July 1531 he spent from the middle of May until July there. When he returned to preach in Münster at the beginning of July 1531, he was thoroughly evangelical in his preaching.

The unsettled state of the bishop's tenure in Münster (there were three in rapid succession) made it possible for Rothmann to rise to a position of honor and power. Related to this was the control which the guilds exercised over the council. He was supported by an atmosphere of reform and so began to agitate for his religious views. On Jan. 23, 1532, he published his confession of faith (found in Kerssenbroch, 176-89). This confession contains thirty articles which include the main points under discussion by the Reformers. It is thoroughly Lutheran and divergent from Wittenberg only in the points dealing with the sacraments, where it shows clear influence from Capito and Zwingli (q.v.), for the sacraments are considered memorial signs. There are no indications of Anabaptist leanings, and the separation between the spiritual and the physical realms reminds one of Luther. On August 10, after a number of struggles, the evangelical preachers took over the churches in Münster, and six days later Rothmann along with the preachers published a notice of the abuses of the Catholic Church containing sixteen articles. Here Zwingli's influence is very clear. Article six speaks directly against Luther and for Zwingli.

This divergence from Lutheran views caused both Melancthon (q.v.; an acquaintance of Rothmann's) and Luther to warn Rothmann, who was suspect also because he practiced the Lord's Supper outside the church, using ordinary bread sprinkled with wine. At the end of 1532 Luther warned Rothmann regarding Zwingli, and felt it necessary to call the attention of the Münster council to the danger of the Anabaptist movement.

As far as Rothmann was concerned this warning was not needed, for on Sept. 6, 1532, he wrote to the humanist Hermann von dem Busche sharply criticising the Anabaptists. This situation, however, soon changed after Philip (q.v.) of Hesse intervened on Feb. 14, 1533, to confirm the six evangelical preachers in Münster, and after the election of the council had resulted in a victory for the evangelical party and the guilds in March 1533. Then a reformation was undertaken in an evangelical sense. For this reason church and disciplinary orders were to be created. Rothmann was entrusted with the working out of a church order. Even the strictly Lutheran John von der Wieck did not oppose him in spite of his suspicion that Rothmann was an Anabaptist. This church order has been lost, but the broad outlines indicate sufficiently that Strasbourg's arrangements and Zwingli's teachings serve as the prototype. Philip's demand that the articles on baptism and the Lord's Supper be changed (April 17, 1533) indicates how little this church order was based upon Lutheran presuppositions.

Through the strong influence of the Wassenberg preachers (q.v.), who entered Münster in the course of 1532, Rothmann began to change his views. The domineering personality of Hendrick Rol, whom he may have learned to know in Strasbourg in 1531, exerted a strong pressure on Rothmann's subsequent development. In any case Rothmann was on the road to a complete rejection of Lutheranism and on May 6, 1533, he made his position against infant baptism very clear. An open division thus came about between the conservative Lutheran party in the council under the leadership of the syndicus von der Wieck, which saw its hope in the Smalcald League, and the party under the leadership of Rothmann supported by the guilds and influenced by the Wassenberg preachers. The result of this was that Rothmann wrote to his friend Bucer and shared his reservations on infant baptism. The reply which Rothmann received was not favorable to his views as he had expected but indicated that infant baptism must be retained to keep the unity of the church. This led Rothmann even further in the rejection of infant baptism, an attitude which resulted in a very important public disputation in Münster on August 7 and 8, 1533. For the Lutheran party and for the Catholic party this disputation was intended to end the influence of Rothmann and the preachers. For this reason the brilliant and well-trained humanist, von dem Busche, was invited to speak for the city council to present its point of view on the sacraments. The preachers, especially Rothmann and Rol, were accused of calling infant baptism an abomination and denying that anyone who had been baptized as an infant could be a Christian. The preachers, with Rothmann as spokesman, thoroughly defeated the opposition in the course of the disputation. Even though at this time Rothmann did not defend rebaptism, or put adult baptism in the place of infant baptism, his arguments against infant baptism were so effective that the council decided to call off the disputation after two days, ostensibly because the aged von dem Busche was tired. A modern historian who described this disputation believes that never at any time did the opponents of infant baptism have such a clear-cut victory in a disputation. To the embarrassment of the council they had to reinstate Rothmann in his ministerial office upon pressure from the guilds, which they did on October 3. Apparently a continual seesawing between the council and the preachers took place in which the preachers were banished and then reinstated, although Rothmann himself was allowed to stay in Münster even though he could not preach.

Another important influence in Rothmann's life now came to fuller expression. Since the summer of 1533, adherents of the sect of the Melchiorites had been coming to Münster (see Münster Anabaptists). Though many things separated them from Rothmann's coterie, their common opposition to Lutheranism drew them together. Rothmann's desire to increase his following naturally made him anxious to have the support of this group. It was through his act that Jan Matthijsz (q.v.), who since November 1533 had been turning many of the Melchiorites into a radical direction, and the revolutionary element which later became so strong in Münster got a foothold. Rothmann's writings show clearly how this change came about. The writing called Bekentnisse, which was written in collaboration with five other preachers and completed on Oct. 22, 1533, and published in Rothmann's own print shop on November 8, bears no evidence of this apocalyptic revolutionary mood. Indeed, as Wray has shown, this confession was translated by the Marpeck brotherhood in an effort to rally the splintered Anabaptist movement of the 1530's together into a united group. Published in 1542 under the title Vermanung (q.v.), it was revised considerably to coincide with the theology of the Marpeck group. Greater stress was laid upon the difference between the Old and the New Testaments; Rothmann's treatment of the circumcision-baptism analogy was dropped and a clearer one presented in its stead; the Marpeck brotherhood went out of its way to insert nonresistant passages, and added numerous admonitions to continue faithful unto the end. A detailed comparison of these two documents shows clearly how the theology of the Marpeck brotherhood formed. Obviously they knew the tragic end which had befallen Rothmann, but they also saw the intrinsic value in the confession of the Münster preachers. Its concise and clear rebuttal of all the arguments against infant baptism could not be allowed to go unnoticed and unused.

Even in this writing the tension between Rothmann's Lutheran background and the influences received from Strasbourg is not completely reconciled. Bucer, writing to Rothmann in December 1533, replied against Rothmann's reservations on infant baptism. Not only did Bucer refute Rothmann, but all of the Strasbourg preachers together wrote a polemical book in March 1534, in which they dealt point by point not only with the published minutes of the disputation held in Münster on August 7 and 8, 1533, but also with the published Bekentnisse. This rebuttal by the Strasbourg preachers—Capito, Hedio, and Bucer—sent first in the form of a letter to Münster, was thought so valuable that it was published and sent especially to Augsburg. The title is: Bericht auss der heyiligen geschrift von der recht gottseligen anstellung vnd haushaltung Christlicher gemeyn/ Eynsatzung der diener des worts/ Haltung vnd brauch der heyiligen Sacramenten. Vom heyiligen Tauff/ vnnd das die kinder zu teuffen/ mit satter schriftlicher widerlegung was biss her hie wider vffbracht. Von dem H. Sacrament des leybs/ vnnd bluts unsers Herren Jesu/ vnnd Christlicher eynigkeit in disem handel zehalten. Durch die Prediger des heyiligen Evangelii/ zu Strassburg/ der Stat/ vn kirchen zu Münster in Westfal/ erslich geschriben. The writing is important because the Bekentnisse incorporates the best of Anabaptist thought. The latter book reveals clear dependence upon a book by Christoff Freisleben (Vom wahrhaften Tauff Joannis) (see Eleutheros), and in other respects is a concise rebuttal of the arguments for infant baptism. Also the Strasbourg preachers gave considerable thought to the problem of infant baptism, and as they are fond of pointing out in the Bericht, they had read all the literature which the Anabaptists had produced in the previous eight years.

Rothmann's authority in Münster continued to ebb and flow. In November 1533 a new church order was introduced, and because Rothmann opposed it he was directed to leave the city on December 11. Yet he remained, and Philip of Hesse and Wieck planned by means of another disputation to drive him from Münster. This became impossible and on Jan. 23, 1534, an edict by Franz von Waldeck, bishop of Münster, called for the imprisonment of all Anabaptists, especially Rothmann.

Through the influence of Jan Matthijsz (q.v.) and Jan van Leyden (q.v.) affairs in Münster soon took an abrupt turn. Rothmann's precise role from this point is not clear, but since he had always been impressionable, he very likely came under the influence of these men, who used his gifts of expression and leadership to their own ends. Finally on Jan. 5, 1534, Rothmann along with the Wassenberg preachers was rebaptized; in his home many others were secretly baptized. In the ensuing perversion of power that took place in Münster (see Münsterites) Rothmann assumed an ambiguous role. He opposed many of the changes at first, and yet bowed to the pressure of the more revolutionary leaders. Kerksenbroch reports that he took nine wives when polygamy was instituted. His real importance for Münster was his gift of public speaking and of writing. It is a tribute to his writings that Kerksenbroch, the 16th-century chronicler of the Münster revolution, did not give the contents of the writings in German because he did not want to contribute to the spreading of his ideas.

The lasting influence of Rothmann has come through the confession which he wrote with the Wassenberg preachers. This confession lived on in translation and revision (Vermanung) in the Marpeck brotherhood, and is still somewhat an Anabaptist classic. Just how much he had to do with its actual writing is not clear. Nevertheless it remains one of the tragedies of early Anabaptism that this gifted man, in spite of all his expressions of humility, yielded to the desire for honor, and finally could not resist the influences which came to bear upon his life. And yet Detmer, his modern biographer, may be correct when he implies that Rothmann inevitably had to take the way that he did because the Reformed party would not give him a serious hearing in the 1533 disputation and ignored his victory.

The last days of Rothmann are not known. It may be that he escaped when the city of Münster was attacked, but it is more likely that he chose a courageous death in battle rather than the miserable life of a fugitive driven from place to place. W.K.L.

Rotholz (Rotenholz, Rothholz), a village in the Inn Valley, near Jenbach, Tirol, Austria, one of the villages in which Anabaptists were found in the early period. In November 1527 it was ascertained that "foreign persons" were in the village, "who take the liberty of stirring up our subjects on Anabaptism and other seductive articles." A search was ordered and carried out. Two Anabaptists lost their lives at the stake at that time. In 1574 the Hutterite Hans Plattner (q.v.) was put to death in Rotholz; the Hutterite chronicles relate that an epileptic woman recovered her health by drinking the blood of this martyr. E.C.

Rottenbauer, a village (1944 pop. 736) in the Würzburg area of Bavaria (q.v.), Germany, became the seat of a Mennonite congregation about 1810, founded by Mennonites from Baden. The center of the congregation was later moved to Giebelstadt and Würzburg. By 1936 there were no Mennonites living in Rottenbauer. In 1839 the congregations of Rottenbauer and Bildhausen (q.v.) published a hymnal of their own with 575 hymns, Christliches Gesangbuch zunächst für Mennoniten. Herausgegeben von der Mennoniten-Brüder Gemeinschaft in Unterfranken (Würzburg, 1839).

In 1857 the congregation had 110 baptized members; Heinrich Landes of Albertshausen was the elder (preacher 1824, elder 1839), and the preachers were Jakob Horsch (from 1835), Michael Bachmann (1835), Samuel Mosemann (1845), and Heinrich Burkholder (1852). (ML III, 554.) E.C.

Rottenburg, a town (pop. 9,500) on the Neckar, between Horb (q.v.) and Tübingen (q.v.), Württemberg, Germany, until 1806 the seat of the Austrian rule of Hohenberg (q.v.), now the seat of a Catholic bishop and of a Catholic seminary.

In the spring of 1526 Wilhelm Reublin (q.v.), a native of this town, appeared here with his wife, and stayed in the home of Jörg Schuhmacher. In both Rottenburg and Horb he won and baptized a large number of followers. He called his friend Michael Sattler (q.v.) to Horb. In February 1527, when the authorities became aware of the Anabaptists, Reublin fled to Reutlingen (q.v.), while Sattler with his wife and his fellows was arrested and taken to Binsdorf (see Horb). On May 17 a court session was held in Rottenburg; and on May 21 the inhuman execution of Sattler was carried out. On the next day his wife was drowned in the Neckar. Of his companions some were put to death and some exiled. In 1528 eleven persons were sentenced, some to death and some to exile. In 1529 Anabaptists who had lain in prison 157 days were driven from the town with rods after the executioner had burned an image of the devil on their foreheads.

Thus Anabaptism was exterminated from Rottenburg. For some time longer Lutheranism tried to maintain itself, but finally the Austrian authorities were successful in keeping it a Catholic town.

On Aug. 16, 1957, the Sixth Mennonite World Conference dedicated a memorial plaque to Michael Sattler in the Lutheran parish church in Rottenburg, at which time a special memorial service was held.

Rotterdam, a city (1958 pop. 720,000, with some 1,750 Mennonites) of the Dutch province of South Holland. The fact that two Anabaptist martyrs, Anneken (q.v.) Jans and Christina (q.v.) Michiels Barents, were drowned here on Jan. 24, 1539, does not prove the existence of a congregation here at that early date, for both women were merely passing through the city when arrested.

Nevertheless there was some Anabaptist activity here in 1534, led by Jan (q.v.) Jansz Schot, and an Anabaptist congregation was doubtless established at Rotterdam soon after 1540, which conducted itself quietly. Since the government here was more tolerant than, for example, in Amsterdam or Antwerp, or perhaps because there were fewer Anabaptists living here than at some other places, there were relatively few martyrs at Rotterdam—a total of about 24 in 1534-68, besides a number who were expelled from the city. One of the anonymous martyrs of 1544 was a girl of fourteen, who left a song. In 1558, at the scene of an Anabaptist execution, when the executioner was clumsily strangling Jan Hendricks (q.v.) preliminary to burning him, the crowd released the other four prisoners. Concerning the death of Hendrik (q.v.) Arentsz in 1568, van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror gives a full account. Little is known of the congregation in the early period. In 1556 it met in a home in Houttuyn. Leenaerdt Bouwens (q.v.) visited it repeatedly, baptizing 15 persons here in 1554-56, 7 (or 15) in 1557-61, and at least 100 in 1563-75. Soon thereafter there was an influx of persecuted Anabaptists fleeing from Flanders, Belgium.

In the last three decades of the 16th century the Rotterdam congregation, like most of the Dutch congregations, was divided by doctrinal dissension. About 1590 there were at least five congregations here: Flemish, Old Flemish, Waterlander, Frisian, and High German. By 1620 the Waterlanders, Frisians, and High Germans had united; but there was still a splinter of the High German group, perhaps identical with the Claes Woutersz group, and in addition a congregation of Flemish and one of Old Flemish, both in existence since 1590. It is hardly possible to form an actual picture of the various mergers and divisions in the 17th century before 1671. In that year there were three congregations: (a) Old Flemish, (b) Flemish, also called Flemish and High German, with which the conservative Frisians had united, and (c) Waterlander, to which the progressive (Young) Frisians and Mild Flemish belonged.

The (a) Old Flemish were extremely conservative; they co-operated with the group known as the Danzig Old Flemish, an association of Mennonite congregations, which included seven small congregations in the Netherlands and some conservative congregations in West Prussia. This Rotterdam congregation was always small, usually 20-30 members, and met in a home called Het Arkje, behind the Lombardstraat. By 1740 its pulpit was vacant and by 1770 the congregation was extinct.

The (b) Fleinish congregation met in a meetinghouse behind Leeuwenstraat from 1609. The meetinghouse was enlarged in 1645. In 1650 the membership was some 200. This group had important elders in the 17th century. One of these was Bastiaan van Weenighem (q.v.) 1659-86, who often visited other Mennonite congregations, e.g., Hamburg-Altona in 1661. He was followed by Herman Schijn (q.v.), who moved to Amsterdam in 1690. In 1656 a call was given to the influential Dordrecht elder Tieleman Jansz van Braght (q.v.), but he declined. This Rotterdam congregation was a sort of mother church to a number of small Flemish congregations in the vicinity, giving repeated financial aid and free ministerial service to those at Brielle (q.v.), Delft, Geervliet, Gouda, Middelharnis, Oosterhout, Schoonhoven, Spijkenisse, Zevenhoven, and Zuidland, all of which nonetheless died out around the turn of the century. In 1632 the deacons Balten Centen Schoenmaker and Michiel Michielsz signed the Dordrecht Confession for the Flemish congregation.

In 1652 and the following years the Rotterdam Flemish congregation was threatened by a serious division because a number of its members were Collegiants (q.v.); in 1655 order was restored when five preachers were expelled with their following. The congregation was now very conservative (no contact with Collegiants, close communion, strict church discipline). In 1664 it joined the Zonists (q.v.). Gradually the conservatism relaxed; in 1675 religious instruction for children was introduced, which had previously been given by the parents. In 1682 the Biestkens Bible (q.v.) was replaced by the state translation (Statenvertaling). A union with the Waterlanders was in prospect.

The (c) Waterlander congregation, which was represented in 1579 at a Waterlander conference at Emden (q.v.) and at Amsterdam in 1581. It was far less important than the Flemish in numbers, wealth, and influence, held its meetings at the Quakernaat (probably from 1592, at any rate from before 1620). It was less conservative in the use of the ban (q.v.), mixed marriages (q.v.), and the admission of members of other creeds (other Mennonite branches, Remonstrants—q.v.—and Reformed) to communion. Dissatisfied Flemish transferred their membership to the Waterlanders; in 1592-1620 an entire Frisian congregation made the transfer. The influx of the Flemish contributed to the involvement of the Waterlanders in the Collegiant dispute; the congregation was divided into two parties in 1655-72, one in favor of and one opposed to the Collegiants.

In 1647 and again in 1655 an attempt was made to unite the Waterlanders with the Flemish; but the offers were rejected by the Flemish. Twice there was talk of merger with the Remonstrants; in 1658 the Remonstrants seem to have taken the initiative, and in 1669-70 the Waterlanders led; both attempts failed. Since 1664 the congregation had belonged to the Lamists (q.v.). In the conference meetings of the Lamist or South Holland Sociëteit Jan van Ranst, a Rotterdam preacher, began in 1676 to urge the establishment of a theological seminary. The Waterlander congregation had begun religious instruction (1672) three years earlier than its sister church. A member was appointed to visit the sick, and in 1687 the first salaried preacher, Hendrik Toren, a baker, was engaged. In October 1696 negotiations were inaugurated leading to a merger with the Flemish congregation. This merger became reality in 1700. The old partisan names that had caused so much damage, were buried; the congregation was now called the United Mennonite Church. Abraham van Loon, of Gouda, preached the sermon of unification on June 6, 1700.

Both meetinghouses were used until 1776, when the Waterlander "preaching house" at the Quakernaat was sold. The congregation had built a stately church with room for all on the site of the Flemish meetinghouse on Leeuwenstraat. This building was made possible by the legacy of the brothers Pieter and Jan Bisschop (q.v.), wealthy yarn merchants, the latter of whom died in 1771 at the age of 91. The dedicatory sermon for the church, a fine specimen of baroque architecture and furnished with an organ, was preached by the pastor, Jacob Ouweijans (q.v.).

In spite of the unification and the agreement to forget the ancient quarrels, tensions remained throughout the 18th century between a group of Flemish origin and a group of the more liberal Waterlanders. Especially after Ouweijans' death, who had served from 1742 to 1781 and given it a conservative stamp, the old strife threatened to flare up again, but was permanently settled in 1786 with the choice of the pacific Wytse Sytjes Hoekstra (q.v.) as pastor.

In 1700 at the time of the merger there were 400 members—143 men and 257 women. In the 18th century certain names recurred: Dekker, van Gilse, Jansen, de Koker, Lommen van Lil, Messch(a)ert, van der Pals, van Rijkevorsel, van Rijnbach, van Sleiden, Staal, Verloove, van Vollenhoven, Wynands. In the 19th century the following names were added: Altmann, Cupedo, Dutilh, Gerpot, Hulshoff, de Monchy, Rueb, and Sieuwerts van Reesema. Most of these old families have died out or moved away; only Altmann, de Monchy, Rueb, Staal, and Verloove remain. The membership, which was 400 in 1700, had dropped to 250 by 1771, and 102 by 1808. Since then there has been a rapid increase: 195 in 1847, 234 in 1861, 498 in 1900, 1,031 in 1918, 1,252 in 1940, but dropped to 835 in 1945 (effects of war), 990 in 1958.

Jacob Ouweijans served as pastor 1742-d.81, Jan Menalda 1771-d.1800, Keimpe Dam 1773-d.1810, Wytse Sytjes Hoekstra 1786-d.1801, Nicolaas Messchaert (q.v.) 1802-33 (he died of cholera), Abraham Jacobus van Pesch 1834-41, Pieter van der Goot (q.v.) 1842-51, Sytse Hoekstra Bz (q.v.), who later taught in the Seminary at Amsterdam, 1852-57, J. P. Müller 1857-62, Jacobus Craandijk 1862-84, Johannes Dyserinck (q.v.) 1884-1901. Under Craandijk and particularly Dyserinck Modernism found its way into the congregation, without, however, causing any difficulties or dissension. Since 1902 the preachers have been A. Binnerts Szn 1902-7, F. Dijkema 1907-16, S. H. N. Gorter 1916-46, Miss D. Groeneveld 1924-28, Miss S. Goossen 1928-34, Mrs. H. C. Voorhoeve-ten Bruggencate 1936-48, N. van der Zijpp 1946- , and D. E. W. Siccama 1950- .

The Mennonites of Rotterdam have always been on good terms with the city government. Only occasionally, during the 17th century, some obstacles were placed on their path. Permission to enlarge the meetinghouses was always willingly granted. In 1629 the Waterlander preacher Edward Nabels was excused from assuming the office of sheriff, which he rejected for reasons of nonresistance, upon payment of a "gift" of 25 guilders for the Reformed poor (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 447). A good testimonial is given the Rotterdam Mennonites in a letter written on Feb. 19, 1660, by the magistrate of Rotterdam to the city of Bern, Switzerland, in behalf of the suppressed Bernese Anabaptists (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 1746). Once or twice the burgomasters made serious difficulties: in 1693 the deacons and preachers of the Waterlander congregation were summoned to court on a charge of Socinianism (q.v.). In 1718 Pastor David van Heyst (q.v.) was called before the burgomasters of Rotterdam on a charge of unorthodoxy. On both these occasions an oral confession of faith was sufficient. The matter was cleared by a visit of a committee of the church council to the burgomasters. In 1795, when military conscription became law, it took some effort to establish the release of the Mennonites from armed duty; the beautiful new church was used for political meetings and even for military drill. At that time, as everywhere in the Netherlands after 1796, the Mennonites took part in the city government. The Mennonites have had an active part in the economic rise of Rotterdam; especially the van Vollenhoven and de Monchy families are engaged in trade and shipping.

On two occasions the Rotterdam congregation, which had previously been very active in supporting oppressed Mennonites elsewhere, as in 1660 and 1710 those in Switzerland, in 1690 those in the Palatinate, and after 1730 those in Prussia, was of particular importance for Mennonitism in other countries. In the first half of the 18th century, especially in 1709-34, many Mennonite emigrants from Switzerland and the Palatinate went to America by way of Rotterdam. They were generally cared for by the church board, and sometimes even clothed, and considerable sums were used by the congregation to transport them to London, the port of exit for Pennsylvania. Some were helped to sail directly from Rotterdam to America. In 1709 the preacher Hendrik Toren (q.v.) and the deacon Jan van Gent are said to have promoted the transportation to England of the Palatine Mennonites who had come to Rotterdam; over 1,000 of them, however, were persuaded by Toren and van Gent to return to the Palatinate. In 1735, 180 Mennonite emigrants were shipped to Pennsylvania by Archibald and Isaac Hope, members of the Rotterdam Mennonite congregation, and again 3,000 in 1753 and 4,000 in 1765, all from the Palatinate. The second time when Mennonites, expelled from their homes, traveled to the New World via Rotterdam began in 1924, when the Dutch Mennonite Emigrant Bureau was established for the benefit of the Russian Mennonite refugees. Led by S. H. N. Gorter, J. Th. de Monchy, C. S. Altmann, and J. N. de Jong, the Bureau did an extensive work. Over 1,000 of these Mennonites left Europe for Canada and Brazil via Rotterdam in 1924-31. On Jan. 27, 1947, the Volendam sailed from Rotterdam with 442 Russian Mennonites, and after stopping at Bremerhaven to pick up 1,863 more refugees, went on to Paraguay.

World War II brought unspeakable distress to Rotterdam—occupation, bombs, destruction, hunger, and death. The Mennonite congregation was also hard hit. In consequence of losses through bombing, hunger, compulsory resettlement of elderly persons in the country and of younger persons into foreign lands, the membership dropped from 1,252 to 835. A great misfortune struck the congregation in the early days of the war, in May 1940, when with the heart of the city their beautiful church was burned down. Nothing was saved. A valuable collection of portraits was lost, as well as the six costly silver communion cups acquired in 1780, the silver baptismal plate, and two antique pewter wine jars from the 17th century; some of the archives, however, were saved, for they had temporarily been stored elsewhere. During the war and occupation, congregational life was carried on as well as possible. Services were held at various places with many changes. Plans were made before the war was over for the rebuilding of the church, but it took some years after its close before the plans of the young architect Gerrit Kuiper, a member of the congregation, could become reality. On Oct. 27, 1950, the moderator H. G. J. de Monchy started the machine that drove the first concrete pillar into the ground. On Dec. 31, 1951, the new church, with its spacious side buildings, could be used. Both pastors preached on the occasion. The building was made possible only by the sacrificial giving of the entire congregation and the generous support of the entire Dutch Mennonite brotherhood. The fine pipe organ, acquired in 1957, was largely a munificent gift by one of the members.

The congregation is led by a church council, which consists of the ministers and twelve members who are chosen for five-year terms. Until 1921 the church board was self-perpetuating; the trustees are now elected by the congregation. The church council is assisted by the Oude dienst, i.e., a committee of retired councillors. Since 1952 there has also been a committee of twelve lay members, which cares for the financial and social needs of the congregation, the fund for this work being provided by the church council. The church has a choir, four women's groups, a youth circle (ages 18-35), a section of Menniste Bouwers (ages 12-18), a West Hill Sunday school (ages 4-12), and a study group of the Peace Group.

Rottevalle, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, the seat of a Mennonite congregation, which was originally centered in the neighboring hamlet of Witveen. Here Mennonites settled about 1620-40 to cultivate the moors and to dig peat. In the second half of the 18th century the congregation, known at that time as Witveen-Rottevalle, had a meetinghouse in each of the two villages. Gradually the congregation center shifted to Rottevalle. Soon after 1830 the Witveen meetinghouse was dismantled because it was dilapidated and also because very few members were living there; the church in Rottevalle was remodeled and enlarged in 1838. An organ was installed in 1931. The membership was 108 in 1751, 72 in 1847, 101 in 1900, and 142 in 1958. In 1734 Witveen joined the Conference (Sociëteit) of Friesland, followed in 1778 by Rottevalle. The last lay preacher in this congregation was Volkert Klazes Klosma ("Volkert Oom"), who served from 1799 to 1830. After his retirement the pulpit was vacant for nearly ten years. Since 1839 the ministers of the Rottevalle congregation have all been educated at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary. H. A. van Cleef served 1839-51, A. Loosjes 1852-53, P. Bruyn 1854-55, A. Käyser 1856-58, J. van Delden 1859-61, B. Cuperus 1861-63, H. C. Hofkes 1863-68, H. ter Meulen 1869-73, S. Wartena Jr. 1873-80, L. Hesta 1882-84, A. K. Kuiper 1889-95, P. J. Glasz 1896-98, E. Doyer 1957-.

Church activities include Sunday school for children, Menniste Bouwers (ages 12-15), youth group, and ladies' circle.

Royer Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the Lancaster Conference. Jacob Royer (1771-1850) and his wife, Catherine Hammer, lived on a farm near Richland, Pa. He was a son of Daniel Royer and a great-grandson of the pioneer Sebastian Royer. Jacob Royer donated the ground on which the Tulpehocken Church of the Brethren was built in 1840. This was erected by the "Old Brothers Society of the Conestoga Family," an outpost of the Bareville Church of the Brethren in Lancaster County, the first meetinghouse of that denomination in Lebanon County. It was a stone building, 35 x 40 ft., in which a school for the community was held. An annex of 25 ft. was added. This Jackson Township school and church had two sets of trustees. The adjoining cemetery was "for anyone who had clean and honest deaths, and the house should be open for any preacher for these funerals." This church was used by the Brethren for a century. Then it was leased for some years to the Old Order Mennonites. In January 1947 the building was leased by the Millbach Mennonite group, and soon it was used exclusively by these workers. Noah N. Burkholder became their minister, and Earl B. Horst was ordained as assistant minister in 1953. The membership, through colonization, was 95 in 1957. Amos Horst and Mahlon Zimmerman are the bishops. The Royer congregation has an outpost at Texter, opened on May 10, 1953, with Willard Eberly, Peter M. Risser, and Levi Burkholder as superintendents; Texter had 34 members in 1957. The ministers are those of the Royer Mennonite Church. A new meetinghouse was built in 1957-58.

Rozenhofje is a home for the aged at Rozengracht 149, Amsterdam, Holland. It was founded in 1743 by the Amsterdam Collegiants (q.v.). Since 1770, when Collegiantism in Amsterdam died out, it has been administered by a committee usually consisting of Mennonites. It contains 30 apartments for aged women. The facade was rebuilt in 1890, but the interior court is still in the old picturesque style. vdZ.

Ruchat, Abraham (1678-1750), a Swiss Reformed theologian, served as pastor in a number of congregations, and as professor of literature and theology of the Academy of Lausanne, a versatile writer. In 1721-27 he wrote his Histoire de la Réformation de la Suisse, and published it in six volumes at Geneva in 1727 f. It earned for him the title of Father of Protestant Historiography (RGG) in Switzerland. For 1536 the presentation is complete, but becomes more sketchy with each succeeding year: from 672 pages for 1536 to 96 pages for 1537 and 80 for 1538-57. A second edition appeared at Nyon in 1835-38 in seven volumes, "with appendices and a sketch of the life and works of Ruchat by L. Vulliemin." This edition was welcome, for the original covered only the years 1516-36 and was so persecuted by the church board and city council of Bern that the second part, covering the years 1536-66, could not be published in full as planned. The catalog of Calvary says, "The present (second) edition embraces the complete work, the first section . . . in four volumes and the previously unprinted section according to the original manuscript in three volumes. Court records, letters, and documents, which were not accessible to the author or which he was perhaps not permitted to publish, are added. Ruchat's work is the first critical book on the Swiss Reformation. A considerable part is occupied by the history of the Anabaptists in Switzerland; the presentation of the history of Anabaptism in Romance Switzerland, in Geneva, Wallis, and Tessin, which is attempted here for the first time, deserves consideration."

Rückenau Mennonite Brethren Church in the village of Rückenau, located in the heart of the Molotschna settlement of South Russia, became the nerve center in the development of the M.B. movement. M.B. interest had concentrated sufficiently in this area in 1874 to buy a tavern and convert it into a meeting-house. Church activities outgrew this building by 1883 when a new structure, 84 x 42 ft., was erected providing a seating capacity of 600. The highest estimated membership was 3,000, including several affiliated congregations. The early M.B. leaders also exerted considerable influence in this congregation.

After Elder H. Hübert left for the Kuban in 1873, Abr. Schellenberg was elected elder, and when he moved to America in 1879, Johann Fast succeeded him. Jacob Dirksen, David Schellenberg, David Dürksen, Jacob Reimer, and Jacob Thiessen were other leading personalities. The annual M.B. Conference was held in this church and from it determining influences radiated into other M.B. congregations. The congregation remained strong until the Revolution in the early 1920's. Many, including a number of the leaders, emigrated when religious liberty was suppressed. During World War II, with the retreat of the German army, many of these settlements were wiped out, all the Mennonites leaving. Nothing further is known of the congregation, which at one time was the heart of the Mennonite Brethren movement. J.J.T.

The family names of these settlers were Arendt, Block, Ediger, Flaming, G(o)ertz, Jantzen, Nickel, Penner, Quiring, Schroeder, Unrau, and Wichert. In the Dutch Naamlijst the congregation is called "Stuumsche Neederling op Swijngrube." It was later called Tragheimerweide (q.v.) or Zwanzigerweide (q.v.). Rudnerweide Mennonite Church, a Mennonite branch found chiefly in Manitoba. A schism occurred in the Sommerfeld (q.v.) Mennonite congregation in southern Manitoba (q.v.) in 1937, the more progressive members advocating a more active, spiritual church life, and the more conservative section strongly opposed to this movement. As a result a new more active congregation was organized, composed of former members of the Sommerfeld church, with four of the twelve Sommerfeld ministers, Isaac A. Hoepfner, George Froese, P. S. Zacharias, and William H. Falk, as ministers. Of these, William H. Falk, of Schoental, was chosen as elder or bishop. This congregation has from the beginning been interested in home and foreign missions, as well as education and Bible schools. The Rudnerweide Mennonites stress true conversion, a clean manner of life, and good fellowship in the church. They adhere to the same tenets of faith and use the same catechism as the original group, but hold evangelistic gatherings and Bible and prayer meetings, as well as taking part in Sunday-school work, young people's endeavor, and choir practice. Their elected ministers are free to deliver their sermons directly from a Bible text, instead of merely reading sermons handed down from the past as is the case in the mother Sommerfeld church. Fourteen foreign missionaries have been sent out by this congregation and are now supported by it.

This congregation has as yet not joined any of the existing conferences. It has in Manitoba about 600 families with 3,200 souls and 1,200 members, served by 20 ministers in 14 meetinghouses. The total baptized membership in 1958 was 1,700, with 500 scattered throughout Western Canada, not attached to any local meeting. It owns ten meetinghouses and holds Sunday services also at a number of smaller stations. Twenty ministers serve in circuit at all the stations of the congregation in Manitoba. In 1954 Jacob H. Friesen was elected as elder. The main meeting places, all in Manitoba, are located as follows:

Meeting	Post Office
Bergfeld	Plum Coulee
Eigenhof	Gretna
Glencross	Morden
Lowe Farm	Lowe Farm
Neubergthal	Altona
Altona	Altona
Plum Coulee	Plum Coulee
Reinland	Winkler
Winkler	Winkler
Rosenfeld	Rosenfeld
Winnipeg	Winnipeg

There are also two meetinghouses northwest of Portage La Prairie, and a branch in Saskatchewan near Hague, founded about 1940, which now has 300 members with 3 meetinghouses.

Rudolph Christian, Count of East Friesland 1625-28, son of Enno III (q.v.), issued a letter of protection (Schutzbrief) to the Mennonites on May 25, 1626, which became the pattern for all succeeding letters of protection (see Privileges), and which secured to the Mennonites a legal status; the matters of the oath and military service were reserved for a later time. The letter of protection is printed in extenso in ML III, 562 f.

Rudri, a former station of the Mennonite (MC) Mission in Madhya Pradesh, India, situated 4 miles south of Dhamtari. The site of 50 acres was bought by the Mission in 1902. It had been felt by the missionaries then in charge of the orphanages that the boys and girls should live in separate stations; the girls' orphanage was therefore built at Rudri in 1904. In 1912, however, when the Canal Department of the government decided to construct a large irrigation system with Rudri as its headquarters, it requisitioned all the buildings of the station. The mission then moved the orphanage to Balodgahan. The Mission was reluctant to give up Rudri because of its strategic position near a large river and also among villages where evangelistic work could be carried on. The Rudri Christian families moved to Maradeo, owned by an Indian convert, in which settlement is now a small but very active Christian community. A small grove by the riverside one mile from Rudri became the permanent camping place for the annual conferences and meetings for the deepening of spiritual life. G.J.L.

Rueb, a Dutch family of German descent, whose ancestor was Johann Peter Rueb (d. 1707), of Trarbach on the Moselle. His grandson Johannes Stephanus Rueb (d. 1788), a Lutheran, moved to Dordrecht, Holland, where he was a wine merchant. A son of Johannes Stephanus was Christoffel Rueb (1775-1865), a sugar broker at Rotterdam. He married Petronella van Heukelom (1782-1852), a Mennonite of Leiden. Then most of his descendants became Mennonites, including his son Adolph Stephanus Rueb (1805-54), a physician at Utrecht, and the following members, all living at Rotterdam: Pieter Rueb (1810-48), Jan Rueb (1807-71), Pieter Rueb (1812-94), Willem Rueb (1855-1944), Adolph Stephanus Rueb (1880-1948), Pieter Rueb (b. 1888), and Willem Rueb (b. 1917), all of whom served the Rotterdam Mennonite congregation as deacons. At Rotterdam the Rueb family has a vinegar distillery.

Rueg(er), Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, a cabinet-maker of Hallau (q.v.) in the Swiss canton of Schaffhausen, was sentenced to die by the sword on Nov. 13, 1527, (a) because he had permitted himself to be rebaptized and had sheltered Anabaptists; (b) because he had defended the peasant revolt and the insurrection of the vinedressers and fishermen; and (c) because he had bought a small house without having the funds to pay for it in the hope that in the course of the progress of the Gospel such payments as well as interest and tithes would be abolished and all things become common property.

"This is the first death sentence in Schaffhausen pronounced on an Anabaptist and no doubt carried out. We see that in this instance Anabaptism and treason were linked in the charge; to be sure, not a single revolutionary deed could be proved against this poor man, but only some improper words and thoughts, which may have been extorted from him on the rack" (Bächtold, 102). Rues, M. Simeon Friedrich, a German Lutheran clergyman, made a journey through the Netherlands and wrote the book, Aufrichtige Nachrichten von dem gegenwärtigen Zustande der Mennoniten oder Taufgesinnten wie auch der Collegianten oder Reinsburger, beyderseits ansehnlicher kirchlicher Gesellschaften in den vereinigten Niederlanden (Jena, 1743). This important work falls into five divisions: Concerning the Old Flemish or the Frisians, Flemish, Waterlanders, and United; Concerning the dissensions of some Mennonites with the Reformed clergy; Concerning the Collegiants or Rijnsburgers; Concerning the government of Friesland, and the Reformed and other clergy in the United Netherlands. The book was translated into Dutch by Marten Schagen (q.v.) and published with corrections and illustrations in Amsterdam in 1745 under the title Tegenwoordige Staet der Doopsgezinden of Mennoniten in de Vereenigde Nederlanden [en] een Berigt van de Rynsburgers of Collegianten. (DJ 1840, 125; ML III, 563 f.) Ruff, Barbly, was seized on account of her faith in the district of Knonau in Switzerland in 1643. Because she was pregnant she was chained in her brother-in-law's house. After the birth of her child she escaped, but died soon after in consequence of this mistreatment. She was probably a member of the Mennonite Rupp (Ropp) family. (*Mart. Ruisdael (Ruysdael), van, a Dutch family of painters. Isaac de Goyer, or Ruisdael, born 1599 at Naarden, d. 1677 at Haarlem, and his brother Salomon van Ruisdael, born shortly after 1600 at Naarden, d. 1670 at Haarlem, were both Mennonites, but after they moved to Haarlem, Isaac joined the Reformed Church about 1630. Salomon seems always to have been a Mennonite, though it is not known whether he was a loyal member. He purchased his release from civil guard duty. Isaac's son was Jacob van Ruisdael, b. c1628 at Haarlem, d. 1682 at Amsterdam. He was the most outstanding of the Ruisdael family, and his paintings, mostly landscapes, are world-famed. Thieme-Becker asserts that he joined the Reformed Church in 1657, but the records of the Amsterdam Lamist Mennonite Church have an entry showing that both Jacob van Ruisdael and his wife, whose name is not mentioned, were received into the Amsterdam congregation in 1666 upon the presentation of a certification from the Flemish Mennonite Church at Haarlem, signed by the preacher Koenraad van Diepenbroek and the deacons Adriaen van den . . . (illegible) and Mattheus Gryspeer. Jacob van Ruisdael (1629/30-82), the son of Salomon van Ruisdael, was also a Mennonite. He seems to have lived extravagantly, for the Flemish congregation of Haarlem in 1681 offered to pay his board in the city poorhouse. vBZ.

Rümmich (Riemnich), Hans, one of the Anabaptists (see Philippites) who were arrested in Passau (q.v.), Bavaria, on their flight from Moravia in 1533. At his cross-examination on August 30 he confessed that his home was two miles from Schwäbisch-Hall (in Marbach); that in Bruchsal (q.v.) 500 persons had assembled; that he had been baptized by Blasy (see Blasius Kuhn) in Austerlitz (q.v.) about eighteen months previously. He could not be persuaded to recant. His wife Judith confessed that she had been baptized at Heilbronn (q.v.) three years before by Wolf of Gritznis (Griesbach?), who was executed at Pretouw (Bretten, q.v.) on the Rhine. She too remained steadfast. (Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 30 f.; ML III, 564.) W.W.

Rumiantsev, Peter Alexandrovitch (1725-96), was a Russian general and later field marshal who received the honorable name Zadunaysky because he crossed the Danube River in the Russo-Turkish War (1770-74). During this campaign on the border between Moldau (Moldavia) and Poland he met the Hutterian Brethren who had to leave Walachia and were interested in settling in Russia, and invited them to settle on his estates in the Ukraine near Kiev, granting them very favorable privileges.

Under the protection of an officer the Hutterites proceeded through Poland to Vishenka (q.v.), on the Desna River, where they arrived on Aug. 1, 1770. Rumiantsev continued to be their protector and defender until his death in 1796. At this time three Brethren were sent to express their sympathy to the family and to negotiate with the heirs regarding their lease. Because of difficulties with the heirs they left Vishenka in 1802 to settle on crown lands at Radichev (q.v.), where they enjoyed for a while the privileges of the Mennonites of Russia. Later they settled near the Molotschna Mennonite settlement. C.K.

Rump, Ludwig, of Elbing (q.v.), West Prussia, Germany, served in the 18th century as an intermediary between the Dutch Mennonite Committee for Foreign Needs and the Mennonites of East Prussia (then Lithuania) and West Prussia, who repeatedly requested financial support from Holland. The Mennonite Archives at Amsterdam contain some letters by Rump and a statement of account for 1723-43, in which he reports on the gifts of the Dutch Committee which he presented to the Lithuanian and Polish (West Prussian) Mennonites. One of these letters states that he acted as early as 1711. Rump was particularly active in 1726, when a group of 120 Mennonite families, compelled to leave East Prussia, moved to Markushof in West Prussia. Concerning Rump's private life nothing is known. In one of the letters he is called secretary, and a letter written by his widow, dated April 23, 1743, notes that he had died, probably shortly before. vñZ.

Run(c)kel, Johann Ludwig, a friend of the Swiss Mennonites, Dutch ambassador to Switzerland, had his seat first at Schaffhausen and later at Bern as secretary of the embassy. In 1710-11 he took an active interest in the Mennonites, who were subjected to oppression and persecution by the government. The Amsterdam Mennonite archives contain more than 70 letters, documents, and statements of account sent by Runckel to the Dutch Mennonite Committee for Foreign Needs (see Fonds voor Buitenlandsche Nooden). In the first of these letters (Jan. 22, 1710) he alerted the Dutch Mennonites to the plight of the Swiss Mennonites, and from then his detailed letters gave the Committee at Amsterdam an exact idea of the situation, including the names of the prisoners. Runckel acted in the name of the Dutch Mennonites; his authority was based on his function as ambassador of the Dutch States General, whose secretary, François Fagel (q.v.), supported him both morally and financially. Runckel negotiated with the Bernese officials and spoke with the Swiss Mennonites, many of whom were unwilling to leave the country, and distributed to them the money sent by the Dutch Mennonites and the confessions of faith (more than 120 were sent from Holland). With great difficulty he obtained permission for the Mennonites to leave Bern and a guarantee that they could sell their property and take along the money, and undertook the difficult and time-consuming task of administering the whole business. He had previously mediated in the (bootless) plan to colonize the Swiss Brethren in Prussia. It was Runckel's suggestion in his letter of Nov. 8, 1710, to settle all the Swiss Mennonites in the Netherlands, which was adopted by the Dutch Committee and favored by the Dutch States General, and after much negotiation with the Bernese government and the unwilling Mennonites, who being divided by the Ammann-Reist (q.v.) schism refused to move together, Runckel finally saw his great effort crowned by the emigration of a large number of Mennonites to the Palatinate and the Netherlands. Runckel's last letter to the Dutch Committee concerning this matter is dated July 11, 1717. (See also Bern and Swiss Mennonites in the Netherlands.) vñZ.

Rundbriefe (Circle Letters). A fellowship among young German Mennonites was created following World War II through the youth work of the South German Mennonite Conference, which was carried on through a circle letter and occasional fellowship meetings. It reached its height 1938-39, at which time the list of participants totaled 183, distributed as follows: South Germany 74, West and East Prussia and Danzig 17, Berlin 8, Hamburg 14, Germany scattered 19, Holland 19, Poland 9, Switzerland 7, France 1, Paraguay 13, Mexico 2. The movement was subdivided into sub-circles which reached a total of 26, each with 8-10 in intimate fellowship. The publication of the movement was Mitteilungen für die mennonitischen Jugend-Rundbrief-Freunde. The movement was concerned with spiritual renewal on a Biblical basis for individuals and the church. (Condensed from Walter Fellmann's article in ML III, 566.)

Rundschau: see Mennonitische Rundschau.

Rundschau-Kalender, Der, an annual almanac, published 1927-35, at Winnipeg, Man., by the Rundschau Publishing House. In 1935 the almanac section was replaced with a simple calendar for the year. Earlier issues included Bible readings. Beginning in 1929 the Sundays of the church year were named. Serious articles on Mennonite themes by recognized Mennonite Brethren authors mark most of the earlier issues. With the 1933 issue these were replaced by articles of general information. The lists of ministers published in 1927 and 1928 were almost identical with those in the Mennonite Yearbook and Directory (q.v.) for 1926 and 1927. No ministerial lists appeared in 1929 and 1930. Beginning with 1931 ministerial lists and statistical information were restricted to Mennonites of various branches in Western Canada and Mennonites of Russian background in Ontario. With the exception of the first and last issues, each issue had 64 pages. There was a minimum of advertising. N.P.S.

Rupelmonde (Rijpermonde), a town in Belgium, the scene of the execution of the martyrs Hendrik (q.v.) Verstralen and Maeyken (q.v.) Deynoots in 1571. In a letter Verstralen expressed his expectation that the congregation of which he was a member would take care of his wife and children. (Offer, 638; see also 628 note.) This may refer to a congregation of Rupelmonde, but nothing further is known of it. vñZ.

Rupp (Ropp, Ruff), a Mennonite family of Swiss origin. At the disputation at Bern in 1538 (see Bern, section 4) Uli Rupp of Stauffen (probably near Lenzburg in Aargau) and Kläwi Rupp of Signau (see Emmental) are named. In 1540 Hans Rupp, a peasant, is listed among the Anabaptists. Rulandt Rupp, of Lucerne, an Anabaptist, emigrated in 1571. In the early 18th century a Rüby (Rubi) of Frutigen, and a Rupp of Sigriswil moved to Clémont and Montbéliard in 1709, and Hans Rupp, of Gunten near Sigriswil, emigrated to Nijmegen in the Netherlands, and later settled at Deventer. Among the Swiss emigrants to Holland in 1711 were Hans Ruff and Christen Ruff, of Sigriswil, with their families.

In Alsace, Jakob Rupp was living at Markirch (q.v.), and a Christian Rupp of Kühnheim (north of Neuf-Brisach) intervened for the expellees from Switzerland; he may be identical with the Christian Rupp who also settled in Deventer. In 1779 Hans Rub signed the Ordnungsbriege (q.v.) for the Colmar (q.v.) congregation. In 1805 Jakob Rupp was an elder at Colmar. In 1950 the name occurred only in the form Ropp(e). Dr. Martha Ropp, of Mulhouse, was a missionary in Indonesia (Java) c1950.

In the duchy of Berg a Rupp family occurred in the 17th century. Thiell (Thilmann) Rupp, a son of Heinrich Rupp, was named in 1624; in 1638 he was at Oberdollenhof and Obercassel (Löwenberg, q.v., area); in 1650 he settled at Heddesdorf (or Gönnersdorf) near Neuwied (q.v.), joined the young congregation there, and died in 1666. The Privilege (q.v.) granted by the Count of Wied in 1680 names Heinrich Rupp and his sons Thielmann Rupp and Peter Rupp among the founders of the congregation. Heinrich Rupp (1637-after 1700) was the leader of the Neuwied congregation; from 1698 to 1768, when the church was built, a large room in his house served the congregation as a place of meeting. Peter and Thielmann (b. 1649/56) were, however, his brothers and not his sons. Tillmann was the leader of the congregation for 26 years, and his son Leonhard (b. 1683, baptized at Crefeld in 1703) for 18 years; Leonhard's niece Anna (b. 1711) married Lorenz Friedenreich in 1745. In 1837 an endowment by the Rupp family aided the congregation in its period of decline.

In the Palatinate Philipp Raup (or Rupp), of Nussloch near Heidelberg, was tried on May 1, 1529, with other followers of Philipp Plener (q.v.), but remained constant. Some members of the Swiss Rupp family were found later in the Palatinate: in 1717 Peter Rupp in Ludwigshafen (q.v.), 1732 Heinrich Rupp, deacon of the Oberflörsheim (q.v.) congregation, living in Gundersheim near Worms; 1742 Johann Rupp in Heppenheim (q.v.) near Alzey. In 1786 Jakob Rupp, of Heppenheim, exchanged correspondence with Abraham and Rudolph Landes in the Deep Run congregation. In 1936 there was only one Mennonite in the Palatinate with this name.

Some Rups participated in the Mennonite settlement in Bavaria (q.v.). Jakob Rupp, of Odenheim, near Bruchsal, was one of the founders of the Maxweiler (q.v.) congregation (1882); Johann Rupp was a former member of the Eichstock (q.v.) congregation.

Among the Palatine Mennonites who emigrated to Galicia (q.v.) in 1784 f. there were also Rups; Heinrich Rupp (1760-1800), of Harxheim, and Johann Rupp (1745-87), of Alzey, settled in Einsiedel (q.v.) and Rosenberg (q.v.) respectively. Johann's death and burial gave rise to the "cemetery scandal," in which the peasants were compelled by the military to grant him burial in the Greek Catholic cemetery. Peter Bachmann sketched the family trees of both lines of the Rups. Johann Rupp (1849-96) was the first to become a soldier under the law of Dec. 5, 1868; although he was assigned to the hospital corps, his fellow members bade him farewell as if he were doomed to death. The Rups did not share in the emigration to Russia in 1796, but the poorest of them were among the emigrants to America in 1880 ff. The Heinrich Rupp branch of the family was active in the life of the church. Daniel Rupp (1817-1905) was a preacher (1849) and elder (1855) in Horozana wielka (q.v.); in 1909 Heinrich Rupp (b. 1856) was leader of the new congregation at Kiernica-Lemberg (q.v.); Dr. Johann Rupp (b. 1883, portrait ML III) was a founder of the "Mennonite Geselligkeitsverein." Another Heinrich Rupp (1855-1929) was curator of the congregation 1918-21; Jakob Rupp (b. 1877) was a district judge. His cousin Theodor Rupp was a teacher at the Gymnasium and a collaborator on the Mennonitisches Lexikon.

After the departure to the Warthe area in 1939 and west, Richard Rupp (b. 1913), a son of the curator Rupp, took a prominent part in the establishment of the refugee settlement of Backnang (q.v.) in Württemberg.

Rupp and Smith report that Peter Rupp came to America on the "Harle of London" in 1736; Johannes and Peter Rupp on the "Phoenix" in 1749; Johannes and Christian Rupp (Rub!) of Montbéliard on the "Brotherhood" in 1750, and Johann Jonas Rupp of Reihen, near Sinsheim, with the "Phoenix" in 1751. Johann Jonas Rupp settled first in Lebanon County, Pa., and in 1722 moved to Cumberland County opposite Harrisburg. Most of the Mennonite Rups are still found here. In the Slate Hill (q.v.) congregation three served—Henry Rupp (1752-1810), George Rupp (1798-1888), and Henry Rupp (1828-98), the first two as preachers, and the third as a deacon.

The fourth of the fourteen children of George Rupp, who was a son of Johann Jonas Rupp (1729-1801), was Israel Daniel Rupp (q.v., 1803-78), "the father of the local history of the southeastern counties of Pennsylvania"; he was baptized into the Reformed faith by John Weinbrenner (1797-1860, ord. 1820, founder of the Church of God).

In the 19th century a second immigration of Rups to America occurred. The Rups of Maxweiler (q.v.), Bavaria, settled in Lee County, Iowa (q.v.), joining the Zion congregation near Donnellson, in 1866 moved northward into Washington County and in 1874 to Kansas (q.v.), where in 1911 an H. Rupp was an assistant pastor in the Einsiedel congregation near Hanston, and Jacob Rupp, at the age of 84, told the long story of the long journey from Maxweiler to Kansas.

A Rupp-Ropp family of Amish origin settled in Fulton County (q.v.), Ohio (q.v.), and in Illinois and other states of the Midwest. Two important bishops of this family were Andrew and Christian Ropp. Later most members of the family joined the Defenseless Mennonites (now Evangelical Mennonite Church) or the General Conference Mennonites. Among these was Benjamin Rupp, a preacher and leader, first superintendent of the Salem Children's Home (q.v.) and then of the hospital at Bloomington, Ill. E.C.

Rupp, Benjamin (1862-1928), a minister of the Evangelical Mennonite Church, was born Aug. 19, 1862, near Archbold, Fulton Co., Ohio, the son of Jacob Rupp of Switzerland, and Catharine Freienberg of Alsace. Benjamin Rupp was married to Lydia Steiner of Bluffton, Ohio, on Jan. 28, 1886. Three sons and three daughters graced this union: Dennis, Edna, Eldon, Ruth, Libby, and Harvey.

Rupp specialized in dairy farming. He was a member of the Defenseless Mennonite Church, now Evangelical Mennonite Church. He loved music and became chorister in his church and later minister. Soon after his ordination he was called to take charge of a newly founded Orphans' Home at Flanagan, Ill., now known as Salem Children's Home, serving as superintendent 1900-17. He then became superintendent of the Mennonite hospital at Bloomington, Ill., serving 1919-27. In 1926 he was appointed president of the Board of Directors of the Salem Orphanage and served there until his death. In addition he was also engaged in evangelistic work, and served as chairman of the conference for a number of terms. His life was one of continual sacrifice, for he served in most of the above capacities without stipulated pay. He died May 12, 1928, at Flanagan, and was buried in the Waldo cemetery near the church and orphanage he served. E.E.R.

Rupp, Israel Daniel (1803-78), "father of local history in the southeastern counties of Pennsylvania," was born in Cumberland County, Pa., the son of George Rupp, and grandson of Johann Jonas Rupp (a Mennonite) of Reichen near Sinsheim, Baden, Germany, who emigrated to Pennsylvania in 1751. I. D. Rupp was baptized in the Reformed faith. Rupp was a self-taught scholar who learned to read eight or nine languages, was for some 20 years a schoolteacher, but devoted his great energies to a variety of literary, editorial, and research pursuits, the producer of a large number of volumes on Pennsylvania history, translations of eleven works, some large, from German or Dutch into English, and English into German. He published six volumes of history on a total of 23 counties of Pennsylvania, the first being his History of Lancaster County (1844). His He Pasa Ekklesia, An Original History of the Religious Denominations . . . United States (1844), contains the first sketches of Mennonite and Amish history published in America, a short article by Christian Herr on the Mennonites and one by Shem Zook on the Amish. A Collection of Thirty Thousand Names of German . . . Immigrants in Pennsylvania . . . 1727 to 1776 (1856, new ed. 1876) is valuable for Pennsylvania Mennonite immigrant names. His German translation of the Foxe Martyr Book, Geschichte der Märtyrer (Cincinnati, 1830, new ed. 1832), was published in another edition as Allgemeine Geschichte des Christlichen Marterthums in 1840 in Philadelphia, which contained an added lengthy section on Mennonite history (185 pp.) entitled (first part) Geschichte und Lehre der Taufgesinnten (35 pp.) and (second part) Verfolgungen der Mennoniten (150 pp.), the latter taken largely from van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror. The Wandering Soul, edition of Philadelphia 1833, the first in English, was translated by Rupp, as was the edition at Lancaster 1835 of Menno Simons' Foundation and Plain Instruction published by John Herr, the Lampeter (Lancaster County) 1837 edition of the Martyrs' Mirror, published by David Miller, and the Lancaster edition 1849, of the Waldeck Catechism published by the Oberholtzer (GCM) Mennonite group. All of these were the first English editions. Rupp deserves the credit of having introduced these basic Mennonite writings to English-speaking readers. The Funk edition of the Complete Works of Menno Simons (Elkhart, 1871) made use of the Rupp translation of the Foundation and Plain Instruction of 1837 (reprint 1863), with some modifications. Rupp was in general reliable in his writings and rescued a vast amount of information which would otherwise no doubt have been lost.

Rural Missions, evangelism focused on church extension in rural areas: see Home Missions.

Russia, now officially the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR), is the largest country in the world, with an area of 8,358,567 square miles and a population of 203,000,000 (1950). Russia is populated basically by Slavic peoples, although a large number of minority groups are found in the country, some of them belonging to the Mongolian race which invaded Russia from time to time in its early history. Other nationalities have immigrated into Russia, during its early history coming from Scandinavia, and more recently, when rulers were interested in occupying the vast uninhabited areas along the Volga River and in the Ukraine, from Western Europe.

I. Russian Immigration Policy. Already under the rule of Elizabeth "Nine Articles" were drawn up on Sept. 26, 1752, to promote immigration into Russia. On Dec. 4, 1762, Catherine II issued a manifesto inviting foreign settlers from Western European countries to settle in the vast uninhabited areas of Russia, which was followed by the better known second Manifesto of July 22, 1763, patterned after the Potsdam Edict of 1685. Prospective settlers were extended the following rights and privileges: (1) free board and transportation from the Russian boundary to the place of settlement; (2) the right to settle in any part of the country and to pursue any occupation; (3) a loan for the building of houses, etc.; (4) perpetual exemption from military and civil service; (5) exemption from payment of taxes for a period of years; (6) free exercise of religious practices, and to those who founded agricultural settlements, the right to build and control their own schools and churches; (7) the right to do mission work among non-Christians; (8) the right of local self-government for agricultural communities; (9) the right of every family to import its possessions free of duty; (10) to those who established factories with their own capital, the right to buy serfs and peasants.

In order to inaugurate and supervise a large-scale immigration and colonization program, the Bureau of Guardianship of the Foreign Colonists was established. It supervised the work of recruiting colonists (by agents), making land available to them, the actual settling, etc. This Bureau had the status of a separate ministry which was responsible to the empress. Gregory Orlov was its first chairman.

The Manifesto of 1763 was publicized in foreign countries through embassies and agents. In some countries which did not favor emigration the publicity failed. The only countries in which the Russian representatives met no obstacles in making known the colonization policy of their government were the small states of South and West Germany. In some of these there was widespread discontent and a desire for emigration, but even here the number of those who responded to the call was small. In 1764, when the government employed professional agents, the picture changed. Copies of the Manifesto and numerous broadsides were distributed, which created an emigration fever in some of the German states. German settlements were established in the province of St. Petersburg in 1765-66. However, the largest originated along the lower Volga River, where over 100 villages were founded in 1764-67. None of these were Mennonite.

II. Ukraine. The major goal of foreign settlers during the remainder of the 18th century and the beginning of the 19th century was New Russia, later known as the Ukraine (q.v.). This territory, located in South Russia and inhabited only by nomadic peoples and Cossacks, finally came under complete possession of Russia with the annexation of the Crimea in 1783. Beginning in 1774 this territory was administered by the Viceroy Potemkin (q.v.), who was interested in colonizing this largely uninhabited area. Much of the land was granted to court officials, army officers, and government officials. A large number of peasants from central Russia were settled on the Dniepr River. Potemkin's agents tried to induce citizens of Danzig, Albania, Greece, Sweden, and other countries to settle in the Ukraine. Some Greek, Armenian, and Swedish settlers established settlements in 1778-81. In Danzig Potemkin's agent Georg von Trappe began his campaign on June 19, 1786. Some non-Mennonite families established the Old Danzig settlement in the province of Kherson.

About this time the Russian Count Rumiantsev-Zadunaisky (q.v.), who had frequently been through the Mennonite settlements in the vicinity of Danzig, called the attention of the Russian government to them as prospective settlers. Georg von Trappe also called Potemkin's attention to the Mennonites whom he had met. In August 1786 an invitation was extended to the Mennonites, and von Trappe became the chief agent for their immigration into Russia.

At first the Mennonites received this invitation with great reserve in order not to antagonize the Danzig city council, which was opposed to the emigration. Jakob Höppner (q.v.) and Johann Bartsch (q.v.) were sent to Russia to inspect the land and make necessary arrangements for the immigration. After inspecting the proffered land and interviewing Potemkin and Catherine II (May 13, 1787) and other authorities, they returned to report their findings to their constituency. Meanwhile von Trappe had been active in promoting the emigration in Danzig. In a printed broadside dated Dec. 29, 1787 (Menn. Life, April 1951, 37), he praised the conditions of the settlement highly and invited those interested to meet on Jan. 19, 1788, at the Russian Embassy in Danzig. During that year 228 families left for Russia, followed by additional groups, a total of 462 families (B. H. Unruh, 231) who established the first Mennonite settlement, Chortitza (q.v.), in the province of Ekaterinoslav (q.v.) in the Ukraine. The Chortitza settlement is also known as the Old Colony since it was the first settlement. Between 1798 and 1802 the stream of immigrants subsided, until new difficulties in the home country caused a new wave of immigration to Russia.

On Feb. 20, 1804, Alexander I issued another Manifesto. During 1803-6 some 365 Mennonite families went to Russia, some of which stopped at the Chortitza settlement. Beginning in 1804, they settled in the province of Taurida (q.v.) on the Molotschnaya, a river from which the name of the Molotschna settlement (q.v.) was derived, some 100 miles southeast of the Chortitza settlement. From time to time additional groups followed until gradually 60 villages were established. In 1835 the migration to the Molotschna came to a close with an estimated total of 1,200 families or 6,000 persons.

Chortitza and Molotschna constitute the two original Mennonite settlements of the Ukraine; from them most of the daughter settlements in Russia originated.

Although by this time the Russian government was no longer interested in settling foreigners in Russia, two more settlements, with some 500 families, were established in the province of Samara (q.v.), viz., the Trakt (q.v.) settlement (begun in 1855) and the Alexandertal (q.v.) settlement (begun in 1859). The total immigration of Mennonites from Danzig and Prussia to Russia during the years 1788-1870 was about 2,300 families, of whom approximately 462 families went to Chortitza, 1,200 to the Molotschna, and 500 to Samara; 80 families supposedly remained in Vilna on their way to the Ukraine. B. H. Unruh (230) estimates that the total number of immigrants was 10,000. These families came from the following communities and churches: Danzig, Marienburg, Elbing, Tiegenhof, Heubuden, Orloff, Ladekopp, Fürstenwerder, Rosenort, and Tiegenhagen. By no means all the immigrants were experienced farmers. Particularly the first group settling in Chortitza was largely composed of poorer laborers, primarily because it was harder for the well-to-do class to obtain permission to leave the country. The Molotschna and Samara settlements, having numerous prosperous and experienced farmers and better land, made more rapid progress economically and culturally than did Chortitza.

III. Reasons for Migration. The Mennonites of Danzig (q.v.) and Prussia (q.v.) had always been a minority in their homeland, tolerated at times because of the economic advantages which the rulers derived from them and at other times oppressed because of their peculiar religious views, their unwillingness to serve in the army, and their rapid spread in the rural areas. In the early days they had been welcomed as good farmers who drained and cultivated the uninhabited swamps of the Vistula River. As Mennonites, however, they were not considered full-fledged citizens. At any time when their service was not needed they were oppressed. The occupations open to them were restricted from time to time (see Danzig Edict of Nov. 10, 1749, Menn. Life, April 1951, 36). In 1789 a new "Mennonite Edict" prohibited the Mennonites from purchasing new land, basically because the Mennonites with their large families were buying large quantities of land and thus weakening the rural manpower available for military service. In 1748 the Mennonites in 21 villages of the Werder possessed 392 Hufen (a Hufe is about 40 acres) of the 2,418 of this territory; by 1788 they owned 683 Hufen, thus in 40 years nearly doubling their holdings. In 1772 they purchased a total of 400 farms in Prussia. In 1783-87 the number of families increased from 2,240 to 2,894, which was an increase of 654 families or 3,083 persons in four years (H. Quiring, Menn. Life, April 1951, 37).

Thus the reasons for the great interest of the Mennonites of the Vistula River in emigration become apparent. Their rapid increase in numbers, combined with the restrictions in the purchase of land and the occupations open to them, in addition to the uncertainties regarding the preservation of their religious heritage, e.g., the practice of nonresistance, induced them to consider invitations to other countries.

The Mennonites, however, as noted above, were not the first to receive the invitation to settle in Russia. Catherine II and her agents had tried to attract citizens of many other countries before their attention was called to the Mennonites. And the Mennonites never constituted more than a minority in the total number of immigrants coming to Russia from Germany and other countries. The total population of people of German descent in Russia during World War I was estimated somewhere around 2,000,000, of whom only some 100 to 120 thousand (5 per cent) were Mennonites. Special "privileges" accorded Mennonites when they went to Russia have probably been overstated. There was, to be sure, some variation in the conditions under which settlements in general were established, but they were probably not due to the fact of differing religious faith (Mennonite or non-Mennonite). Even exemption from military service, which had already been offered as an inducement in the Manifesto of 1763, was granted also to non-Mennonite settlers. The ultimate differences in treatment between the Mennonites and others were possibly due rather to the fact that the Mennonites, because of their deeply rooted religious convictions, more persistently claimed exemption from military service when this "privilege" was threatened. However, 1874-80 when one third of all Mennonites from Russia moved to the United States and Canada, many thousands of non-Mennonite Russo-Germans including Catholics, Lutherans, Reformed, and Pietists also moved to North and South America partly because of the loss of their "privileges."

IV. Privileges and Administration. The rights, privileges, and administration of the foreign settlers were not stable and uniform throughout all times nor for all settlements. In general the settlers were under the laws and jurisdiction specifically made for "foreign colonists," who were originally responsible to the Bureau of Guardianship of Foreign Colonists, which had its quarters in St. Petersburg. In 1818 a Fürsorge-Komitee (q.v.; Guardian's Committee) was established by the Russian government, with its seat first at Kherson, later at Ekaterinoslav, and finally at Odessa, which was originally subject to the Minister of Interior. In 1871 the Fürsorge-Komitee was abolished and the foreign settlers including the Mennonites became subject to the local authorities of their respective districts. The German system of self-administration under a Schulze (q.v.) in the village and an Oberschulze (q.v.) of the settlement was practiced by the Mennonites from the beginning until the Revolution of 1917 removed all semblance of privilege and independence from the Mennonites of Russia.

The basic condition under which all colonists were admitted to Russia was Catherine's Manifesto of July 22, 1763 (for a complete text, see D. H. Epp, Chortitzer Mennoniten, 1889, 3). In general this remained the policy for all settlements, although the conditions were not always so generous. In recent times, particularly in America, the charge has been made that the Mennonites of Russia promised not to do any evangelistic or missionary work in Russia.

The fact is, however, that none of the Mennonite "privileges" contained such a restriction. Hence this charge must have reference to the original Manifesto of 1763, which states (VI, 1) that the foreign colonists settling in Russia were to have the right to exercise their religion freely in accord with their church rules and practices without any molestation, but that "everyone is warned that none of the Christian believers residing in Russia should under any pretext be persuaded or misled to accept or join the faith and the church" of the foreign colonists. This restriction is followed by a statement that "all the nationalities of the Mohammedan faith living within Russia can be persuaded to accept the Christian religion without any restriction." This makes it clear that the restriction was meant to protect the Russian Orthodox Church against proselytizing, but that the foreign settlers had ample opportunity to do mission work among non-Christian citizens of Russia. This Manifesto was dated 1763, and the first agreement made between the Mennonite settlers and the Russian government was dated March 3, 1788, which was 25 years later. Neither this first agreement of 1788 nor any of the following contains a clause restricting mission work in Russia. It is likely that very few Mennonites who settled in Russia ever heard of the restricting clause of the Manifesto of 1763.

The twenty articles (German text in D. H. Epp, 25 ff.) which Höppner and Bartsch presented to Potemkin and which were later confirmed by the government in St. Petersburg including Catherine II contain the terms under which the Mennonites would come to Russia; the first deals with religious freedom, the second with the settlement conditions, the third and fourth with tax exemptions, the fifth and sixth with the development of industry and a loan by the government, the seventh and eighth with the guarantee of freedom of religion and exemption from military service for "eternal ages." The remaining articles, the ninth to the twentieth, deal with the details of travel to Russia and the settlement there. On the margins the government representatives approved or qualified the requests. Articles seven and eight, pertaining to the guarantee of religious freedom and exemption from military service "for all times," are thus annotated, "This shall be done in accordance with their practice" and "they shall be exempted from military service." In 1800 the Mennonites of Russia received a Privilegium under Czar Paul I confirming the rights they had received before (printed by D. H. Epp, 97). Special rights were given to the Mennonites who settled later in the province of Samara.

V. Early Developments (1789-1850). The Chortitza settlement, being the first, established in an entirely new environment, under the most primitive conditions differing greatly from those of the Vistula Delta, and by settlers who were poor and inexperienced in agriculture, underwent the greatest hardships, affecting the economic, cultural, and religious life. The leaders Bartsch (q.v.) and Höppner (q.v.) were not trusted, and there were no ordained religious leaders. Only under the greatest privations were the early difficulties of pioneering overcome. The promises of the government were either not fulfilled at all or not according to schedule. Theft by officials was common. The Molotschna settlers, many of whom had stopped at the Chortitza settlement, gained much information and experience and settled under more favorable conditions. Many of them were more prosperous to begin with and of a better cultural and spiritual background. This second settlement soon made greater cultural, economic, and religious advances.

A great promoter was Johann Cornies (q.v.; 1789-1848). Through his personal work and as the chairman of the Agricultural Association (q.v.) he did much to improve the economic and educational life of both settlements, particularly of the Molotschna. Gradually the Mennonites shifted the emphasis from the raising of cattle, sheep, and horses to that of grains, particularly winter wheat. Primitive agricultural machinery was replaced by advanced implements produced in Mennonite factories. Chortitza (q.v.), Alexandrovsk (q.v.), Halbstadt (q.v.), and Orloff (q.v.) were leading towns in industrial enterprises and in cultural development. By the time of the death of Johann Cornies the foundation for this development had been laid. But in the matter of providing settlement opportunities for the landless (q.v.) population of both settlements only a beginning had been made by a spear-heading group. The conservative landowning class of farmers did not yet realize their responsibility toward the less fortunate majority of the population of both settlements. Only gradually was the traditional system of mutual aid broadened, which enabled the Mennonites of Russia to establish many daughter settlements not only in the Ukraine, but also in other provinces of European Russia and Siberia, through co-operative purchase of land and loans to new settlers.

In educational and religious practices the pioneers in Russia were extremely conservative, preserving the practices of the old homeland. Ministers read their sermons monotonously. Very little progress was made in challenging the congregations and individuals in their ethical and religious practices and in awakening their social, missionary, and evangelistic responsibilities. The schools were primitive and restricted to the teaching and reading of the Bible and Bible stories, the catechism, the primer, and elementary arithmetic. Teachers were poorly prepared and the school buildings and equipment inadequate.

VI. Daughter Settlements. The number of landless (q.v.) Mennonites increased from generation to generation, particularly since the government did not permit the subdivision of a farm, which consisted as a rule of 176 acres (65 dessiatines). The large surplus land tracts in connection with the settlements were generally rented by the well-to-do farmers. The landless usually obtained a small parcel of land at one end of the village and worked as farm hands, industrial workers, etc. They were known as Anwohner (q.v.). A typical situation was that in the Molotschna settlement in 1865, when there were 1,384 landed farmers and 2,356 landless workers in the villages. Only the landowners, comprising less than one third of the population, had civic and economic rights; the other two thirds had none. A committee known as the Landlosen-Kommission (q.v.) was formed in 1863 to represent the cause of the landless and appeal to the Fürsorge-Komitee for remedial action. Finally the surplus land of the Molotschna settlement was distributed among the landless. In addition to this, a fund was established for the purchase of land for oncoming generations. By painful experience the Mennonites of the Molotschna and Chortitza learned to help and to provide for the new generations of landless by establishing daughter colonies.

J. Ewert's study of the increase of the population and the land owned by Mennonites from 1789 to 1910 reveals that approximately 8,500 (the estimate is now 10,000) immigrants established the Chortitza, Molotschna, Alexandertal, and Trakt settlements, which had a population of 34,500 by 1859, while the occupied land area remained the same, viz., 501,400 acres. After the great emigration of the Mennonites to America in 1874-80, the population again rapidly increased. In 1910 Ewert estimated the population of Mennonites in Russia as 100,000, owning a total acreage of 1,798,948, or an average of 18 acres per family (Der Praktische Landwirt, December 1926, No. 12, pp. 12 ff.). (Some estimates are higher. See ME I, 25.) Adolf Ehrt estimates that in 1860 the Mennonites averaged 14 acres per person, and in 1914 16 acres. However, this land increase took place primarily in the daughter settlements. The acreage of the mother settlements remained more or less unchanged (Ehrt, 84). In 1860 the mother colonies owned seven times as much land as the daughter colonies, and in 1914 they owned equal amounts (Ehrt, 83).

The increase in property owned by the Mennonites of Russia can be estimated from the taxation for the maintenance of the forestry service or alternative service program. The records reveal that in 1908 the reported property value was 194,000,000 rubles, while by 1914 this had increased to 276,000,000 rubles (Ehrt, 70). No doubt this is an underestimate, since probably not all persons had been reached by the census. Land holdings by Mennonites increased proportionally beyond the growth of the population. The large increase of land ownership was partly due to the purchase of scattered large estates outside the main settlements. Before World War I there were 384 large Mennonite estate owners, who owned 810,000 acres, making an average of 283 acres; the average evaluation of such an estate in 1914 was 200,000 rubles. The large estate owners, though numbering only 1.9 per cent of the Mennonite population, contributed one third of the total, or 80,000 rubles, annually for the maintenance of the forestry service on the basis of an assessment on owned land. The largest Mennonite estate consisted of 50,000 acres (Ehrt, 87).

During the second half of the 19th century the establishment of daughter settlements was restricted primarily to European Russia, first in the territories immediately surrounding the two settlements, then in the Crimea, then in the foothills of the Caucasian Mountains, and later (after 1890 except for Turkestan 1882, 1884) in the eastern provinces of Central European Russia, such as Orenburg, and in Asiatic Russia. Following is a list of the settlements with name, province, the year of founding, number of villages, acreage, and population. Separate articles on each of the settlements are to be found in the ENCYCLOPEDIA. The Russian names, usually Germanized, appear here in an Anglicized form, while the German ones have been retained. Explanation Regarding Russian Poland and Hutterian Brethren. Mennonites living in the Vistula Delta area gradually moved up the river into Poland, and Swiss Mennonites from Alsace-Lorraine and South Germany settled in Poland. Some of these settlements shared the political fate of Poland (q.v.) and passed under Russian rule in the Partitions of Poland (1772-95) when Russian Poland was established (1815) and when it became a Russian province (1836-1914).

The Prussian Mennonites established Deutsch-Wymysle (q.v.), Deutsch-Kazun (q.v.), and Wola-Orczynska (q.v.) at Plock, all near Warsaw; Karolswalde (q.v.) near Ostrog in Volhynia (six villages); and Michalin (q.v.) in the province of Kiev.

The Swiss Mennonites established the settlements of Vignanka-Futtur (q.v.) at Dubno in Volhynia, Michelsdorf-Urszulin (q.v.) near Lublin in Poland, Eduardsdorf-Zahoriz at Dubno in Volhynia, Horodyszcze (three villages) at Novograd-Volynsk in Volhynia, and Kotozufka-Neumanufka at Novograd-Volynsk in Volhynia (two villages). All of the Swiss and most of the Prussian Mennonites of Volhynia and Russian Poland went to the United States in the 1870's when the universal conscription law was introduced in Russia. Contact between the Mennonites of Russian Poland and those of Russia proper was infrequent. Some from Russian Poland later settled in the Molotschna, through whom a contact was established (see also Waldheim and Poland).

The first settlers of the Anabaptist-Mennonite family to enter Russia were the Hutterites (q.v.), who established themselves on the estate Vishenka (q.v.) of Count Rumiantsev (q.v.), on the Desna River in the Ukraine, in 1770. The basis of this settlement was originally a private arrangement between the landowner and the Hutterites. Later the Hutterites shared in the Mennonite privileges and were treated similarly. Soon the Bruderhof was moved to the crown land of Raditchev, whence the Hutterites transferred to the Molotschna settlement near Melitopol, establishing the villages of Huttertal, Johannesruh, Hutterdorf, and Neu-Huttertal. All the Hutterites emigrated to the United States in 1874-77.

VII. Period of Growth and Achievement (1850-1917). The reason for the rapid spread of the Mennonite settlements in Russia was their increase in population. Ehrst comes to the conclusion that of the 120,000 Mennonites in Russia after World War I, 75,000 were found in the Ukraine and 45,000 in the other parts of Russia including Siberia. His analysis was based on the statistics of the AMLV (q.v.). In 1926 there were 19,267 Mennonites living in Siberia, 1,545 in Turkestan, 4,017 in the Crimea, 3,246 at the foothills of the Caucasian Mountains, 7,596 in the province of Samara, 5,655 in the Volga region, and 2,175 scattered, or a total of 44,304 in the RSFSR (USSR outside of the Ukraine). His statistics, based on the official report of the KfK of 1926, give a total of 46,830 for the Ukraine, which makes the total of 91,134 in all USSR for the year 1926, in spite of the emigration of over 20,000 Mennonites to America 1922-26 (Ehrst, 152 ff.).

What is the Mennonite population of Russia today? No definite answer can be given to this question. However, here is an estimate. In 1920 the Mennonites of Russia had a population of about 120,000. Annually there was an increase of around 3,000. By 1929 Ehrst (159) estimates that there had been an increase of 20,700. However, a total of some 23,000 left for America (1923-29), leaving a population of 117,800 in 1929. On this basis we could continue with the estimate that the population normally increased by 3,000 annually. During the years of exile and disrupted family life the increase declined and there may actually have been times when the loss, due to concentration camps, etc., was greater than the increase. In spite of the great loss during the exile and evacuation and the reduced increase because of the separation of the families and the emigration of some 12,000 to Canada and South America in connection with World War II, the total population of Mennonite descent, although many may have given up their identity in belief and culture, may possibly be estimated at about 100,000.

Hand in hand with the expansion of the population and the establishment of new settlements went the total economic development of the Mennonites of Russia. The improvement of agricultural machinery enabled the Mennonites to produce hard winter wheat on a large scale. A prosperous milling industry and the establishment of many businesses enabled them to market their products. The Mennonites were by no means restricted to rural occupations. Towns like Chortitza, Alexandrovsk, Halbstadt, Berdyansk, Ekaterinoslav, and Millerovo had become centers of Mennonite industry. Of all the businesses and industries owned and operated by Mennonites before World War I, 30 per cent were located in Chortitza. Of the total production of agricultural machinery produced in the Ukraine, 10 per cent was produced in Mennonite factories, while of the total output in Russia, 6.2 per cent was produced in Mennonite factories. By 1914 the commercialized or capitalistic enterprises of the Mennonites of Russia in agriculture, industry, and business had grown considerably, consisting of one third of the total Mennonite capital investment. This means that two thirds still followed the traditional agricultural pattern with some additional small home industries, while one third had gone over to large-scale capitalistic enterprises. Only 2.8 per cent of the population were the bearers of this commercialized and capitalistic tendency, owning three fourths of the total Mennonite capital (Ehrt, 91-96). (See Agriculture Among the Mennonites of Russia, Business, and Industry.)

The general cultural achievement of the Mennonites ran parallel with their economic progress. Schools, hospitals, and other institutions designed for public service were established. Centers of cultural progress were found in Gnadenfeld, Orloff, and Halbstadt, all in the Molotschna; and in Chortitza. Progressive leadership in education and spiritual life broke the lethargy of the early days and ushered in a well-developed educational system which had been inaugurated by Johann Cornies before 1847. Among the pioneer educators were Tobias Voth, Heinrich Heese, Heinrich Franz I, and Fr. W. Lange. The first secondary schools (see Zentral-schule) were established in Orloff, Gnadenfeld, and Chortitza. Various organizations promoted the educational institutions and standards among the Mennonites, particularly in the early days the Fürsorge-Komitee, the Agricultural Association, and the Molotschnaer Mennonitischer Schulrat (q.v.).

Problems in connection with education arose when the Russianization policy of the government gradually subjected the Mennonite educational system to the Department of Education of Russia. This speeded up and reinforced the desire of many in the 1870's to emigrate to North America. All of the school subjects, with the exception of Bible and German literature, came gradually to be taught in the Russian language. In 1920 the Mennonites of Russia had about 450 elementary schools with about 16,000 pupils, and 27 secondary schools (Zentralschulen) with about 2,000 pupils and a teaching staff of 100.

With the Revolution of 1917 and the introduction of the antireligious Marxian philosophy in education, the Mennonite educational system was gradually wiped out. Many of the teachers emigrated to America, were exiled, or chose another vocation. Some adjusted themselves to the Soviet philosophy. The well-developed educational system produced by the Mennonites of Russia, which has never been equaled anywhere else among Mennonites, disintegrated (see Education Among the Mennonites in Russia).

Religious life among the Mennonites of Russia was on a comparatively low plane at the outset. Leadership was lacking and had to be selected from an untrained constituency which at times also lacked spiritual qualities. Gradually, with the help of the mother church of Prussia, the church life was organized and made some progress. One of the earliest schisms took place when Klaas Reimer (q.v.) of the Molotschna, an ultraconservative leader, separated and organized the Kleine Gemeinde (q.v.) in 1814.

Progressive leadership and a more vital religious life came through some of the groups who immigrated to Russia later and established villages and congregations such as Gnadenfeld in the Molotschna. They introduced the practice of abstinence, mission festivals, and other pietistic and evangelistic views. Some of these Mennonites who came from Prussia had been in contact with the Moravian Brethren of Germany. Another source of influence came from Eduard Wüst (q.v.), who was a Württemberg Pietist and the minister of an Evangelische Brüdergemeinde at Neuhoftnung near Berdyansk. He promoted evangelism, mission festivals, prayer meetings, etc. Some of the Mennonite leaders, e.g., Cornelius Jansen, Bernhard Harder, and August Lenzmann, were his personal friends. Soon his sermons were attended by Mennonites, and he was also at times invited to preach in the Mennonite villages. A strong emphasis on a personal acceptance of salvation and conversion was typical of his preaching. A group of eighteen heads of families in the village of Gnadenfeld who had been influenced by Wüst asked their elder August Lenzmann to administer the Lord's Supper to them as a special group. When he denied the request, this group of eighteen not only observed the Lord's Supper independently, but also drew up a document (Jan. 6, 1860) stating why they desired to start a new church. This act was the official founding of the Mennonite Brethren Church (q.v.). Through the Baptists this group was further influenced in certain religious practices, e.g., the introduction of baptism by immersion (q.v.). The struggle between this group and the leaders of the old church continued for a while during which time both sides made mistakes and expressed more zeal than brotherly love. The new group was extreme in denouncing the church from which they had seceded, and some of the Mennonite leaders took an unbrotherly attitude toward the new group. Among those who did much to improve the relationship were Johann Harder (q.v.), Bernhard Harder (q.v.), and Leonhard Sudermann (q.v.). These were the men who favored a more spontaneous expression of the joy of salvation and newer methods of promoting the Gospel, similar to the founders of the General Conference Mennonite Church which had originated slightly earlier in North America and was led by men like John Oberholtzer, Christian Schowalter, Daniel Hoch, and Daniel Hege.

The growth of the Mennonite Brethren group in Russia was notable. In 1888, 95.7 per cent of all Mennonites of Russia belonged to the Mennonite Church, while 4.3 per cent belonged to the Mennonite Brethren Church and other groups (Ehrt, 61). In 1925-26 74.9 per cent belonged to the Mennonite Church while 22.5 per cent belonged to the Mennonite Brethren and 2.6 per cent to other groups. The growth of the Mennonite Brethren is particularly noticeable in the daughter settlements. In 1925-26 81.2 per cent of the total Mennonite population of the Ukraine, in which the mother settlements were located, belonged to the Mennonite Church, 15.5 to the Mennonite Brethren, and 3.3 to other groups. In the RSFSR, that is, the rest of Russia outside of the Ukraine, consisting primarily of daughter settlements, the percentage differed considerably. To the Mennonite Church belonged 60.5 per cent, to the Mennonite Brethren 38.2 per cent, and to other groups 1.3 per cent. This makes it clear that the strongest increase in Mennonite Brethren, which was due primarily to winning members from the Mennonite Church, was found in the daughter settlements. It could also indicate that the Mennonite Brethren of the mother settlements were more active in the establishment of daughter settlements (Ehrt, 85).

Bible study, prayer meetings, song festivals, evangelistic meetings, publication efforts, conference organizations were among the results of this general spiritual revival, which gradually affected all the Mennonites of Russia. The Allgemeine Bundeskonferenz der Mennonitengemeinden in Russland (q.v.), founded in 1883, was also attended from 1906 and officially from 1910 by the Mennonite Brethren, who had their own conference from 1872. Beginning in 1910 a Kommission für Kirchenangelegenheiten (q.v.), usually called KfK, functioned as the executive committee of the Bundeskonferenz.

Other new groups which originated in Russia were the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren (q.v.) in 1869, the Mennonite section of the Temple Church (q.v.) or Friends of Jerusalem in 1863, the followers of Hermann Peters (q.v.) in 1866, and the Evangelische Mennoniten-Gemeinden (q.v.) in 1905. Another result of the general pietistic influence was the migration of Mennonites from the Molotschna and the Trakt under the leadership of Abraham Peters (q.v.) and Claas Epp (q.v.) to Central Asia (q.v.) in 1880 to avoid all military or alternative service and to meet the Lord at a designated place of refuge in the East.

Two of the most disturbing factors during the second half of the 19th century were the introduction of a universal military conscription law and the inauguration of a general program of Russianization of foreign settlers in Russia. They caused one third of all Mennonites of Russia to leave for the United States and Canada in 1874-80. Only the compromise of the Russian government in granting the Mennonites the privilege of fulfilling their state obligations in forestry service (q.v.) prevented a more or less general exodus. Some 18,000 Mennonites went to North America, where the largest Mennonite settlements were established in Kansas (q.v.) and Manitoba (q.v.). The Manitoba settlers were primarily from Chortitza (q.v.), Fürstenland (q.v.), and Berg-thal (q.v.), some of which became known as the Old Colony Mennonites (q.v.), most of whom later went to Mexico because of their ultraconservative attitudes. The Mennonites settling in the United States were primarily those coming from the Molotschna settlement, Prussia, Russian Poland, and Galicia, including the Hutterites, most of whom went to Canada after 1918. The Mennonites remaining in Russia fulfilled their duty toward the government in forestry service and also in World War I in part in hospital service. Even under the Soviet government they were for a while exempted from military service; this privilege was rescinded c1935.

At the beginning of the 20th century the need for educated ministers had grown to the extent that the advisability of establishing a theological seminary was repeatedly discussed. The same was true regarding the publication efforts. The anti-German feeling of the Russian government was not conducive to the promotion of these plans. Young men received their education more and more in Germany and Switzerland at Bible schools, theological seminaries, and universities. Some studied at Russian universities. Semiofficial periodicals such as the Botschafter (q.v.) and the Friedensstimme (q.v.) and almanacs served the constituency after 1903-5 with interruptions.

VIII. Under Communism (1917-57). The overthrow of the Czarist government, the Civil War, and the ultimate establishment of the Communist regime starting in October 1917 caused most radical changes for the Mennonites of Russia. The first period was characterized by the Civil War, confiscation and nationalization of property, starvation, and general confusion, which ended with the full working establishment of the Communist government.

The Mennonite way of life was undermined in its basis by laws like the following issued April 8, 1929: "Religious organizations are forbidden to (a) organize mutual aid and co-operatives; (b) give material support to church members; (c) organize special meetings for children, youth, women, and prayer, and other meetings as well as general Bible literature, sewing societies, work groups and religious instruction groups, circles, and arrange for excursions and entertainment for children, for libraries and reading materials, and to organize hospitals and medical aid."

At the General Conference meeting of the Mennonites of Russia which took place in Moscow in January 1925, the following eight points were stated as the minimum requirement for the Mennonites to survive: (1) undisturbed religious meetings and discussions in church and private homes for adults and children; (2) undisturbed religious societies, choirs, instruction in religion and doctrines especially for children and youth; (3) undisturbed founding of Mennonite orphanages with Christian education; (4) undisturbed erection of new church buildings and the exemption of church and ministers from special taxes; (5) undisturbed acquisition of Bibles and aids and other Christian literature including periodicals for the congregations; (6) undisturbed Bible courses conducted for the preparation and the deepening of the knowledge of ministers; (7) recognition of the schools as a neutral territory where neither religious nor antireligious propaganda takes place and where exclusively knowledge is taught by teachers who have freedom in their private life; (8) exemption from military service and basic military preparation, the granting of a useful alternative service, and exemption from the oath for Mennonites who make a simple promise. A conference resolution made the following assertion: "These eight points of the KfK in the memorandum to the Central Executive Committee of the USSR regarding the fundamental questions of Mennonite church life the meeting considers the minimum prerequisite for the continued existence of the Mennonites as a religious fellowship." This request was declined, but the conference appealed again to the government on Jan. 16, 1925, the petition closing with these words, "Give us our children, give us freedom to train and educate them in accord with the commands of our conscience" (Ehrt, p. 141 f.). These were some of the last organized efforts of the Mennonites of Russia to obtain rights to continue their religious life in accord with their basic beliefs.

At this time (1922-27) some 20,000 Mennonites left Russia since they saw no hope for a better future. Exemption from military service was still possible for a time, possibly until 1930-35. Each individual had to apply for exemption and each case was separately examined by a court. The questions which the court decided were whether the religious group to which the applicant belonged actually were conscientious objectors, and whether the applicant actually believed and lived in accord with this tradition. If he was exempted, he could do alternative service. The Soviet law made ample provision for exemption from military service, which other groups besides Mennonites, such as the Dukhobors, followers of Tolstoy, and Baptists made use of. However, soon the practice was found to be in conflict with the original democratic theory. Ehrt reports that of 131 young Mennonites who applied for exemption in 1925, only 64 were freed, 20 accepted full military service, and 47 were imprisoned. Of 22 young men imprisoned in the Caucasus area, four died of typhoid fever and 14 were shot. In 1926 there were 70 Mennonite young men imprisoned in Kiev who were to be sent to forced labor camps because of their objecting to military service (Ehrt, 143 ff.). The alternative service camps resembled slave labor camps in severity of treatment and difficulty of physical survival. In the beginning of the 1930's it became almost impossible to be exempted from military service. Gradually young men were forced to serve in the regular army. No organized spiritual fellowship was possible since the leaders and the ministers had been exiled. Whether and to what an extent some of the young men refused in these years to serve in the army is not yet known. When Hitler invaded the Ukraine, a systematic effort was made to remove from the Red army all people of German background including the Mennonites, although some remained in the army in spite of this effort.

Stalin's harsh program of collectivization and exile caused some 13,000, not all Mennonites, to flee to Moscow in 1929, of whom only some 5,000 were permitted to leave, settling mostly in Brazil (q.v.) and Paraguay (q.v.), although perhaps 1,000 got to Canada. The ruthless destruction of the Mennonite religious and cultural life was a part of the total program of dictatorship, through which many families were disrupted by exile and death, particularly among the leaders such as ministers and teachers.

With the outbreak of hostilities between Russia and Germany in 1941, an attempt was made to send eastward the remaining German-speaking males west of the Volga, including Mennonites. When the German army invaded the Ukraine, an attempt was made to move all the Mennonites (Germans) of the Ukraine to the east of the Dnieper River. This attempt was only partially successful. Most of the Chortitza Mennonites remained in German-occupied territory. During this time the cultural and religious life was restored to some extent but only for a short time (1941-43), and some of the churches were again being closed. When the German front collapsed in Russia and the retreat began, the remaining Mennonite population of the Ukraine was evacuated by the retreating German army by trains or wagon caravans starting in the fall of 1943 with the goal of settling them in the Warthegau (q.v.), former western Poland, along the Vistula River, near the general area where they had come from 150 years before. With the collapse of Hitler's empire, these Mennonites fled westward; one third ultimately reached Canada and South America; the majority, however, were returned to Russia and only a very few remained in Germany. It is estimated that some 35,000 Mennonites were taken along to Germany by the German army in 1943, of whom nearly two thirds were forcibly repatriated by the Red army, while one third or some 12,000 went to Canada and Paraguay, where they established the Volendam (q.v.) and Neuland (q.v.) settlements. Meanwhile many have left South America and joined their relatives in Canada. Many of the Russian Mennonite men were drafted into the German army in 1941-45. Practically all the Russian Mennonites in the Warthegau, together with other Russian Germans, were naturalized en masse by the German authorities in 1943.

Since the death of Stalin (1955), conditions in Russia have somewhat changed. During the last years the picture is becoming clearer as to what happened to those Mennonites who remained in Russia and those who were sent back to Russia from Germany. The original assumption that the Chortitza and Molotschna settlements as well as the daughter settlements of the Ukraine were severely damaged and that no Mennonites remained there has been proved correct. But there are some indications that a few families have returned since Stalin's death, since there is greater freedom for the civilians to move about. In some of the settlements east of the Volga like Orenburg, Pleshanovo, and particularly in Siberia, large numbers have been allowed to remain in their original homes. To some extent they have retained some phases of their cultural and religious life, which is illustrated by the fact that conversions and baptismal and worship services have taken place quite regularly during the last several years. A large concentration of the exiled, evacuated, and uprooted Mennonites is noticeable in the Asiatic Russian regions and territories immediately east of the Ural Mountains in Soviet Central Asia (q.v.), especially Kazakh S.S.R. etc., and Siberia (q.v.). The old Mennonite settlements of Slavgorod (q.v.), Omsk (q.v.), and Pavlodar (q.v.) have been relatively undisturbed as geographic units. Karaganda has become the center of a large congregation. The settlements in Old and New Samara and the Caucasus were also completely destroyed.

It can be estimated that Russia again had a total of 100,000 Mennonites at the time when Hitler invaded the Ukraine (1941) in spite of the fact that some 25,000 had migrated to America. Of these 100,000 probably one fifth was exiled under Stalin, and one fourth was evacuated eastward when the German army invaded Russia in 1941. This would mean that 45,000 of the 100,000 Mennonites were either in forced labor camps or evacuated to uninhabited places by the time of the outbreak of World War II in Russia. There were still some 35,000 Mennonites left in the Ukraine who were taken along by the German army in 1943. Of these some 23,000 were repatriated and sent to uninhabited places, primarily to Asiatic Russia. This would indicate that of the 100,000 Mennonites living in Russia today, only some 30,000 live in their former home communities; the majority are scattered all over the Ural region and farther east. Many of them spent ten to twenty years in labor or concentration camps.

Typical as to the number of people exiled is the Chortitza Mennonite settlement (q.v.). In 1929-41, 1,456 Mennonites of the total population of 13,965 were exiled. The worst years were 1929-30 and 1937-38. In 1929, 153 were exiled; in 1930, 244; in 1937, 361; and in 1938, 465. Of the 1,456, 1,148 were men, 43 were women, and 44 were young people. It is not known where 973 of them were sent. Six were sent to the Far East, 18 to Siberia, 332 to the Ural Mountains, 4 to Kazakhstan, 66 to the northern parts of European Russia, 6 to Central Russia, and 57 to Southern Russia (Stump).

These camps were scattered all over European and Asiatic Russia. Dallin and Nicolaevsky listed 125 camps or clusters of camps while B. Yakovlev listed 165, some of which were clusters of camps. Both sources state that their lists are incomplete. There was hardly a part of Russia which did not have camps. Dallin and Nicolaevsky subdivided the camps according to geographic location and listed 58 camps in European Russia, many of which were located in the northern region. In Asiatic Russia they listed 67 camps located in western, northern, and eastern Siberia, and Central Asia. Since the days when Stalin developed these labor camps, some changes have taken place. Many of the camps have been closed. Recently those who have served their terms in camps or had been forcibly settled at places have obtained greater liberties to move about. On the other hand, it is clear that Khrushchev places great emphasis on settling uninhabited places in Asiatic Russia. Of particular interest to him is the Kazakh S.S.R. in Soviet Central Asia (q.v.), where a great increase in population is being reported. Many people settled here "voluntarily." It has become apparent that many of the Mennonites are now located in the Kazakh S.S.R. and other parts of Soviet Central Asia. No doubt many were sent there when they were repatriated, others were exiled into that region, still others may have been attracted to this area because of the concentration of Mennonites here. It can be assumed that of the Mennonites in the U.S.S.R. today, some 80 per cent are located east of the Ural Mountains and some 20 per cent in European Russia, of whom only a small number are found in the old Mennonite settlements such as Orenburg and Pleshanovo. The number of Mennonites living in their original settlements can be estimated as follows: Orenburg settlement (q.v.), 5,000 (Europe); Pleshanovo settlement (q.v.), 2,500 (Europe); Slavgorod settlement (q.v.), 14,000 (Siberia); Omsk settlement (q.v.), 4,000 (Siberia); Pavlodar settlement (q.v.), 2,500 (Siberia), and Amur settlement (q.v.), 2,000 (Siberia). This makes an estimated total of 30,000. Of these, only some 7,500 live in European Russia.

To what extent a concentration of Mennonites in these old and new settlements in Asiatic Russia and a revival of religious and cultural traditions through an organized program will be possible depends very much on the development of civil and religious freedom in Soviet Russia, including the rights for minority groups. Being of Germanic background and of a group with deep religious motivations, resisting the antireligious Marxian philosophy of life, the Mennonites as some other minority groups of Russia were distrusted and uprooted before and during World War II. Now that they have lost their religious-cultural foundation and stronghold in the Ukraine, a perpetuation of their cultural values, which were based on their settlements and educational system, may be extremely difficult. Even if greater freedom is granted to them, an adjustment to their Russian environment including intermarriage and the rapid loss of the German language is unavoidable unless a radical change takes place. Of course, a strong Christian faith and church life can be built without the German language and culture. The very change-over to the Russian language may be the door to a much wider and more effective Mennonite witness in Russia.

Looking over the 150 years that Mennonites lived in Russia, it can be said that they had unparalleled opportunities for establishing and maintaining communities on the basis of their understanding of Biblical truth and their heritage. They carried out the mission for which they were called; namely, to transform barren steppes into a garden spot and granary of Russia and to show the surrounding Slavic and nomadic population an exemplary Christian life in family and community and model methods of tilling the soil. Men like Johann Cornies and the settlements as a whole had a great influence on the surrounding population. But this influence was not restricted to the economic and social life. The Evangelical movement of Russia was influenced strongly by the Mennonites for nearly a century. This contact is continuing even in our day. The Mennonites of Russia had an opportunity for a self-realization and witness which they discharged with great success. (See "Russian Baptists and Mennonites," Menn. Life, July 1956, 99). C.K.

Russian Missions of the Mennonite Brethren Church had their beginning soon after the establishment of the M.B. Church. Early preachers to the Russians were Johann Wieler 1883-89, Jacob F. Froese, Adolf Penner 1906-? and Hermann Fast (q.v.) 1892-? Fast was for some time active in St. Petersburg and in Rumania, and after 1901 among the Russians in Canada. The M.B. Church of Russia established a special fund in 1905 which supported eight Russian evangelists. Some of the Brethren were given prison sentences for disregarding the law against proselytizing among the Greek Orthodox; among these were Froese and A. H. Unruh. After the revolution of 1917 work was taken up more freely by tent evangelism (Jacob J. Dyck, 1919), in which a number of Mennonite Brethren were engaged. With few exceptions they were later murdered by the Machno (q.v.) bandits.

After the establishment of the M.B. Church in America following the immigration of 1870 ff., M.B. preachers repeatedly conducted Gospel meetings in the Russian settlements in North Dakota and Saskatchewan, Hermann Fast and John F. Harms (q.v.) serving as evangelists and pastors to the converts. In 1905 the conference published a small Christian periodical, Golos (i.e., Voice), with Fast as editor. Congregations were organized at Kief and Dogden, N.D., and at Arlee and Blaine Lake, Sask., which were to some extent affiliated with the M.B. Conference, but which also held their own conferences. Luke Kravchenko has been one of their outstanding ministers. The Board of Foreign Missions of the M.B. Church has for a number of years supported workers among the Russians of Canada. In 1949 the Canadian Conference was supporting Peter Schroeder at Grand Forks, B.C., who worked among the Dukhobors, D. B. Wiens at Arlee, Sask., and A. Huebert, an itinerant preacher. Rusterhel (Ruster[holtz]), Jakob, an Anabaptist martyr, a cabinetmaker by trade, of Horgerberg in the Swiss district of Grüningen, was arrested in Zürich (q.v.) and imprisoned in the Oethenbach prison, where he was so unmercifully treated that in a weakened condition he promised to attend the (Reformed) church services. But he repented and was rearrested, and sick as he was he was taken to prison in chains and died there.

Rutgers, a common Dutch family name, formed as a patronymic from the Christian name Rutger, of which there are many branches in the Netherlands, both Mennonite and non-Mennonite.

Since the 16th century there have been two Mennonite Rutgers families in Amsterdam, not related to each other. (1) A Rutgers family which belonged to the Flemish Lamist branch. The genealogy of this family is rather well known and has partly been published in Nederlandsch Adelsboek. The ancestor of this family as far as is known, was Nicolaes Rutgers, surnamed Pels (probably because he was a fur dealer). He was a citizen of Antwerp, Belgium, and died there in 1561. His son David Rudtgeerts (b. c1520 at Antwerp, d. 1587 at Cologne, Germany), married Agneta de Bie, of Antwerp, was a silk merchant. He apparently was a Mennonite and left Antwerp on account of persecution. From father to son the name David was passed on; they were all Mennonites. David Rutgers I (Antwerp, 1555-Amsterdam, 1623), married Josyntje Lambers, a Mennonite of Rees, in 1585, was a textile merchant, at first at Cologne, where he was a member of the Mennonite church and apparently a deacon; he signed the Concept of Cologne (q.v.) for the Cologne congregation. In 1595 he was expelled from Cologne because of his Mennonite faith. He thereupon moved to Haarlem and later to Amsterdam. David Rutgers II (Haarlem, 1601-Amsterdam, 1668) was a cloth merchant at Amsterdam, also engaged in banking. He married Suzanna de Flines, of Amsterdam. From 1654 he was a deacon of the Amsterdam Lamist congregation; during the disputes between the ministers Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) and Samuel Apostool (q.v.) (see Lammerenkrijgh) he sided with Galenus and published a pamphlet in which he urged reconciliation: Vredes-presentatie (Amsterdam, 1664). David Rutgers III (Amsterdam, 1629-1706), married Margaretha Blok, of Amsterdam, ran a mill weaving velvet and flowered silk materials. He was a rather wealthy man; in 1697 he was knighted by Emperor Leopold I and received for himself, his oldest son, and further descendants the title jonkheer, the family name becoming Rutgers van Rozenburg (after his country estate Rozenburg near Amsterdam). David Rutgers III was a deacon of the Lamist congregation of Amsterdam in 1684-89, 1694-99, and 1704-6. He lived in a stately home on the Singel at Amsterdam and later in the splendid country home called Groenenvlecht, near Breukelen. David Rutgers IV van Rozenburg (Amsterdam, 1658-1731) was a wealthy merchant and banker, living at the Heeren-gracht at Amsterdam. He was married to Cornelia van Hoeck and served as deacon in 1689-94, 1700-5, and 1712-17. David Rutgers V van Rozenburg (Amsterdam, 1682-1757), married Maria de Neufville, was a silk merchant at Amsterdam and also a loyal member of the church, as were also Leonard Rutgers I van Rozenburg (Amsterdam, 1723-91, a son of David Rutgers V) and Leonard Rutgers II van Rozenburg (Amsterdam, 1760-1831, a son of Leonard Rutgers I), both merchants and bankers. Other members of the family serving as deacons of the Lamist congregation were Abraham Rutgers 1678-83 and Adriaan Rutgers 1707-12 and 1717-? and Dirk Rutgers (1667-1781) 1708-?

A number of members of this Rutgers family rendered valuable service to the oppressed Mennonites in the Palatinate (q.v.) and Prussia. David Rutgers II was for some time treasurer of the Mennonite Committee of Foreign Needs and in 1687 and 1694 collected funds for the Swiss Mennonites who had emigrated to the Palatinate (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1145, 1197, 1200, 1203, 1204-6, 1252 f., 1425, 1428, 2245). Isaac Rutgers, a son of David Rutgers II, who lived at Danzig, West Prussia, as an agent of the banking firm of his father and later of his brother, in 1680 represented the Dutch Committee of Foreign Needs on behalf of the Prussian Mennonites. He received a considerable sum of money from Holland, which he distributed among the Mennonites at Montau (q.v.) and other congregations, who had suffered severely from floods and crop failure (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1566-68). His grandson Isaac Rutgers, also living at Danzig for business in 1767, served as an intermediary of the Amsterdam committee in supporting the Mennonites of the Klein-Werder (q.v.), especially at Thiensdorf (q.v.), who had been struck by several calamities and in the spring of 1767 by a terrible flood. In 1776 he sent support to the people of Kleinsee (Jeziorka, q.v.), who, on account of war and pillage, were unable to pay their rent. In 1779 he was still active in relieving the needs of the Kleinsee congregation (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1707-19, 1728 f.). Nothing is known concerning his private life. Until about 1790 all of this family was Mennonite; but after 1800 nearly all of them joined the Reformed Church.

(2) A Rutgers family which belonged to the Waterlander (Toren) congregation at Amsterdam until 1668 and after the merger of this congregation with the Lamists in 1668, to the United Lam and Toren congregation at Amsterdam. Concerning this family only scant information is available. The ancestor of this branch was Rutger Willemsz (d. 1630 at Amsterdam), who was a cabinetmaker; he had moved from Kampen to Amsterdam, where he was received into the Waterlander congregation without baptism about 1612 and served as a deacon from 1620. In 1623 he sided with Nittert Obbesz (q.v.) in the conflict between Obbesz and the preachers. Among his descendants who bear the family name of Rutgers there were a number of craftsmen who were loyal members of the church until the family died out in the last decades of the 18th century.

Ruth (Rutt), a Swiss family represented in the Lancaster and Franconia conferences (MC) of eastern Pennsylvania. In Lancaster the name is spelled Rutt, and in Franconia, Ruth. Henry Ruth settled in Montgomery County, Pa., c1720. Some outstanding persons of this family in the history of the Franconia Conference Mennonites were David Ruth (d. 1820), bishop of the Plains and Lexington congregations; Benjamin Ruth (1849-1904), deacon of the Towamencin congregation; Joseph G. Ruth (1857-1928), bishop of the Line Lexington congregation; and the latter's nephew, Arthur D. Ruth (1892-), senior bishop of the Franconia congregation in the mid 20th century. In the Lancaster Conference Martin Rutt (1840-1905) served as bishop in the Risser district; he was a strong figure in the conference. Abraham Rutt (1838-98) was a deacon in the Strickler congregation, and Edwin Rutt, his son, succeeded him as deacon. Albert B. Rutt, a Lancaster Mennonite, served for a time as a missionary in Chicago early in the 20th century, but later went into business. J. L. Rutt served for a number of years as a missionary (MC) in Argentina. In the Wisler division of 1872 in Indiana and Ohio the Rutts of Ashland County, Ohio, followed Jacob Wisler. The references to Swiss Mennonite church leaders of 1645 bearing the name Ruth as an apparent Christian name are not entirely clear. (Mart. Mir. D 823, E 1122.) J.C.W.

According to the "Haus und Hand-buch für die Familie David Ruth zu Eichstock, 1852" (in BeCL), Gerhard Ruth and his family migrated from the Rhein area to Upper Bavaria in 1819, where he purchased the Eichstock estate near Dachau. About 1852 his son David Ruth (q.v.), emigrated from Eichstock to Franklin Center, Iowa, and there he served as a preacher. From here family members moved to Halstead, Kan., and have also spread to other states. The children of David Ruth were John W., Susanna A., who married Christian Krehbiel, David C., Henry G., Jacob E., and Gerhard B. Ruth. The "Haus und Hand-buch" contains historical and genealogical data about the family in Bavaria, Iowa, and Kansas. The original German narrative has been translated into English. C.K.

Rutt, Martin N. (1841-1905), a bishop and leader in the Lancaster Mennonite (MC) Conference, was born Feb. 8, 1841, on a large Donegal farm in Lancaster County, Pa., the son of Jacob S. Rutt and Elizabeth Nissley. He married Fannie Ebersole (1841-1904). At the age of thirty he was called to the ministry at the Bossler Mennonite Church and on March 11, 1880, he was ordained bishop for the Strickler-Stauffer-Bossler Bishop District. He had a share in writing the first discipline in the 1890's, when Jacob N. Brubacher, Isaac Eby, and he were the leaders of the Bishop Board. He was an early promoter of Sunday schools, serving as superintendent at the home congregation from 1883 until his death. In the Martinite division his counsel was well considered. He traveled far over the conference district in the horse-and-buggy days, whenever duty called. His greatest achievement came in the fall conference season at the Mellinger church in 1905, when he pleaded at midnight for permission to have revival meetings, after the Conference had twice rejected his request, and he won. He did not live to see the wisdom of this move, for he died on Nov. 7, 1905, before the Elizabethtown meetings were held in February 1906. He was buried in the Bossler cemetery. I.D.L.

Rutschmann, Rudolf, a member of an old peasant family at Zollikon (q.v.), near Zürich, Switzerland, was one of the earliest Anabaptists. He was baptized during the first week of the existence of the brotherhood, between January 22 and January 29, 1525. Soon after this event fourteen of the leaders of the Anabaptist movement were placed under arrest in the Augustinian monastery for investigation; Rudolf Rutschmann was the first of these to be questioned. He openly confessed that he had been (re)baptized. Since he was now a "servant and subject of God" he would continue to do "what the Spirit of God instructed, taught, and commanded" him to do. He would therefore not allow himself to be deflected by any secular authority. In other respects he would be obedient to "the gracious lords of Zürich" in so far as "it was not contrary to the Word of God." All of the accused agreed with this confession. The sentence of the council, Feb. 8, 1525, released them upon promise to desist and a total fine of 1,000 guilders, with the admonition that they had acted "unreasonably against God and against man with offense." Rutschmann, however, refused to pay the fine.

In a cross-examination at the end of June 1525 it was related that Rudolf Rutschmann had read aloud one or two chapters of the Bible at a Bible study meeting in a peasant house at Nenikon. On the way home he was asked by several women to come into their homes and read to them. After initial hesitation he did so, reading a chapter on the love of God. He had kept his promise of February and had baptized no one, and had only read from the Bible in private homes, as the councillors had permitted him to do. He was released, but compelled to swear an oath that he would leave off baptizing and preaching. He was summoned to the court again and tried in August 1525, where he confessed that he had attended a Bible reading, but that nothing had been said there about baptism. At this point all trace of him is lost. S.G.

Ruysch Jansz (Ruysch Jan Beths) was a burgomaster of Amsterdam, who was in sympathy with the Anabaptists in 1531-35, like some other magistrates of Amsterdam, such as Jan Hubrechts, Pieter Colijn, and Heyman Jacobsz. He protected them against persecution and was accused of permitting a large number of them to set sail from Amsterdam en route to Münster (q.v.). Ruysch was, however, not an Anabaptist. vDZ.

Rypert Claesz, an Anabaptist martyr of Driesum in Friesland, Netherlands, was beheaded with two others at Leeuwarden, capital of Friesland, on March 17, 1537. He confessed "that he belonged to the sect of the Anabaptists, but had not yet been (re)baptized"; this, however, was not due to lack of desire on his part, but to want of an elder to administer the rite. He wished to receive baptism on his faith as soon as possible. vDZ.

Saar Amish Mennonite Church, sometimes known as the Moselle congregation, now extinct, whose members lived in the Rhine Province of Germany and in Luxembourg. The congregation was founded by Mennonites emigrating from Lorraine about the beginning of the 19th century. The first elder was a Planck of Hellingen. The services, at which the Ausbund (q.v.) was used into the 20th century, were conducted every four weeks in German in a deaconess home. For the instruction of their youth the 1880 catechism (see Catechisms) printed in Zweibrücken was used. Footwashing was observed in connection with communion services, and church discipline applied. The congregation of one hundred members, mostly farmers and millers, lived scattered in seventeen villages. The congregation had a fund for the support of the poor. Nikolaus Nafziger was long an elder of the congregation. In 1936 when it had 32 members and Otto Schertz as preacher, the congregation merged with Ixheim (q.v.) which in 1937 in turn merged with the Ernstweiler (q.v.) congregation to form the Zweibrücken (q.v.) congregation, which since 1952 has been in effect combined with the Kaiserslautern (q.v.) congregation. The Saar congregation was listed under various names in the Christlicher Gemeinde-Kalender in the past 50 years. Often the word Luxembourg was combined with it, and the present Luxembourg (q.v.) congregation was once a part of Saar. Saargebiet was the most common name and the one used at the last, although as late as 1927 it was called "Luxembourg und Saargebiet." During the French occupation of the Saar territory (1945-57) the Mennonites living in the territory were organized as a separate Saarland congregation (1949), which in 1957 had 62 baptized members. Sabbatarian Anabaptists. The question of the relevance of the Old Testament (q.v.) was solved in one aspect by a small group of Anabaptists by saying that the Ten Commandments were still valid; hence they observed the Sabbath. The most prominent leader of this group was Oswald Glait (q.v.), who along with Andreas Fischer and Hans Bänderlin (q.v.) was active in Silesia about 1528. When Glait published his Entschuldigung at Nikolsburg in 1527 he was not yet a Sabbatarian (as point 7 of the booklet shows) and there is no clue to indicate why he became one. He left Nikolsburg after Hubmaier's martyrdom in May 1528, and while in Silesia working with Andreas Fischer met both Valentine Crautwald and Caspar Schwenckfeld. Shortly after this encounter, Glait wrote a booklet in which he defended Sabbatarian views, to which booklet Crautwald replied. Neither of these books is extant. Glait then asked Andreas Fischer to reply to Crautwald.

Fischer was of the Anabaptist congregation at Linz, but had been a missionary and overseer at Passau, Obernberg, and Wels. At Nikolsburg he adopted the Sabbatarian beliefs of Glait. Fischer's reply to Crautwald is not extant, but Crautwald's second treatise is preserved and bears the title: Bericht und anzeigen wie gar one Kunst und guotten verstandt, Andreas Fischer. vom Sabbath geschrieben . . . (manuscript copy of printed book is in Schwenckfelder Library at Pennsburg, Pa.).

The Sabbatarian movement upset Leonhard von Liechtenstein; so he wrote a letter to Capito (q.v.) enclosing a copy of Glait's book on the Sabbath and requesting a critique of it. Capito, burdened with work, turned the task over to Schwenckfeld, who wrote a reply (Vom Christlichen Sabbath und Unterschied des A.T. und N.T., 1532), which has been preserved and published in the Corpus Schwenckfeldianorum (IV, 444-518).

That the Sabbatarian movement did not die out at once is evident from Luther's concern with it in his Brief wider die Sabbathter (Erlangen Ausgabe XXI, 416). That it continued for some time is evident from the mention of the Sabbatarians in George Eder's (q.v.) Evangelische Inquisition (1573), in Christoph Erhard's (q.v.) history of the Münsterite Anabaptists (1588), as well as in Stredovsky's (about 1600) and Varotto's (1567) list of Anabaptist sects. In a letter to the Swiss Brethren (wrongly dated 1531?) Pilgram Marpeck (q.v.) discusses the Ten Commandments and goes into some detail in his discussion of the third commandment. He rejects any legalistic application of this commandment, and concludes by saying, "That is in short against those who wish to reinstitute the physical Sabbath. Jesus Christ is Lord over all ceremonial laws of the Old and New Testament" (Kunstbuch, fol. 46b, 38b). W.Kl.

Sachs (Sax, Sass), Konrad, a cooper in Stuttgart, Germany, was the delegate of the city of Stuttgart to the Württemberg assembly of the peasants on the Wunnenstein and at Bietigheim in the Peasants' War of 1525. After the Peasants' War he became an Anabaptist and was presumably a leader of the South German Anabaptists by 1530, when he baptized Barbara Löffler, the wife of a shoemaker in Stuttgart. He found shelter with Konrad Thumb of Neurgart, Württemberg, in his village of Stettin in the Remstal, where Schwenckfelders and Jews were also admitted and where the Schwenckfelder Burkhard Schilling was the pastor. He worked at his trade in Stuttgart and is called the leader (Vorsteher) of the Swiss Brethren in 1539 and 1545, and won a large following in the vicinity of Stuttgart and Esslingen. Nothing is known of the close of his life. G. Bos.

Sackmann(in), Anna (Aendle), of Rueten, an Anabaptist martyr, was put to death at Tauffers (q.v.) in the Adige (q.v.) Valley, Austria. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 278; ML IV.)

Sacrament. The word "sacrament" came into usage in the church's vocabulary because the church of the West translated the word "mystery" used by the Greek Mystery Religions for their initiatory rites with the word sacramentum and applied it to baptism and the Lord's Supper. As is the case with many other terms in Western Christendom, the man mainly responsible for its adoption into Christianity is Tertullian (q.v.). The term had a legal and military connotation and involved the idea of commitment or responsibility, often being used for an oath.

The term embedded itself in the Christian Church so securely that even during the Reformation period it was never questioned, although there was considerable discussion as to the significance of the practices it referred to. While Luther declared that the church is present wherever the Gospel is truly preached and the sacraments correctly administered, and Calvin as where the Gospel is truly heard and the sacraments correctly administered, Anabaptists took over this same term (Rothmann, Marpeck, and Menno Simons) but defined it to fit their own view of the sacraments.

The Confession of Schleithem (q.v.) discusses both baptism and the Lord's Supper but does not accord them the constitutive role which they had in the larger Reformation. Conrad Grebel (q.v.) called them simply "ceremonies," and for the most part Anabaptism was heavily indebted to the symbolic interpretation of Zwingli as far as the Lord's Supper is concerned. Baptism was for them a deeply moving experience, the first baptism having been preceded by a genuine time of penitence and real searching (see Blanke, below). Full appreciation has never been given to the vital place which both sacraments played in early Anabaptism; certainly no slavish literalism prompted such a radical break with tradition.

The term "ceremonies" is used also by Hans Denk, along with a certain depreciation of their place in the religious experience of both the individual and the church, which is continued and hardened in men like Jacob Kautz (q.v.) and Hans Bunderlin (q.v.), both of whom insisted (the essence of religion being spiritual) that there was no need for the external ceremonies in the life of the mature church. Bunderlin insisted that the ceremonies in the apostolic church were a concession to its Jewish members and that these rites were no longer needed. His book Erklärung durch vergleichung (1530) is meant to show the folly of continuing to use the ceremonies. The same stress is seen also in his other books.

Since the Anabaptist brotherhood at Strasbourg read Bunderlin's books in their meetings, and Pilgram Marpeck attempted to organize the brotherhood there in 1530, it was necessary to take a position on the place of the sacraments. The result was the publication of the Clare verantwortung (q.v.) of 1531, which dealt with all of Bunderlin's major arguments not only in his books but also in conversations. It may be that this is the booklet Schwenckfeld says was written against him (in a letter to Johann Bader, q.v., dated Sept. 24, 1531) since it certainly does deal with some of the arguments Schwenckfeld advanced against the Anabaptists. At any rate the Clare verantwortung represents the clearest argument in Anabaptism for the practice of the ceremonies such as baptism and the Lord's Supper, as well as footwashing, etc.

Marpeck uses the word "ceremonies" rather than "sacraments" in his confession and also in some of his later writings (Kunstbuch, fol. 44b and 46b). However, in his most important works, both the Vermanung (q.v.) and the Verantwortung (q.v.), he uses the term "sacrament" and accepts Rothmann's long section which explains the term and justifies its use by Christians as long as it is correctly interpreted. Here the explanation is the same as that offered by Oswald Glait (q.v.) in 1527, i.e., that sacramentum means a vow or an oath, and so the element of commitment (verpflichtung) must be taken seriously. This is indicative of the ingenuity with which a term was taken, and redefined, the traditional wrappings having been removed to open the way for what the Anabaptists considered a Biblical interpretation of these practices in the life of the church.

One of the alternatives open to the Anabaptists was to accept the sacraments as "mere symbols," as was done by Bucer and Zwingli. The spiritualistic tendency which both Zwingli's and Bucer's attacks against Anabaptism took made them wary of taking this approach. If the sacraments are "mere symbols," Bucer's argument that a mere symbol should not divide the Christian brotherhood has some force. Over against this Marpeck insisted in his Confession (1532) that the sacraments, specifically baptism, should not be called a sign or symbol but rather a "witness." In all of his writings he stressed this aspect of the sacraments again and again, and the term "cotestimony" (Mitzeugnis) became central in his thought. At one point in his revised translation of the Bekentnisse (see Vermanung) he translates "teken" (sign) as "Mitzeugnis." This is evidence of the fundamental importance which Marpeck attributed to the sacraments of the church. Inner experience demands an external witness; if none is forthcoming, the inner experience is belied. For this reason he was so sharp in his criticism of Schwenckfeld, whose approach to the sacraments could lead only to their complete cessation. Marpeck insisted that until Christ returns we have need of these external rites which serve us in that they witness to the world and to the church that we accept the order of Christ. Along with this is a sense of realism in the performance of the sacraments, baptism becoming a part of Christ's body, the Lord's Supper a testimony to the unity of Christ's body which we share. Needless to say he rejects all sacramentarian views in that he does not see the metaphysical presence of Christ in the bread, but rather sees Christ present in the gathered church and in His preached word. Hence the "real presence" is taken seriously by Marpeck; but not in a mechanical way, but rather in the experience of the participating believer. Where the element of cotestimony is lacking, there sacraments are merely external acts without any meaning whatever. While Marpeck says that perhaps it would be better not to use the term "sacrament" since it does not occur in Scripture, he says further that the same is true of the term "sign"; hence the usage of the term is not the decisive matter. His close co-worker who probably collaborated in all of his writings, Leopold Scharnschläger (q.v.), stressed the idea that baptism is a covenant, and in this he was following the main stream of Anabaptism.

In Dutch Mennonitism the position does not differ greatly from the Swiss-South German views. Menno Simons uses the word sacrament in his writings, sometimes also the term "sacramentelycke teecken" (Sacramental symbols) and repeatedly warns against Roman Catholic views on baptism and communion (Mass), which he considered idolatrous. Occasionally he uses the word "ordinantie" (ordinance). See Index to Opera Omnia (1681) and to Complete Writings (1956). Dirk Philips is somewhat more precise in his terminology and usually avoids the word sacrament, instead by preference speaking of "de Goddelijcke Ordeninghe(n) van der Doope ende des Nachmaels" (the divine ordinance(s) of baptism and communion). The Dutch confessions of faith scarcely deal with this theme, obviously because it was not necessary to discuss the question, in which all Mennonites of the several branches agreed. The Olijftack Confession (1626) speaks of "uytwendighe sienlijcke teecken" (external visible signs), which are ordinances of Jesus Christ. The Jan Cents Confession (1630), Article XI, has "baptism, the Lord's Supper, and other Christian ordinances." The Dordrecht Confession (1632) calls them "uytwendighe ceremonies" (outward ceremonies). The Flemish preacher Claes Claesz (q.v.) uses the term "ceremoniale geboden" (ceremonial commands).

The sacraments, particularly the Mass, were a frequent topic in the discussions of the Roman Catholic clergy with the Anabaptist-Mennonite martyrs during their trials. The martyrs all reject the Roman Catholic doctrines, often in bold and rude expressions: "I have never read in the Scriptures of a Holy Sacrament, but of the Lord's Supper" (Elisabeth); the sacrament is "a God of bread" (Jeronimus Segersz); "the sacrament is an idol, only a bit of flour" (Jooskindt), and Jacques d' Auchy, upon being asked his opinion of the sacrament (Mass), frankly replied, "Do you mean the breakers of the bread?" Except Jorjaen Simansz no martyr found in the Offer des Heeren uses the word sacrament. For the martyrs baptism and communion are "ordinances of Christ," signs, ceremonies; the Lord's Supper is "a memorial sign," a symbol.

The early Waterlander Mennonites with their spiritualistic tendencies avoided the word sacrament; baptism and communion are "mere symbols." Hans de Ries in his confession (1610) calls them ordinances (insettingen), together with footwashing as "the service of love." Galenus Abrahamsz (Korte Grondstellingen, 1699, No. LI) speaks of "ceremonial or solemn commands." In later Dutch Mennonitism there is practically no discussion about the character of the "sacraments."

There never has been any question of overestimating them. Occasionally baptism and the Lord's Supper were undervalued. This was a result of mystical or spiritualistic individualism, already found in Obbe Philips, in this point a follower of Sebastian Franck, who was opposed by Dirk Philips, and like Menno Simons attacked all those who depreciated the ceremony of baptism, saying, "What is the use to us of a handful of water?" This dislike of the "sacraments" in 19th-century Dutch Mennonitism sometimes led to making baptism optional or even to abolishing baptism and the Lord's Supper altogether. This radicalism is now past. In varying degrees later Mennonitism has attempted to prevent a degeneration into any idea that sacraments are inherently efficacious. The use of the term "sacrament" is however more or less incidental to this attempt as is seen by its use interchangeably with "ordinance" in a recent Mennonite book on theology (see Wenger).

As in the other aspects of worship, a major problem in the use of the sacraments (ordinances) has been to maintain a balance between undervaluation and overvaluation. Mennonites have been more inclined to the latter. Too little attention has been given to a good theology of the sacraments which will prevent a lapse into mere traditionalism.

Sacramentists (Dutch, Sacramentisten, Sacramentariërs), the designation in the Netherlands of those who from about 1520 did not believe in the efficacy of the sacraments of the Roman Catholic Church and particularly denied that the host in the Mass was the real body and blood of Jesus Christ. Besides their doubt or unbelief concerning the doctrine of transubstantiation, they criticized certain Catholic practices, calling indulgences, pilgrimages, etc., mere idolatry, and at the same time were severely critical of the low moral standards and conduct of the clergy.

One of the first to censure Catholic abuses was a certain Wouter, a Dominican monk at Utrecht, who is said to have "preached the evangelical truth" as early as 1516. Jelle Smit (Gellius Faber, q.v.), in later times an opponent of Menno Simons, then a Catholic priest at Jelsum in Friesland, is said to have preached evangelical doctrine from 1516; but this is incorrect, for Smit was not yet a priest in 1516 (as Vos has pointed out). Nicolaes Peters, a Franciscan monk, published in 1520 an anti-Catholic booklet, "Hier beghinnen de Sermonen . . ." Cornelius Grapheus, city clerk of Antwerp, influenced by Erasmus, was arrested in 1522 and tried at Brussels, because he had attacked the Catholic Church. Like many of these first Sacramentists he recanted his heresies. Grapheus even died at an advanced age after a successful life as a loyal son of the Catholic Church. Others were less inclined to bend. Cornelis Hoen (q.v.) of The Hague was the first in the Netherlands to formulate an evangelical doctrine of the Lord's Supper (c1521). He presented his formulation first to Luther, who rejected it, thereupon to Zwingli, who agreed with it; in this way Hoen's interpretation, that bread and wine in the Communion were merely a commemoration of the suffering and death of Christ, became the doctrine of the Zwinglians and also of the first Anabaptist church in Zürich, Switzerland. Hoen died in prison at The Hague in 1523. Other influential Sacramentists were Hinne Rode (q.v.), Johannes Sartorius (q.v.), and Willem Gnapheus (q.v.).

These Sacramentists, or Evangelicals (Evangelischen) as they have sometimes been called, were influenced by Erasmus and other Biblical humanists such as Wessel Gansfort (q.v.). Luther's attitude against the Catholic Church, and his writings circulating in the Netherlands and eagerly read by the Sacramentists, also greatly stimulated them. Most of them, severely critical of the Catholic Church, remained members of the church. Only at Delft and perhaps a few other places was something like a separate evangelical church formed. Emperor Charles V, always a keen enemy of heresy, soon took measures to extirpate Sacramentism. In 1522 Frans van der Hulst was appointed imperial inquisitor-general of the Netherlands, but because of the opposition of the city magistrates, who maintained the rights of the cities to adjudicate the cases in their own territories, van der Hulst was not as successful as the emperor wished, especially because many magistrates in the Netherlands sympathized more or less with the Sacramentists. Nevertheless some of them were put to death; in September 1525 Jan Jansz de Bakker, usually called Pistorius, formerly a priest at Woerden, was burned at the stake at The Hague for his evangelical principles and doctrines. Others escaped the inquisitors by fleeing from the country. A large number of Dutch "evangelicals" are said to have settled in Prussia, Germany, before 1530.

The Sacramentist movement, especially during its rise about 1520-25, found its adherents among the well-educated classes, and priests and schoolteachers often promoted its ideas. But soon its views also found an echo among the masses of the Dutch people, particularly in the larger towns. For example, a considerable group of Sacramentists, all craftsmen, were found in Maastricht in the province of Limburg.

The Anabaptist movement rising in the Netherlands in the autumn of 1530 largely attracted the Sacramentists, and most of them joined the newly founded Anabaptist congregations. This was also the case in Maastricht (q.v.), where nearly all the Sacramentists became active Anabaptist leaders. The line between Anabaptism and Sacramentism was not always clear, and until 1534-35 Anabaptists were often called Sacramentists and also the contrary. The Sacramentist martyr Wendelmoet (Weynken) Claes(dochter) (q.v.), of Monnikendam, executed at The Hague on Nov. 20, 1527, was listed among the Anabaptist martyrs and commemorated in the Offer des Heeren and the following Mennonite martyr books, including van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror. This is not surprising. Sacramentists and Anabaptists had much in common; they both rejected Roman Catholic doctrines and practices, though the Anabaptists were more radical than the Sacramentists, and in their plea for Biblical-Evangelical Christendom they spoke the same language. Yet the Sacramentists did not practice baptism upon confession of faith and, with few exceptions, did not found special congregations.

Whereas most Sacramentists from the beginning joined the Anabaptists, others, averse to the radical principles of Anabaptism, later formed a group of Reformed, among whom should be mentioned Anastasius Veluanus (q.v.). vdZ.

Sailer, Wolf(gang), a cabinetmaker by trade, had interesting connections with Pilgram Marpeck (q.v.) and Caspar Schwenckfeld (q.v.). Apparently he was the latter's comrade (Stallbruder) in 1529-32 in Strasbourg (q.v.), and Schwenckfeld became reluctant to accept Anabaptism partly because of Sailer's affinity with it. Sailer was more eager to seek out the Anabaptists in those years than to converse with Schwenckfeld.

Sailer left Strasbourg probably about the same time as Marpeck, January 1532, and most likely went to Moravia (q.v.). From here he wrote a letter to Schwenckfeld on June 4, 1540, reporting that Marpeck had visited him at Austerlitz and that when Marpeck last saw Schwenckfeld the latter had indicated surprise that Sailer had apparently forgotten him. In this letter Sailer referred to Marpeck as his "special friend and brother in the Lord," but did not call Schwenckfeld a brother, an omission which irritated Schwenckfeld, but is evidence that Sailer was now an Anabaptist brother. Apparently he also was somewhat critical of Schwenckfeld's work, for the reply he received was quite defensive of his methods.

Schwenckfeld's reply was written on Aug. 10, 1540, and shows that Schwenckfeld was not happy with the picture as Marpeck had described it to Sailer. He was disturbed that the relations between him and Sailer had deteriorated, and said that Sailer was incorrect in assuming that he (Schwenckfeld) wrote only for the preachers and those outside of the church, for he did not presume to be wise or highly educated as Sailer charged. Apparently Sailer interpreted Schwenckfeld's condemnation at Schmalcald in a way displeasing to Schwenckfeld, for Schwenckfeld remarked that he could also interpret Sailer's "cross" in that way, but that he would not do so. Sailer was chosen to the ministry at Auspitz, Moravia, in 1547. He may then have been a Hutterite.

Nothing further is known of Sailer. His name does not occur in the Marpeck correspondence, and it seems that he belonged to the Pilgramites in Moravia and later to the Hutterites, but the relationship of these two groups to each other is not clear. He is an important link in the relationship between Marpeck and Schwenckfeld. Two years later the tensions between Marpeck's brotherhood and Schwenckfeld came to a climax through the publication of the Vermanung and letters which Marpeck and Schwenckfeld exchanged. Sailer died at Saitz, Moravia, in 1550. W.K.L.

Sailer was one of the most prolific of the Hutterite hymn writers. The translation of the Psalms which he made for congregational use is still extant. But since it lacks poetic rhythm it has never been adopted. He gives a melody for each psalm. Of the thirty-fourth and fifty-first Psalms he notes, "own melody." Wolkan (Lieder, 180-85) gives the beginning of fourteen of his songs and points out his lack of talent with several illustrations. This is also borne out in the fifty songs which are given in the Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottdale, 1914), 133, 161, 178-297. He was widely imitated, though most of the imitations are improvements over his songs. In the Hutterite brotherhood he was highly regarded. NEFF.

Saimer, Peter, an Anabaptist martyr, beheaded on July 8, 1588, at Freiburg in Bavaria, Germany. After his arrest at Freiburg he was taken to Berghausen (?), but was soon brought back to Freiburg. Here he was tried. Both the officials and his friends tried to save him but Peter said, "I have one head; if I had two, or even more, I would rather suffer them all to be cut off than to renounce my faith." Thus he died valiantly. Van Braght says that his head, cut off, turned around facing the executioner, which made a deep impression on the crowd gathered around the execution place. He is the author of the first eight of the eighteen stanzas of the song, "Fröhlich will ich singen." vdZ.

St. Agatha Mennonite Church (MC) is located one-half mile west of the village of St. Agatha in Wilmot Twp., Waterloo Co., Ont. The meetinghouse, seating capacity 350, was built in 1885. Services were originally held alternately in this church and the Steinman church (q.v.) at Baden. Since services are now held regularly at each place the two have actually become two separate congregations except for the fact that the same ministers serve both churches.

The original building at St. Agatha was also of frame structure but was completely rebuilt in 1953 with a basement. (For membership, see Steinman Mennonite Church.) O.G.

St. Catharines Mennonite Brethren Church, located at St. Catharines, Lincoln Co., Ont., a member of the Canadian Conference and General Conference of the M.B. Church, was organized Nov. 6, 1943, under the leadership of Gerhard J. Epp. The congregation met in a rented hall in the city until 1949, when a church was built. Gerhard J. Epp was the minister and H. Janzen the leader of this congregation. In 1958 the membership was 498, with Henry P. Penner as leader and minister, and A. H. Redekop as assistant leader and minister; other assistant ministers were D. Duerksen, Abraham Block, and Peter Dick. H.H.J.

St. Catharines United Mennonite Church (GCM), located on Garnet Street on the east side of St. Catharines, Ont., was organized in 1946 by 16-18 families who had moved to the city or settled on neighboring fruit farms, led by W. Schellenberg from the Essex County United Mennonite Church in Leamington, Ont., who served as its first pastor until 1950, when he retired from active duty. The St. Catharines United Mennonite Church belongs to the Conference of the United Mennonite Churches of Ontario and to the Conference of the Mennonite Churches of Canada. The first church was built in 1946, replaced in 1948 by a larger church seating about 450. Its membership in 1957 was about 430, with P. J. Heinrichs as pastor. F.J.A.

St. Elizabeth Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, located 25 miles south of Winnipeg, Man., began in 1915 when the Seth Miller family and others moved here in 1915-18. These settlers organized a Sunday school on March 1, 1919, with A. A. Zook and Seth Miller as superintendents. The largest membership was 15. They were affiliated with the Dakota-Montana Conference (now North Central), and ministers from the district filled monthly appointments. At different times Allan Good and J. M. Kreider held special meetings. The work was discontinued because of the depression, prejudice against German-speaking people, and lack of a resident minister. F.E.K.

St. Gall (St. Gallen), the capital (pop. 67,865) of the canton of St. Gall, Switzerland, the next canton east of Zürich, was the seat of a brief but substantial early Anabaptist movement in 1525-27. The Reformation in St. Gall was secondary to that of Zürich, as was the Anabaptist movement. Joachim von Watt, called Vadian, who returned in 1519 from the University of Vienna, where he had been an outstanding humanist teacher (also a physician) but not a priest or theologian, became its leader. He served as burgomaster of the city 1526-32. Although he was a brother-in-law of Conrad Grebel, and although Grebel tried to persuade him to at least tolerate if not join the Anabaptist movement, he followed Zwingli completely in his opposition to it. Since in St. Gall the Reformation was borne by the people rather than by the clergy, Anabaptism had a greater opportunity to rise in the midst of the people. Johannes Kessler's "Bible study" group, a weekly (Sunday) popular meeting in which Kessler (b. 1502), who had returned in December 1523 from a period of study in Württemberg and in early 1524 had begun (with knowledge and approval of the church authorities) to teach evangelical doctrine through Bible exposition (I John, Romans, etc.), furnished the starting point for Anabaptism proper. (Note the similar situation in Zürich, where Castellberger's "Bible study" of 1522, followed by the Grebel and Manz "Bible study" of 1523-24, was the starting point for the Anabaptist movement there. In St. Gall, however, Kessler did not become an Anabaptist as did the leaders in Zürich, nor was the Zürich Bible study ever approved by the authorities. Zwingli overshadowed all.) Lorenz Hochrütiner, a native of St. Gall, who had lived for a time in Zürich and in 1522-23 was a member of the Grebel group but had returned to St. Gall in November 1523, was the channel for the first introduction of pre-Anabaptist ideas. In the summer of 1524 he challenged infant baptism in Kessler's meeting, supported by a letter from Grebel which condemned Kessler's teaching on baptism. But it was Wolfgang Uolimann (q.v.), of an old upper-class St. Gall family, a former monk of St. Lucius in Chur, who took charge after the city council forbade the Kessler meetings on Sept. 15, 1524, and in November began public preaching in the open, and later in the weavers' guild house. In February 1525 he was baptized by Grebel in the Rhine near Schaffhausen. Grebel himself appeared in St. Gall in April (two weeks' stay) and on Palm Sunday baptized several hundred in the Sitter River at the edge of the city. Upon his leaving, Anthoni Roggenacher (q.v.) and Hippolyt Eberli (see Bolt, Eberli), who probably had accompanied him from Zürich, joined with Uolimann in the leadership of the newly established Anabaptist congregation. The movement spread rapidly, also into the surrounding countryside. There is evidence that it had sympathizers in the city council. The leaders were invited to a discussion in the burgomaster's residence. The movement reached a remarkable height.

But soon measures of suppression were taken. The foreign leaders were expelled from the city. Eberli was executed in Schwyz about this time, the first Anabaptist martyr. Uolimann was called before the council, where a lengthy discussion on baptism, "communion, and other matters" took place. Uolimann was first requested, then commanded to cease for a time conducting baptism and communion. The council promised a thorough consideration of the issues. A disputation, with written statements from both sides, was ordered. Vadian submitted a paper, and the St. Gall Anabaptists called on Grebel, who sent a lengthy document. Unfortunately both papers have been lost. Zwingli's chief anti-Anabaptist book, Vom Tauf, Wiedertauf und Kindertauf, dedicated to St. Gall, appeared just in time to be used; it was ordered read to the people in the St. Lorenz church by the St. Lorenz schoolmaster Zili. In the course of the reading, two Anabaptists, Uolimann and Giger, interrupted, and opened a discussion which finally led to the leaving of the church by the Anabaptist element. Tension mounted in the city and surroundings. It seemed likely that a majority of the peasants in the countryside, who had already been stirred by a peasants' agitation, would swing over to the Anabaptists. Actually the village of Toblatt was won over by Hans Kern (Krüse) of Klingnau. On June 5 Vadian read his anti-Anabaptist paper in the presence of the council and representatives of the Anabaptists. The next day the Anabaptists read to the same gathering their reply to Vadian (no longer extant). A disputation followed, which resulted in a negative decree by the council. All irregular Anabaptist meetings were now forbidden, although special privilege was granted them to hold meetings in the St. Lorenz church on open Sundays. The mandate, dated June 7, 1525, called for fines for those who had themselves baptized, and exile for those who attended the irregular Anabaptist meetings. A special militia of 200 men was sworn in to handle a possible revolt. It was forbidden to receive foreign visitors who might teach and baptize. Hans Denk apparently appeared in St. Gall about this time, as Kessler reports (Sabbata, p. 229), but nothing further is known of his work here.

The measures of repression broke the back of the Anabaptist movement in St. Gall as they did in Zürich. By the end of 1526 little was left of a once powerful movement. Manz appeared here for a brief time in 1526. Uolimann, banished from the city, worked elsewhere after 1526. There must still have been a few Anabaptists in St. Gall for some decades as well as in the adjoining canton of Appenzell.

Some Anabaptists from other regions appeared in the city in 1529, coming from Zürich, the district of Allgäu in South Germany, and from the Adige Valley in Tirol. Niklaus Guldi, formerly an active Anabaptist preacher, was "converted in Strasbourg in 1530, returned to St. Gall where he was rehabilitated," and became a major source for Kessler's reports on the Anabaptists in his Sabbata. In 1532 there was a mild revival of Anabaptism, led by Hans Marquart, a former priest of Wissenborn. The Anabaptists made a formal request for toleration as a free church, but were refused. Vadian held a disputation with them in 1532. Jörg Maler, the copyist of the important recently discovered collection of Anabaptist documents called the Kunstabuch, lived here 1535-41. Pilgram Marpeck addressed several letters to him. In 1553 a disputation was held in the castle of Lütisburg near St. Gall with some imprisoned Anabaptists who rejected infant baptism along with the teaching that baptism cleanses from original sin. As late as 1639 the St. Gall official records refer to an Anabaptist schoolmaster by the name of Joseph Hochrütiner. Marpeck was employed by the city as a water engineer in the late 1530's.

After the forcible suppression of Anabaptism in St. Gall excesses appeared. As reported by Kessler they included infantile expressions demonstrating "becoming as little children" and other extreme literalistic applications of Biblical passages, which are reported at length by Egli, who recognized them as a fanatical excrement (Ausartung) of the Anabaptist movement. The notorious Thomas Schugger, who is reported to have beheaded his brother, has been shown by John Horsch to have been a marginal figure rather than an Anabaptist. H.S.B.

St. Jacobs is a village (pop. 725) 9 miles north of Kitchener, Waterloo Co., Ont. Approximately 250 Mennonites live in the village with another 1,000 or so near by. The M.C. group has a church of 400 members in the village. Three Wisler Mennonite (OOM) churches are within two miles of the village. Mennonites own a blacksmith shop, a general store, a produce market, two woodworking shops, two garages, an implement agency, a paint shop, and a weaver shop. Practically all the inhabitants speak the Pennsylvania-German language. R.S.K.

St. Jacobs (Ont.) Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the Ontario Conference, built its first log meetinghouse 2 miles west of St. Jacobs in 1844-45, to serve also as a school; it was called the Conestoga Church. The congregation was divided by the Wisler split that affected a large part of Ontario in 1889. The Wisler (Old Order Mennonite) group used the meetinghouse until the fall of 1892. The present congregation started using the building on Jan. 1, 1893. In 1915 a new church was built in St. Jacobs, its present location, and the congregation adopted the name St. Jacobs Mennonite Church. The meetinghouse was enlarged twice, in 1936 and in 1949. Roy S. Koch (ordained as minister in 1936 and as bishop in 1950) served the congregation until 1957. He was succeeded by Raymond Kramer. The membership in 1958 was 415. R.S.K.

St. John Mennonite Church (GCM), one mile east and a quarter south of Pandora, Ohio, on State Highway 12, is a member of the Middle District Conference. Originally there was only one Swiss Mennonite church in the community; but as the membership increased and the community grew, more churches were built. In 1888 the St. John Mennonite Church building was erected four miles north of the Ebenezer Mennonite Church.

Before 1893 the organization of the church was rather informal and the only officers were the pastors and deacons. No regular congregational meetings were held, nor their proceedings recorded. On Jan. 2, 1893, the congregation adopted a constitution and in October joined the General Conference. In 1956 the pastor was John P. Suderman, who took charge on June 13, 1954. The membership in 1957 was 206. J.P.S.

St. Mary's County (Md.) Old Order Amish Settlement. Amish families began to settle in this county around Mechanicsville in January 1940. The first arrivals were Stephen and Benjamin Stoltzfus and John L. Fisher from Lancaster County and Israel Swarey from Mifflin County, Pa. John L. Fisher was the first minister. In 1953 the district divided into two districts, known as the Southwest District or District A, and the Northwest District or District B. Both are served by John B. Fisher as bishop. The total baptized membership in 1956 was 86. J.B.F.

St-Mihiel, an extinct Mennonite congregation in France formed about the middle of the 19th century by families of the Meuse (q.v.) congregation who lived around the city of St-Mihiel. It died out in 1870 with the death of André Greebill, its only known elder, since no one was found to assume the responsibilities of the ministry. Most of the families joined the Reformed Church; others moved away or became Catholic. Among the family names were Moser, Muller, Hodler, Esch, Génî, and Lebé.

Salem Academy, located two miles west of Salem, Ore., an interdenominational evangelical school, had its beginning in small Bible classes held in the Dallas Mennonite churches in 1930-38 with N. N. Hiebert, H. H. Dick, and Herman D. Wiebe as instructors. In 1938 a district school building was secured and what was then known as Beacon Bible School was organized by a Bible School Society composed of interested members of the Grace Mennonite, Evangelical Mennonite, and Mennonite Brethren churches of Dallas.

In 1944 an evening Bible Institute of an interdenominational nature was begun in the Mennonite Brethren Church in West Salem. In 1945 the efforts of Dallas and Salem together with interests of others of the area were united and the Salem Academy came into being. Classes were begun in the West Salem Mennonite Brethren Church with an enrollment of 75, John W. Ediger as principal, and A. A. Loewen as the first chairman of the Board of Trustees.

In 1946 the present site was purchased and in 1947 the present large concrete block building was erected on an imposing twenty-four-acre hill site campus. Enrollment has risen to and maintained itself at 200-250 during the ensuing years. A teaching staff of some 15 offers fully accredited instruction in grades 7-12, with competent Bible instruction included. Beside the administration building housing offices, 8 large classrooms, laboratory, shop, cafeteria, and chapel stands an unimposing music building and a fully standardized gymnasium-auditorium in the background.

Salem Children's Home, Flanagan, Ill., an organization of the Evangelical Mennonite Church (q.v.) of North America, had its beginning in 1896, when Mr. and Mrs. Daniel King gave their 100-acre farm, located one-half mile east and two miles south of Flanagan, for an orphans' home. The first building was erected in 1898, and additions have been made as the work has grown. At present provision is made for 80 to 90 children, besides rooms for the staff members. Farm lands include 300 acres in the surrounding community given by legacies of Henry Broad, Flanagan, Ill., and Joseph Wagler, Groveland, Ill. The Home is directed by a board chosen from the delegates of the Evangelical Mennonite Church, who in turn appoint staff members from volunteers to help unfortunate children. The Home has influenced the lives of some 1,050 children through the services of over 100 workers. In 1956 the superintendent was E. Dean Short, followed in 1957 by Vernon W. Zimmerman.

Salem Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, located 8 miles north and 3 miles west of Copeland, Haskell Co., Kan., began in 1917, when the first members settled here, going to Montezuma for worship services until 1922. Jacob N. Yost was the first resident minister. In 1925 a new church was built, which was remodeled in 1947 to seat 300. Four ministers and two deacons have been ordained in the history of the church. Sunday school was started in 1922, and a sewing circle in the later 1920's. In 1957 the church had a membership of 175; the ministers were Vernon Nightengale, Orlan Wedel, and John Nightengale.

Salem Deaconess Home and Hospital, located at Salem, Ore., was founded in 1917 under the auspices of the local General Conference, Mennonite Brethren, and Evangelical Mennonite Brethren churches, with Franz B. Wedel as superintendent. The main unit of the hospital had 60 beds. Franz B. Wedel was also the editor of the Salems Stern (q.v.). After he died in 1930 his son Frank F. Wedel became the superintendent. Under him the south unit was added to the main building. In 1948 the hospital administration was reorganized by creating a board of twelve members consisting primarily of local business people, and the name was changed to Salem Memorial Hospital. By this time the hospital had lost its Mennonite denominational character. At present Irwin F. Wedel, the son of Frank F. Wedel, is superintendent. A west unit is being added to the building. The hospital now has 155 beds and two clinics. (Salems Stern, 1919-30.)

Salem Evangelical Mennonite Church, near Gridley, Ill., formerly known as the Defenseless Mennonite Church, had its origin in a schism in the Waldo Amish Mennonite (MC) congregation during the Civil War, after 1863, due to the new insights of the minister into Christian experience with emphasis upon conversion, and the influence of Henry Egly of Indiana, the founder of the Evangelical (Defenseless) Mennonites. The first meetinghouse was erected in 1875, and the second, which has been remodeled twice, in 1893. Joseph Rediger, who was ordained to the ministry in the Amish Mennonite church in 1863, was the first minister. Other ministers who have served the church are John Rediger, Christian King, C. R. Egle, Christian Rediger, Eli J. Oyer, Benjamin E. Rediger, Benjamin Rupp, H. E. Bertsche, I. R. Calhoun, Edward Enns, and C. L. Zimmerman. Several ministers and missionaries have come from this congregation. The membership in 1957 was 196. The congregation is now called the Gridley Mennonite Church. E.E.Z.

Salem (Ore.) Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church was organized in July 1933 as a result of a division in the Dallas (Ore.) E.M.B. Church. The membership was at one time 70. The congregation disbanded in December 1941, but was reconstituted in 1957, with Frank Wiens as pastor. O.H.W.

Salem Home for the Aged began on March 17, 1889, when a frame building was dedicated as a "Home for the Friendless." A group of Krimmer Mennonite Brethren ministers and laymen of the Gnadenau congregation, with Tobias Martin and Amanda Dohner and other public-minded citizens, agreed to operate an orphans' home 2½ miles southeast of Hillsboro, Kan. On Oct. 23, 1893, it was decided that a larger building was needed and a four-story stone structure, 40 x 50 feet, was completed and dedicated on Oct. 18, 1896, as the "Industrial School and Hygiene Home for the Friendless" (q.v.). The institution owned 105 acres of land. On May 10, 1915, the institution was rechartered as the "Salem Home and Hospital," and rearranged to serve the aged and ill. On April 29, 1944, the building was struck by lightning and completely destroyed by fire and the inmates were moved to the Salem Hospital Annex at Hillsboro. In 1956 a new modern hospital was built at a different site and the entire former Salem Hospital and Annex was converted into a larger home for the aged, known as the "Salem Home for the Aged." The remodeled building was dedicated Nov. 3, 1957. Mrs. Ed. Penner and Mrs. Frank V. Wiebe are the superintendents of the institution. At the time of dedication the home had 43 inmates. More facilities are to be added. The Salem Home for the Aged is operated by a corporation (Home for the Aged, Inc.) representing seventeen churches of the Hillsboro area, including G.C.M., M.B., K.M.B., and non-Mennonite congregations. D.V.W.

Salem Hospital, at Hillsboro, Kan., was built and sponsored by the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Conference. It was opened in 1918 with a capacity of 18 patient beds. The administration of the hospital for many years was vested in a board of six members and a supervisory nurse; later three additional members were added to the board, one each from the Chamber of Commerce, the First Mennonite Church (GCM), and the Mennonite Brethren of Hillsboro. During the 1920's the hospital conducted a course in nurses' training, which was later dropped. A resident staff of two and three doctors served the hospital.

In 1951 the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Conference sold the hospital to the Hillsboro community. A new Salem Hospital corporation was formed by the elected delegates representing 14 evangelical churches of the community and the city chamber of commerce. The hospital was operated by an administrator under a nine-member board. A $260,000 32-bed modern hospital was built in 1955. A new nurses' home was built near the new hospital by the Hillsboro Chamber of Commerce at a cost of $20,000 and then donated to Salem Hospital, Inc. The original hospital together with an annex which was built some years ago have been converted into the Salem Home for the Aged (q.v.), which is operated under a board separate from the hospital board. Salem Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, located near Jansen (q.v.), Neb., was organized Jan. 1, 1881, at which time two ministers, Peter Thiessen and Peter Fast, were elected from the group under the direction of Elder Jacob A. Wiebe. By this time 34 persons had been converted and baptized as a result of a revival. Homes and a schoolhouse served as meeting places until 1885, when a frame meetinghouse was built. It was replaced in 1905 by a brick building, which was moved to Hillsboro, Kan., in 1947, as an addition to the Old People's Home. In 1912 there was a membership of 68. The congregation was dissolved in 1930. C.F.P.

Salem Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church, located in the rural municipality (township) of Laird, Waldheim, Sask. Its original eight members immigrated from Bon Homme and Turner counties, S.D., in April 1899, and possibly organized the following month when services, including Sunday school, were conducted in farm homes. In 1905, after a great revival, the first meetinghouse was built, which was destroyed by fire in 1934, but was immediately replaced by the present frame structure with a seating capacity of 350. The membership in 1956 was 125. Heinrich A. Goossen served as elder and leader from 1899 to 1936, followed by Edwin T. Schmidt. The minister in 1956 was Ed H. Epp. E.T.S.

Salem Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church, located 10 miles southwest of Bridgewater, Hutchinson Co., S.D., was organized on Nov. 25, 1886, with a membership of 16. In 1900 a frame church was built as the first meetinghouse. Under this a full basement was built in 1917, and in 1944 the building was remodeled and enlarged. The leaders who have served the congregation are Henry A. Goosen 1889-99, Dietrich Goosen 1899-1910, Jacob J. Hofer 1910-19, and David M. Tschetter 1919-. In 1956 the membership was 237, with J. J. Kleinsasser serving as leader. D.W.T.

Salem Mennonite Brethren Church, sometimes known as the Colby Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, located 4 miles southwest of Mingo, Thomas Co., Kan., was organized in 1922, with P. E. Dahl as leader. From 1920 on, when Mennonite Brethren and General Conference Mennonite families moved into the area, members of both conferences met for worship under the leadership of D. J. Heinze. When additional families of both groups arrived each organized separately. Because of disunity and the depression members moved to Colorado and California. The congregation was dissolved in 1934. The highest membership was approximately 40. The church building has been preserved by a former member for possible future use. I.G.N.

Salem Mennonite Church (MC), located near To-field, Alberta, dates back to 1910, when several families, including Bishop N. E. Roth, moved into the area from Nebraska. The congregation was organized under the Western Amish Mennonite Conference; with the arrival of more settlers, including most of the Mayton (Alberta) Mennonite congregation, it affiliated with the Alberta-Saskatchewan Mennonite Conference. The meetinghouse was built in 1911, enlarged in 1915 and 1926, and replaced by a new one, 52 x 80 ft., in 1954. Former ministers include N. E. Roth, bishop 1911-39, and J. K. Lehman. This congregation, with 253 members in 1957, is the largest in the Alberta-Saskatchewan Conference district. The congregation is active in the support of missions. An extension church is located at Round Hill, about 6 miles southwest, where Sunday school and church services are held each Sunday. In 1957 John B. Stauffer was the bishop, and Milo D. Stutzman, Paul L. Voegtlin, and Harold Boettger the ministers of the Salem congregation.

Salem Mennonite Church (MC), located one-half mile south and 5 miles west of New Paris, Elkhart Co., Ind., a member of the Indiana-Michigan Conference, was organized by R. J. Smid (1814-93) in 1889. About one half of the charter members were Mennonite immigrants from Balk (q.v.), Friesland, Netherlands, who had arrived in 1853 and had held Dutch services in homes and schoolhouses, and also attended German services in the Christophel Mennonite church, an alternate meeting place for the Yellow Creek (q.v.) Mennonite Church. The meetinghouse was built in 1889 and enlarged in 1919. Ministers of the congregation have been R. J. Smid (Schmidt), J. H. Bare (ordained 1906), Ray F. Yoder, the present bishop (ordained 1918), and Francis E. Freed (ordained 1939) and Harold D. Myers, the present ministers (1958). The membership is 166.

Salem Mennonite Church (GCM), now extinct, located about 5 miles southwest of the present town of Wellman, Washington Co., Iowa, was probably organized in 1865. The Rupps, Desters, Schmitts, and possibly others from Lee County, Iowa, established the settlement. William Galle served for a time as elder and as the teacher in the parochial school. The largest number observing communion service was 31, in October 1876. About this time the members began moving to Kansas. The last business meeting of the church of which there is a record was held in November 1880.

Salem Mennonite Church (GCM), now extinct, member of the Northern District Conference, in Butterfield, Watonwan Co., Minn., was organized in 1896 under the sponsorship of the Bethel Church of Mountain Lake, a neighboring town. A church building was erected that same year. In 1915 the Menno Simons congregation in Butterfield, of Swiss origin, merged with the Salem Church. In a few years friction developed between the two groups which caused the Swiss members to leave Salem in 1921 and build a new church in 1922, known today as the Mennonite Church of Butterfield. The "Gemeinde-Chronik" of Salem has no membership list, but an aged former member reports that it never had more than 50 members. The separation of the two groups left the Salem congregation in a weakened position. On Oct. 2, 1926, the congregation decided to sell the church and dispose of all church property. The last entry in the official record is made July 16, 1934, when the Salem Church organization was formally dissolved. A few of its former members had died, some moved away, and others joined neighboring congregations.

The first meetinghouse was dedicated on Nov. 28, 1886. A. A. Sommer was chosen as the first regular pastor. The present building is a result of additions and four remodeling programs. The congregation in 1957 had 204 baptized members, with James R. Reusser as minister.

Salem Mennonite (MC) Church, a member of the Ohio and Eastern Mennonite Conference, located 2½ miles northeast of Elida, Allen Co., Ohio, was organized in 1841 with 48 charter members. The first families came in part from near Harrisonburg, Va., and in part from Fairfield County, Ohio, near Columbus. The first meetinghouse, according to tradition, was erected in 1843, but the lot was purchased in 1847.

It was first called Sherrick's (Sherk's) church because of the numerous families by that name, but after the Civil War it was renamed Salem, because peace had been secured, Shalom being the Hebrew word for peace. In 1857 a frame building was erected, replaced by a larger building (40 x 60 ft.) in 1883. In 1860-94 a part of the congregation which had moved westward began worshiping near Gomer, and in 1874 erected a meetinghouse and formed the Pike (q.v.) congregation. The two congregations worked closely together and for many years held services alternately in the two meetinghouses. In 1925 a group expelled from the Salem-Pike congregation organized the Central (q.v.) Church in Elida.

The first minister and bishop at Salem was George Stemen, who had been ordained bishop shortly before in Fairfield County (q.v., 1846-95). An outstanding leader was Bishop John M. Brenne-man who had been ordained bishop in Franklin County before (1849) moving to Allen County in 1855. J. M. Shenk (1848-1935) was a long-time leader, ordained minister in 1874 and bishop in 1884. In 1957 Richard E. Martin was a pastor at Salem, with 92 members.

Salem Mennonite Church (MC), located 2 miles southeast of Smithville, half way between Orrville and Wooster in Wayne County, Ohio, a member of the Ohio and Eastern Conference, was founded in 1891 as a daughter congregation of the Martins church (q.v.), the meetinghouse being built in that year. Actually the origin of the congregation was largely due to David Hostetler and Solomon Plank, preacher and deacon respectively in the Oak Grove Amish Mennonite Church (q.v.), who, being dissatisfied with some of the conservative practices of the congregation, transferred to the Martins congregation in 1890, and became the first ministers of the Salem congregation. A few Oak Grove members followed them to Salem, but the total initial group was not large. In 1905 the membership was 55. In 1957 the membership was 45, with Daniel Hilty and Paul Showalter as ministers.

Salem Mennonite Church (GCM), located 5 miles northeast of Cordell, Washita County, Okla., with

H. D. Schmidt as minister and a membership of 20, was listed by H. P. Krehbiel, Mennonite Churches of North America (1911). The Minutes and Reports of the Western District Conference, starting 1913, list a Salem Mennonite Church at Weatherford, Okla., which is likely the same congregation. The last time the church is mentioned in the Minutes was in 1918, at which time it was represented by R. Riessen.

Salem Mennonite Church (MC), located in the village of Shelly, Pa., a member of the Franconia Conference, was organized in August 1950 by Elmer M. Mack, chairman of the Franconia mission board. The church auditorium is in a four-story brick building, formerly a factory, which also contains the pastor's residence. The membership in 1958 was 87, with Lester K. Moyer as pastor.

Salem Mennonite Church (GCM), located at Freeman, S.D., had its beginning during the summer of 1907, when the Swiss Mennonite settlement east of Freeman decided to divide as a congregation. The northern half of the settlement remained with the original Salem-Zion congregation, and the southern half withdrew and became the Salem Mennonite Church. Land was purchased 2½ miles south of the Salem-Zion church and a meetinghouse was built, dedicated on May 24, 1908. On Jan. 2, 1909, a constitution was adopted. In 1913 a cemetery was begun. In the fall and winter of 1916-17 the church building was greatly enlarged to its present size. In 1920 a large parsonage was erected south of the church. Ministers who have served the Salem church are Christian Mueller 1908-10 and 1919-20, Christian Hege 1911-19, E. J. Neuenschwander 1920-24, W. S. Gottschall 1924-30, P. R. Schroeder 1930-40, Willard Claassen 1941-52, and J. Herbert Fretz 1953-. The membership of the Salem congregation in 1957 was 542. The common names are Preheim, Waltner, Kaufman, Graber, Gering, Miller, Ries, and Schrag. Recent missionaries from the congregation are Mrs. Orlando Waltner in India, and Mrs. Verney Unruh and Mrs. Raymond Reimer in Japan.

Salem Mennonite Church (MC) is a rural mission church at Needmore, Hardy Co., W. Va., under the Virginia Conference. Either before or soon after the Civil War (1861-65) ministers from Broadway, Va., traveled 45 miles to Bean Settlement, 6 miles north of this church, and preached at a schoolhouse, giving pastoral care to a few members living there. Later they also preached at the Mine Spring schoolhouse near by.

In 1927 a church was built here, which was enlarged in 1948 by adding two Sunday-school rooms. This congregation is the result of one of the first efforts of rural evangelism of the Northern District of the Virginia Conference. The membership in 1957 was 113; the pastor was Samuel A. Shank.

Salem Publishing House, Inman, Kan., was owned and operated 1934-58 by the J. H. Klassen family, members of the Krimmer Mennonite Brethren. It printed several Mennonite church papers, such as the Wahrheitsfreund, Christian Witness, Zion's Tid- ings, and Gospel Tidings, and also the Sower for the Northern Bible Society of Duluth, Minn. They also did binding and rebinding of worn Bibles. The firm had its beginning in a low one-room building, but later acquired a brick and tile building, 35 x 100 ft., with a stock room and a small retail bookstore. In 1958 this firm changed its name to The Klassen Bookbindery and sold its printing equipment and bookstore. It still rebinds worn Bibles as a hobby.

Salem Ridge Mennonite Church (MC), Route 3, Greencastle, Pa., was established in 1946 and had 60 members in 1957, with Charles E. Shank as minister. Its location is 3 miles south of Greencastle and one-half mile east of Route 11.

The German language was used primarily, although there was an occasional report in English.

Salemskirche (Salem Mennonite Church), a brick building erected in 1847 six miles south of Ashland, Ohio, by John Risser (q.v.), a Mennonite preacher, and his fellow immigrants from the Bavarian Palatinate, following Risser's unsuccessful attempt to work harmoniously with the local American Mennonites at Pleasant Ridge (q.v.). It replaced another log church-school building erected near by in 1835, three years after Risser and his family arrived. Risser lost interest in preaching soon after the church was built and permitted the German Reformed and Lutheran groups, served by their own pastors, to hold services in the building. The Mennonite congregation worshiped with them. After the middle of the century an attempt to hold English services was thwarted by the discovery that the deed to the property prohibited holding any but German services in the building. Assistance from the Mennonite school at Wadsworth revived interest, but conditions were not conducive to healthy congregational growth. Risser's coreligionists from the Palatinate, some destined to rise high in later Mennonite circles, stopped briefly in Ashland County and then continued west to Summerfield, Ill., or Donnellson, Iowa. The last pastors of the congregation were Carl H. Anton van der Smissen (q.v.), later of Newton, Kan., 1874-79, and his illustrious father, Carl Justus van der Smissen (q.v.), who had come from Hamburg-Altona in Germany to teach the German theological courses at the Wadsworth Mennonite school. But even before the latter's death in 1890 some of the younger members preferred English services. Most of the remaining members at Salem, a few from the old Mennonite congregation at Pleasant Ridge, and practically all of their German Reformed and Lutheran neighbors united to build the "Stone" Lutheran church a half mile north of the Salem church. The Salem church has been removed to enlarge the cemetery. The Stone Lutheran congregation is a flourishing organization. J.S.U.

Salem-Zion Mennonite Church (GCM), located 5 miles east of Freeman, S.D., a member of the Northern District Conference, was formed out of two congregations which had their origin in Russia, coming from two separate Russian villages in Volhynia (q.v.) in 1874, the Salem group from Horodyszczce and the Zion group from Waldheim. After worshipping for a number of years in homes, they built separate meetinghouses and continued to worship separately until 1902, when the Zion church was destroyed by a cyclone. Then the two congregations merged, forming the Salem-Zion church. The first ministers immigrated with their congregations in 1874. With the Salem group came Peter Kaufman as elder and Christian Graber as minister. In 1878 the Salem church elected Christian Kaufman as elder and Christian Mueller as minister. In 1907 a group organized the present Salem Mennonite Church (q.v.) with Christian Mueller as minister. When the Zion church was destroyed, Joseph Kaufman of that church served in the Salem-Zion church. In 1957 the congregation had a membership of 426, with Olin A. Krehbiel as pastor, who succeeded Russel L. Mast. A new meetinghouse was dedicated in 1958.

Salford Mennonite (MC) Church was one of the early Mennonite settlements in what is now Montgomery County, Pa. The first house of worship was built sometime prior to the first purchase of land by the congregation in 1728. The grantors of the land were Heinrich and Modlena Ruth, and the grantees were Henry Funk (q.v.), Dielman Kolb (q.v.), Christian Meyer, and Abraham Reiff. These men were or later became ordained Mennonite church officials, Funk a bishop, Kolb a preacher, and Meyer and Reiff deacons. Services were conducted exclusively in German for almost two centuries. The first English-speaking preacher was ordained in 1915. Salford is remembered as the location of one of the schools taught by the noted Mennonite schoolmaster, Christopher Dock (q.v.), whose other school was at Skippack. About 1770 the original Salford meetinghouse was replaced by a larger one. D. K. Cassel (q.v.) taught school in this meetinghouse in 1839. It was replaced by another in 1850, which was enlarged in 1897, but was torn down in 1924, when the present house of worship, the fourth, was built, 56 x 88 feet in size. Perhaps the most noted minister in the past century was Henry S. Bower (1836-1909), ordained in 1865. In 1958 the ministers were Rein A. Alderfer and Henry L. Ruth. The membership was above 250 in 1884; in 1958 it was 420.

in Holland, in which they declared that they had read with full agreement the confession of faith by Hans de Ries and Lubbert Gerritsz, and made a proposal to form a union with the Dutch Waterlanders. The union, however, did not come about. (See also Coventry and England; Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 1372-75.) vDZ.

Salm, a Dutch Mennonite family of Amsterdam, Netherlands, members of the Old Frisian (Arke Noachs) congregation from the 17th century, and later also in the United Mennonite Church. Many of them were deacons, but none was a preacher. The ancestor of the family, as far as is known, was Claes Sybrandtsz Salm (1609-64), of Amsterdam, who was a builder of barges and later was a salmon merchant, from which the name was derived. The Amsterdam Salm family became very wealthy in the 18th and 19th centuries (most of them were sugar, tobacco, etc., brokers). Abraham Salm Gz (d. 1915 at Amsterdam), for some time a deacon of the Amsterdam congregation, was an architect. Members of the Salm family were formerly also found at Zaandam. vDZ.

Salm (Salmer), a former small Mennonite congregation in the Bruche Valley of Upper Alsace (q.v.), about 50 miles southwest of Strasbourg in the Vosges Mountains, now extinct. It is not clear when the congregation was established, certainly it existed at the time of the expulsion of the Mennonites from Markirch in 1712, possibly already in the 17th century. A second group, closely related to Salm, located at Blanc-Rupt (q.v.), which separated from Salm after the middle of the 19th century as a result of a schism. The Dutch Naamlijst of 1769 mentions that it was formed by Swiss emigrants with Christian Ringe(n)berg as elder. The Naamlijst of 1775 states that Jakob Kupferschmidt (d. 1813) served as its elder from 1766, Hans Rube also being an elder and Peter Gerber a preacher. The names of the same ministers are found in following Naamlijsts, but not in those of 1793 and after; then Christian Ringenberg is again named as its elder. Other known elders with dates were Michel Saltzmann (1759), Hans Guengerich, Jogi Mosimann, Christian Gerber (d. 1824), Andrée Shirch (1822), Nicolas Augsburg (d. 1890), Pierre Sommer (d. 1878), Hans Beller (d. 1892), Joseph Beller (1874, d. 1910), Henri Neuhauser (ord. 1882). In 1837 it numbered 60 souls, children included. In 1881 it still existed, then numbering 50 souls, with three elders, one preacher, and one deacon. When the congregation disappeared is not certain.

After the death of Elder Augsburg the congregation relocated its worship somewhat south of Salm at a place called Les Quelles (q.v.). The congregation known as Bénaville (q.v.) was formed in 1924 from former members of the Salm congregation. The book by Alfred Michiels, Les Anabaptistes des Vosges (Paris, 1860), describes the Salm Mennonites, including a visit in the home of Elder Augsburg. vDZ., H.S.B.

Salminger, Sigmund, a former monastic priest (a Franciscan) of Munich, Bavaria, Germany, was one of the founders of the Augsburg Anabaptist congregation (q.v.). He and his wife Anna (q.v.), who was a faithful companion to him, were baptized in March 1527 by Hans Hut on the occasion of his second visit to Augsburg, which lasted nine or ten days, and was chosen by lot as Vorsteher of the Augsburg congregation at its first organization. He was, however, seized soon after Sept. 15, 1527. Among those he baptized was the "Mangmeisterin" Plöck(in), who was expelled from the city with her infant of eight weeks. In addition he baptized several peasants who did not live in Augsburg, as well as Sebastian Vischgatter, a citizen, Elisabeth, the wife of Gall Vischer, and Katharina, wife of Hans Kunig, the stone mason, who had recanted on Oct. 3, 1527, but was rearrested in May 1528.

After spending more than three years in prison Salminger recanted on Dec. 17, 1530, and was released. His written recantation and also a letter he wrote to the council requesting permission for his wife's return to the city (already previously published by Greiff) were published by Schletterer (180, 182). Penniless and a physical wreck Salminger left the prison. Since he was unable to pay his board he was ordered in March 1531 to leave the city; but it was impossible for him to comply on account of the inclement weather and the state of his health. He was granted a brief respite, but at its expiration was just as wretched as before. He therefore wrote a petition to the council, asking permission to stay and offering his services.

Wackernagel published four of Salminger's hymns (pp. 807-11). Salminger had poetic and musical gifts which poured themselves out in religious songs. In the oldest hymnal of Augsburg some of the finest hymns are those from Salminger's pen. HEGE.

Salmuth, Johann (b. 1552), court chaplain at Dresden, Germany, an opponent of the Anabaptists, the son of Heinrich Salmuth who was Superintendent of Leipzig and professor of theology at the local university. He published a Calvinist edition of the Bible in 1591, in which he attacked Luther and mingled attacks on the Anabaptists into his accusations. Like a red thread the struggle against the Anabaptists goes through his entire Bible. The line of demarcation between Calvinism and Anabaptism is drawn exceedingly sharply. The editors rejected the Anabaptist position on the oath (Deut. 6:13). In opposition to the Anabaptists they recognized the legitimacy of just wars (Deut. 20:1). They opposed the Anabaptist separation of church and state, stating that it is the duty of the government to take the work of the Reformation in hand and that participation in the work of the government is a service to one's neighbor which promotes the glory of God (Gen. 41:40; Num. 36:1). They specifically attacked community of goods as introduced by the Anabaptists (Num. 32:5), arguing that riches do not necessarily lead to unbelief (Gen. 13:2). Also in opposition to the ascetic earnestness of the Anabaptists, they frequently advocate a certain joy in the world; to be happy is not wrong as the Anabaptists fanatically believe, only one must not forget God and one's neighbor in being happy (I Chron. 13:40). And in the reference to Thomas Müntzer (Judg. 7:18) and the Peasants' War (Num. 16:3) a warning was given against the abuse of Christian liberty: revolt is not at all permissible and even against a tyrant the people have no right to rebel (I Sam. 8:5). Here the comment is expressly added: "To refute the seditious conduct of the Anabaptists on the annihilation of temporal regents." HEGE.

Saltillo Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, located about 55 miles south of Saltillo, Coahuila, in Nuevo Leon, Mex., was founded in 1945 by several Koehn families from Cuauhtemoc, Mex., who had previously migrated from Oklahoma, including the minister, Henry B. Koehn. However, after enduring a few years of drought they left and Saltillo became a mission outpost. In 1958 there were 24 members. Originally services, both English and Spanish, were held in the home of the minister. At present services are conducted only in Spanish.

In 1957 there were 15 members, with Ross Goldfus as pastor.

Salunga Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, located 9 miles northwest of Lancaster, Pa., was a member of the Lancaster Conference; through the instrumentality of Deacon Jacob M. Greider a brick meetinghouse, 50 x 65 ft., was built in 1893. It was a part of the Landisville-Chestnut Hill circuit. In 1954 the building was turned over to the Eastern Board of Missions and Charities for its headquarters, and the congregational activities completely merged with those of the Landisville congregation. Salzburg. The struggle against the Anabaptists could be carried on with much greater vigor in Salzburg than in the Austrian hereditary lands, since here the temporal and spiritual authority were combined in the archbishop. In Salzburg there were resident Anabaptists as early as 1526. Of Jörg Zeller it is related that he had brought the symbol "which is called rebaptism" to his home in Franconia from Salzburg, and several of the Anabaptists seized early in 1528 in the Bavarian district of Auerbach came from Salzburg; among these were Antoni, who had commissioned Hans Stieglitz to baptize, and Gilg, a former priest, then a leader of the Anabaptists, who had received his commission from Dorfbrunner (q.v.).

The extensive spread of Anabaptism in the bishopric of Salzburg is seen in the numerous mandates as well as the complaints of Archbishop Matthäus, who wrote on July 4, 1527, that he had to work day and night with his councillors to stamp out Anabaptists in his bishopric. One of the mandates warns the populace on penalty of death not to become involved in "such unchristian acts of rebaptism." The judges were ordered to pursue the matter with vigor, and prevent meetings "in which such seducing deeds are perpetrated," organize posses, and especially to proceed against foreigners who were found in these meetings, in accord with the mandate which was to be nailed to the door of the city hall and read in all public places (Oct. 25, 1527).

In two days another mandate appeared warning against involvement with Anabaptism either in word or deed; books were to be burned; giving an Anabaptist food or shelter was punishable by having the house of the perpetrator destroyed. All Anabaptists from the outside were to leave within eight days. The next decree (Nov. 14, 1527) was issued to the pastors of Hallein, Tittmoning, Laufen, and Radstadt, notifying them that two Anabaptists had been punished and several had recanted; it was known that there were still several in the country, and to prevent the spread of their evil doctrines instructions were sent showing the common man how to deal with them, what questions were to be asked of them, and how the recantation formula was to be worded. Suspects were to be questioned concerning any possible communistic ideas, views on government, the deity of Christ, and the Lord's Supper, the number of persons any one might have baptized, the sending out of missionaries, their views on the Last Judgment, whether it is possible to be saved without rebaptism, etc.

The consequences of the severe persecution in Moravia and Austria on the one hand and Tirol on the other would naturally be evident in Salzburg. Indications of this are seen in the Neue Zeitung of 1528, whose author claims to have been an eyewitness: "Here (in Salzburg?) the guest Brethren have gathered, preached, and established their rebaptism. Thirty-two persons were surprised and arrested. They would not desist from their errors nor name their brethren and sisters." "Ten of them including their preacher were punished." Those who would not recant were burned at the stake in the Fronhof. Five who confessed their error were beheaded and then burned. A woman and a girl of sixteen, daughter of the goldsmith Georg Stein (see Steiner, Georg), the friend and companion of Hans Hut, who could have saved their lives by recanting, were sentenced to death. The executioner took the girl in his arm, carried her to the horse trough, and held her under the water until she died. She laughed at the sight of the water. Cases of this kind were in the mind of the lawyer Hepstein, when he protested to the city council of Augsburg on Jan. 25, 1529, that nothing could be achieved by slaughtering the Anabaptists: "In Austria the young girls come running and request to be put to death." On November 1 four were put to death, among them Wolf Paumann, the judge of Tittmoning; although he recanted and offered to give all his goods he was beheaded. In the same manner three brethren ended their lives in Mühlendorf. On November 5 ten women and several men were driven out of the city, although they had recanted. Eleven women and sixteen men together with their preacher were seized at a meeting in a solitary place about a half hour from Salzburg and taken to Halle. Refusing to recant, they were locked into the house where they had met and were burned with it. This was also the fate of two other houses in which the Anabaptists had been meeting. "There are therefore about forty-one persons still languishing in prison," says the Neue Zeitung.

The Hutterite chronicles also write of such executions. "The elect saints," writes Leonhard Schiemer (q.v.) on Dec. 3, 1527, "who at this time are praising God in Salzburg and at other places with their martyrdom, must have bathed in tubs of oil, else they would not have remained constant in faith." "Pray to God," he writes in a second epistle, "for our brother Schreiner from Brixlegg, who lies in prison with his wife in Lofer."

But there were still some Anabaptists known to be in Salzburg. The watch on foreigners was sharpened. A new directive issued on Jan. 4, 1528, prohibited discussion of Lutheran (Protestant) doctrine with travelers. The archbishop noted that the Anabaptists were moving to Tirol to gain a foothold. At the same time he informed the administrator of Passau, who had also seized many Anabaptists at this time, of the situation in Salzburg. The penalties of the preceding year were increased. Whereas the previous mandate ordered death by burning for all Anabaptists, those who recanted were to be beheaded before being burned; those who were only misled and had not themselves baptized, but had given food and shelter to the Anabaptists, should be drowned. Now those who gave shelter were to have their houses destroyed, pay a fine, be imprisoned, have their clothing removed, and the foreigners to be placed in the stocks and beaten with rods. All the penalties were defined, even for carelessness in this matter. Thereby Salzburg set the pattern for its neighbors; it was even followed in Nürnberg (q.v.). Only rarely did an Anabaptist meet a kind fate in Salzburg, such as that of Asmus Gschöll, who after he had finished his prison term appealed to Innsbruck that he should not again be tried for his Anabaptism. Of course, as persecution in Tirol increased, many Anabaptists returned to Salzburg, causing grave concern to the rulers. On June 4, 1533, Ferdinand I wrote to the archbishop that he had definite information that the Anabaptists were creeping into Rattenberg, Kufstein, Kitzbühel, and into the valleys of the bishopric of Salzburg, and that it was very urgently necessary to send three spies thither at once. The archbishop hastened to comply. Among the Anabaptists there was in general greater activity at this time. Early in 1534 "a goodly number of persons of Berchtesgaden came to Anabaptism," of whom more than twenty persons of property fled. The bailiff of Mosham, Wolf Kentscherner, was instructed on February 16 to arrest these Anabaptists and to look for those who had fled to Lungau. He arrested the mine superintendent Jörg Weissheympt and his wife as Anabaptists. Both begged for mercy; it was granted in return for recantation and security. The bailiff was informed that some, under the pretext of being related to the miners, were able to penetrate far into the mountains, lodge with remote peasants, and fill the people with their teaching. On May 6, 1534, Kentscherner received orders to be doubly vigilant, with reference to events at Münster. A similar uprising was feared at Salzburg, and all measures were adopted to fortify the country as if for war. The archbishop kept himself informed about the progress of events at Münster. All arrested Anabaptists were questioned to establish any possible connections. The statements of the prisoners show very clearly that no such connection existed, for the Anabaptists of the South had little connection with those of the North. Konrad Siebenburger, seized with other Anabaptists, recanted on May 14 at St. Johann. In November an officer of Burghausen reported that he had drowned Margarethe Moser and her daughter Walpurg without trial because they had been rebaptized. In the following year many Anabaptists on their way from Moravia to and through Bavaria were captured in Passau. Among them was a leader, a tailor. Many recanted and were released; others were still in prison. In 1541 and 1542 several Anabaptists were put to death by fire or water. The Hutterian chronicles relate a bit of valor on the part of Leonhard Bernkopf at the stake. "This side is now roast enough; turn me to roast the other side now." . . . "Therefore he will on the other side have a harp in his hands." From Golding the Anabaptists in the spring of 1531 migrated into Lungau territory by way of the Radstatt valleys, and from there to Moravia. In Lungau and in Golding there were still some Anabaptists; their presence annoyed the archbishop. The bailiff of Mosham reported that no Anabaptist passed through the defiles there, though they may have crossed the mountains at some other place. The regulations of 1529 against the Anabaptists were renewed in 1544 and proclaimed in all Salzburg. Nevertheless there were still some present. In 1547 two of them were arrested in Lungau.

The great provincial synod of 1549 issued strict regulations against the Anabaptists in general and against their publications in particular. In consequence of the watchfulness of the clergy it became impossible for the Anabaptists to maintain themselves except in the mountains, and they were now in close contact with those expelled from Moravia. A church inspection instituted in 1555 by Archbishop Michael Koenberg revealed some scattered Anabaptists in Golling and Gastein, and a mandate issued in September 1558 gave strict orders that children must be brought to baptism. Concerning the next year the chronicles report that Wolf Maier and a Hueber were put to death with the sword at Tittmoning in the Salzburg district.

On April 20, 1567, the archbishop ordered the provost of the Zillertal to evaluate the confiscated property of a citizen who had become an Anabaptist; there were very likely some Anabaptists among the "sectarians" whom the archbishop ordered the authorities of Rattenberg, Kitzbühel, and Kufstein to find and bring to judgment.

Of especial interest is the story of the clockmaker Veit Grünberger from the Pinzgau, a Vorsteher of the Anabaptists, who visited Tirol nearly every year after 1564 and held his "revier" in the vicinity of Imst. In 1570 he was seized in a forest in the Pinzgau. His replies in the cross-examination indicate that people of this kind found sympathy not only among the lower classes, but also among the educated. Not until the third year of his arrest was he brought to trial. In the seventh year of his imprisonment, after suffering much misery and tribulation he managed to escape through a window. The castle guards said it was impossible to escape by that route; Veit said, "With God all things are possible." On Aug. 1, 1576, he reached his brethren in Moravia.

In July 1573 the archbishop again issued a mandate against the Anabaptists, "because this shameless sect will not clear out of the country." Six years later Hans Zuckenhammer, a smith, and Wolf Rauer, a tailor, who had been sent to Württemberg by the brotherhood in Moravia, were seized in Tübingen and taken to Hohensalzburg; they were released in 1580. Two hymns deal with Zuckenhammer's imprisonment.

In the following years the authorities had little trouble with the Anabaptists. Their chronicles are inexact when in the table of martyrs they put the archbishopric of Salzburg in the ninth place: at Salzburg 38, Berchtesgaden 18, Martel-Lofer 2, Ruckeltal 3.

On the other hand, the Hutterian chronicles of 1584 again tell of a Salzburg Anabaptist, Leonhard Sumerauer, who was arrested at Tittmoning, having boarded a boat en route to Moravia. He managed to escape at Burghausen, but was recaptured, tortured, and beheaded at Burghausen on July 5, 1585. In his case, too, the attitude of the populace was apparent. When he was told to deny only the doctrines of baptism and communion, Sumerauer replied, "Leave me in peace. I want to die upon my faith." Thereupon the executioner said, "I do not like to put you to death; but if I do not do it, another will." His death was commemorated by the Brethren in a hymn.

Great zeal in persecuting the Anabaptists was shown by Archbishop Wolf Dietrich von Raitenau. In a decree of July 1, 1593, he ordered that Anabaptists should be killed by fire and sword, and the property of fugitives be confiscated. The last Anabaptists were no doubt, with few exceptions, wiped out by the Counter Reformation, which had already been carried out in the neighboring Inner Austrian provinces in 1598. LOSERTH.

Samara (now Kuibyshev), a province of Russia located on the Volga River, also the name of the capital of the province. To the north it borders on the province of Kazan, in the west on Simbirsk, in the south on Astrakhan, and in the east on Ufa, Orenburg, and the Ural Mountains. It consists of 20,000 square miles and had a population of three million at the turn of the century.

In 1853 Mennonites direct from Prussia established the Trakt (q.v.) settlement consisting of 10 villages and an acreage of 37,800 in the southern part of the province near the Volga River. In 1859 a second settlement of Prussian Mennonites was started in the province known as Alexandertal (q.v.) or Alt-Samara consisting of 8 villages and an acreage of 26,500, which later was nearly doubled.

In 1890 the daughter settlement of Pleshanovsk (q.v.) or Neu-Samara, consisting of 12 villages and an acreage of 59,400, was established east of Alexandertal. In 1897 a small group of Alexandertal Mennonites established a settlement near Bezentschuk (q.v.) in the vicinity of the city of Samara. Originally the settlement consisted of some 75 persons with an acreage of 5,400.

Before World War II these four settlements in the province of Samara consisted of a total of approximately 35 villages, and a population of 6,750 with an acreage of 176,580. Samara and Saratoff were the provinces on the Volga River in which large non-Mennonite German settlements were established, which under the Soviets were organized for a while as the German Volga Republic. According to available information, most of these German settlements, including those of the Mennonites, disintegrated before and during World War II. Most of the population was sent beyond the Ural Mountains. C.K.

Sammlung Georg Leibbrandt is a series of publications dealing with the former German population in Russia, prepared under the direction of Ernst Meynen. Georg Leibbrandt, after whom the series is named, had written numerous books on the German population in Russia and was prominent in this field during the days of Hitler and the occupation of Russia during World War II. The full series appeared in several subsections.

Of special significance for Mennonite research are the volumes III, IV, and VI of the section Quellen und Materialien zur Erforschung des Deutschtums in Osteuropa. They are: Hans Rempel, Deutsche Bauernleistung am Schwarzen Meer, Bevölkerung und Wirtschaft 1825 (108 pp., Leipzig, 1941); Margarete Wolner, Die Gemeindeberichte von 1848 der deutschen Siedlungen am Schwarzen Meer (230 pp., Leipzig, 1942); and Otto Auhagen, Die Schicksalswende des russland-deutschen Bauerntums in den Jahren 1927-1930 (197 pp., Leipzig, 1942). Of great significance are also the two publications by K. Stumpp which appeared in the Sammlung Georg Leibbrandt (Publikationsstelle Ost, Berlin, 1943) under the titles Bericht über das Gebiet Chortitza and Bericht über das Gebiet Kronau-Orloff. (Orloff is the Zgradovka Mennonite settlement.) These two books consist primarily of tables on the Mennonite economic and cultural life of these settlements, report at length about the economic and human losses sustained by these settlements from the Revolution to the evacuation in 1943. It is not known whether similar reports exist for other settlements.

Another section of the Sammlung Georg Leibbrandt, entitled Die deutschen Siedlungen in der Sowjetunion, consisted of five volumes (Berlin, 1941), which have the special inscription Sonderausgabe. Nur für den Dienstgebrauch. These booklets deal with regions having a German population and contain large maps of the areas enclosed in pockets in the back. They list names of places and provinces, German population statistics, and the geographical location. Of special interest for Mennonites are volume III, Ukraine mit Krim, and volume IV, Dongebiet und Kaukasus.

Unfortunately very few copies of some of these publications survived World War II. In some instances only one or two copies are extant (Hans Rempel's book). Although these publications appeared during the height of Hitler's campaign and propaganda, they contain very valuable and factual information about the Mennonites of Russia and have been used extensively in the ENCYCLOPEDIA C.K.

San Joaquin Valley, a 250-mile-long valley in central California, separated from the Pacific Ocean by the Coast Ranges, and extending some 70 miles wide eastward to the Sierra Nevada. It extends from the Tehachapi Mountains in the south to Stockton in the north. The river gets its water largely from the Sierra Nevada. The development of the valley began during the Gold Rush of the last century. One hundred years ago it was a barren, worthless desert. Today, through irrigation, it is one of the most productive, diversified, and richest farming areas in the nation.

A total of some 5,100 baptized members of five Mennonite conferences live in the valley, grouped into three major geographical areas: Bakersfield-Shafter in the southern end of the valley with 1,025 members (4 MB congregations with 969 members, 2 in Shafter, one in Bakersfield, and one in Rosedale, and one GCM in Shafter with 56); the central area 70-100 miles to the north (from Dinuba to Fresno and Madera) with 3,323 members (7 MB congregations with 2,440, including 4 in Fresno with 585, Reedley with 1,436, Dinuba with 381, and Madera with 38, 2 GCM with 645, including Reedley with 593 and Fresno with 52, and one KMB at Dinuba with 238); the northern area 60 miles north of Fresno with 627 members (2 CGC with 433, including Winton with 143 and Livingston with 290, one MC at Winton with 75, one GCM at Winton with 68, and one MB at Winton with 51). There are also two small MB churches above Stockton at Lodi (114) and Victor (25). Thus there are in the valley by conferences: MB 3,599, GCM 769, CGC 433, KMB 238, MC 75, a total of 5,114.

In the Shafter-Wasco area near Bakersfield the potato and cotton industries are predominant. Mennonites have settled here since the beginning of the 20th century, and have established prosperous communities with churches at Shafter (q.v.), Rosedale, and Bakersfield (q.v.).

North of this area in the Reedley-Fresno area the Mennonites established themselves around the turn of the century. The first Mennonites came to Reedley in 1903. In 1905 the M.B. church was organized and by 1906 the G.C.M. church. Some of the early settlers came from Kansas and Minnesota. At that time the land consisted mainly of grain fields as far as it was cultivated. New methods of cultivation and the problem of marketing their products caused many difficulties. Some Mennonites went into business. Irrigation was also a major problem. Gradually the grape and raisin industry was accepted also by Mennonites. They raise wine grapes, raisin grapes, table grapes, and sweet grapes, the table and raisin varieties being the most extensively grown. For raisins the Thompson and Muscat varieties are the most suitable. In 1950 the purchase price of a good bearing vineyard varied from $300 to $1,000 per acre including buildings and frequently some equipment. Ninety per cent of commercially grown grapes in the United States are grown in California, primarily in the San Joaquin Valley.

Eighty-six per cent of the Mennonites of California live in the valley, including almost a third of the M.B. membership in the United States. C.K.

San Jose Mennonite Brethren Church, located at 1195 Clark St., in San Jose, Cal., 45 miles from San Francisco, was organized on Oct. 20, 1940, with 20 charter members. Five pastors have served the congregation: D. J. Gerbrandt, J. J. Gerbrandt, A. Nickel, J. K. Warkentin, and William Neufeld, the present (1957) pastor. The congregation has used five places of worship. It began in a small Legion Hall until a small building on Montgomery Street could be purchased. Later a larger building was secured on Delmas Street. After this building was sold and until the present church was built (1951), the congregation met in Germania Hall. The membership in 1957 was 365. W.N.E.

San Juan Colony, near the city of Irapuato, Mexico, a short-lived (1924-25) colonization effort by a group of Mennonite refugees from Russia, sponsored by H. P. San Luis Potosi, one of the 28 states of Mexico. A small settlement of six Old Order Mennonite and Old Order Amish families was made in 1944 in a tropical area of this state about 130 miles inland from the gulf coast town of Tampico, led by Aaron Martin, of Lancaster County, Pa. The move to Mexico was made partially in protest to the governmental restrictions brought on by World War II; Martin and his followers were protesting against the militarization of America. For a short time (1943) these families lived with the Old Colony Mennonites in Chihuahua. In 1944 they settled in this isolated section of San Luis Potosi. The settlement effort was brief. After a few years Martin died and the rest of the families scattered, most of them returning to the United States. J.W.F.

San Marcos Mennonite Church (GCM), located at Chimney Rock near Paso Robles, Cal., was the first Pacific District Conference church to be organized in California. In 1896-97 six Mennonite families from Beatrice, Neb., settled 10 miles northwest of Paso Robles, including the minister, A. J. Wiebe. During these years another Mennonite settlement was established in the Estrella district, east of Paso Robles, among whom was Jacob Hege, a preacher. In 1897 these two groups, though rather far apart, organized a congregation. Hege was elected elder and Wiebe his assistant. In 1898 the congregation built its first church at Chimney Rock, northwest of Paso Robles. Since the two settlements were so widely separated, and transportation was difficult, it became necessary to establish two meeting places, one group continuing to meet at the new church with Wiebe, while the other group met in an adobe church near Estrella with Hege. Monthly union meetings were conducted in order to maintain the spirit of fellowship between them.

In the fall of 1901 John K. Lichti was called to assist Hege at Estrella. In May 1903 a joint council was called at Paso Robles to discuss various problems within the congregation. The discussion became so acute that the congregation was ordered dissolved. The group at Estrella immediately organized as the First Mennonite Church of Paso Robles (q.v.). The western group organized in 1904, with 39 members, taking the name San Marcos Mennonite Church. F. F. Jantzen was the first elder, with A. J. Wiebe continuing as minister. The San Marcos meetinghouse was moved to Willow Creek in 1911, but the congregation continued to be called San Marcos. In 1943 the name was changed to Second Mennonite Church of Paso Robles, and in 1954 to Willow Creek (q.v.). In 1958 the membership was 122, with J. M. Galle as interim pastor. H.D.B.

Sanctification (German, Heiligung). This theological term, seldom used in older Mennonite writing, refers historically to the process by which the Christian who has come to faith in Christ and been justified and regenerated or born again is made holy. The meaning of the term will therefore depend upon the meaning put into the word "holy." In common Christian usage "holy" means morally pure and righteous as God is pure and righteous. Sanctification is therefore generally used to mean the deliverance of the personal life of the Christian from the impurity and power of sin. Actually the original meaning of the New Testament (also Old Testament) word for "make holy" is to dedicate or consecrate to God and His use, and it is used thus of Christ sanctifying Himself (John 10:36 and John 17:19), but it is also so used of disciples and even of things. The derivative meaning of make clean or purify is, however, also clearly used (I Cor. 1:2; I Thess. 5:25; Rom. 15:16; Eph. 5:36, etc.). The two meanings should not be separated, and they are often apparently both intended in the one expression.

The fact of the two meanings has contributed to theological confusion, in addition to confusion caused by varying understandings of the nature of redemption and the agent of sanctification, whether the Holy Spirit, God, Christ, or the Christian himself. As a consequence some view sanctification as an immediate act of God or the Spirit following justification, thus in effect confusing it with the latter. Most hold it to be a process in which the grace of God, working through the Holy Spirit, in co-operation with the endeavors of the individual to lay hold upon truth and grace, to resist temptation, to exercise piety and devotion, and to perform conscious obedience (though with the real possibility of sudden or large progress as well as reversals and decline), combine for growth in grace, in holy living, and in conformity to the image of Christ. The direct appeals of Paul (Rom. 12; Rom. 6; Gal. 5) as well as Christ Himself (Sermon on the Mount) clearly justify this assumption.

Some consider sanctification to be an instantaneous act of the Holy Spirit subsequent to conversion and distinct from justification and the individual's own efforts at holy living. This view, commonly called "second work of grace," or "second blessing," derives from Wesleyan teaching, and has been accepted by a few Mennonites (e.g., United Missionary Church, q.v.) under Wesleyan influence. Experientially it has a certain measure of support in the experience many Christians have of a conscious renewal or reconsecration, either after an inadequate experience due to too early conversion or to lack of proper teaching and understanding of the realities and possibilities of God's gracious working through the Holy Spirit and the necessity for full surrender, consecration, and living up to the privileges of the believer in Christ. To elevate this to a dogma of a necessary second experience for all in the form of an act of God in the plan of salvation is quite another matter.

Further differences arise out of the understanding of the degree of sanctification. The Wesleyan doctrine of perfectionism or near perfectionism was meant by Wesley primarily as an assertion of perfectibility, i.e., the possibility of real victory over sin and the attainment of a growing and ultimate high degree of holiness. To turn this into the doctrine of instantaneous entire sanctification or total eradication of sin, as some do, is something quite different and is contrary to the description by Paul, for instance, of the continuing conflict in the Christian's experience between the spirit and the flesh (Gal. 5) and the need for "mortifying" the flesh (Rom. 6) and "putting off the old man," and "putting on the new man" (Col. 3), or even the reference to "carnal" Christians (I Cor.). This doctrine has found very little, if any, entry into Mennonite circles.

The general Wesleyan ideas on sanctification, and the modifications or even perversions of these by later followers and groups, have produced, especially in the United States, what is often called the Holiness Movement with a number of new sects and subdivisions arising particularly in the second half of the 19th century. The schisms in the Methodist Church itself in the 19th century did not usually produce extremist sanctification emphases, but a rather wholesome type, while of course including the "second blessing" and perfectionist or eradication doctrines. These were the Methodist Protestant (1830), Wesleyan Methodist (1843), and Free Methodist (1860) churches, of which the latter two are still continuing as small denominations. There are many other "holiness" churches, some of which include the adjective "Methodist" in their titles. The Mennonite Brethren in Christ (q.v.) are a group with a moderate holiness emphasis. The Brethren in Christ (q.v.) on the whole can be classed here, although the specific holiness doctrines are not uniformly held among them today. Many of the moderate "holiness" denominations are members of the National Holiness Association.

The more extreme groups (now often moderated) are usually associated with the National Holiness Movement, which arose about 1867, out of which certain denominations emerged. One such is the Church of the Nazarene, which was formed out of a series of mergers with name changes, assuming its final form in 1919; it forms the "right wing" of the Holiness Movement. The Pilgrim Holiness Church (1897) is very similar to the Nazarene Church. The Christian and Missionary Alliance (1887), founded by A. B. Simpson, a Presbyterian perfectionist, as an alliance of congregations, is in effect a denomination. It developed a strong doctrine of faith healing, rejecting ordinary medical practice. The Church of God (Anderson) is also a moderate holiness denomination. But there are several "Churches of God" who are among the more extreme groups, which fall into the Pentecostal or radical wing of the Holiness Movement. The Pentecostal movement has in the 20th century had an extraordinary growth in the United States, and abroad by missionary activity. It has added to the usual "holiness" emphasis the charismatic teaching about the revival of certain pentecostal gifts, usually only two, the gift of tongues and the gift of healing. One of the most rapidly growing of these groups is the Assemblies of God.

Mennonites on the whole have been relatively untouched by either the radical holiness or pentecostal influences, although individuals have occasionally fallen victim, e.g., in France and in the United States and Canada. Prompt disciplinary action has usually excised the threat, or the individuals have withdrawn. About 1913 the entrance of moderate "holiness" teaching caused a schism in the Pennsylvania Mennonite (MC) congregation near Hesston, Kan., resulting in the formation of an independent group, locally called the David Zook Church.

Because of the above connotations, most Mennonites have been disinclined to use the term. Actually the insistence on real sanctification of life and true holy living is a major basic Anabaptist concept. The concept of discipleship includes holiness as its ethical aspect. But the twin idea of dedication to Christ and His cause is also an integral part of discipleship. The Anabaptist insistence on "newness of life," on bringing faith into "evidence," on the full lordship of Christ and obedience to His commands, on the development of Christian character and separation from the world of sin, all this is "holiness" in its best sense. The fruit of this emphasis was a rather uniformly high quality of moral life and holy behavior among the Anabaptists, which was testified to even by their enemies again and again. The Anabaptists were even accused of "hypocrisy," of putting on a pious life to attract members. (It is true that their sincere holy living was a powerful attraction.) The eagerness to be strict in holy living did lead at times to a certain amount of moralism and legalism, of which their enemies, the Reformers, were all too ready to accuse them. In response to the Reformers' charge of a "Scheinheiligkeit," the Anabaptists brought the charge against the Reformers of a "Scheinglauben," quite in the spirit of the Book of James.

The Mennonite demand for true holiness and discipleship has persisted throughout the history of the brotherhood, but has often been threatened or perverted by the twin dangers of moralism and legalism. The group has been charged with perfectionism and claiming to be a perfect church, especially during Anabaptist times, because of its insistence upon striving to attain the ideal of a church "without spot or wrinkle" (Eph. 5:27). But this charge is easily refuted by the simple observation that insistence upon discipline, including the ban, presupposes the possibility of failure in life and apostasy in faith. The endeavor to attain the spotless state has at times led to another very serious consequence, namely, censoriousness and divisiveness, and has produced not a few schisms, not only in the 16th century but also later. It has been noted that practically all Mennonite schisms have arisen out of differences as to the degree of "holiness" or discipline to be required of members. These perversions, however, in no way invalidate the major principle that Christ requires of His disciples absolute holiness and perfection (Be ye perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect) properly understood, that the Father's will is to be done on earth as in heaven. Paul calls repeatedly for perfect, i.e., mature members (teleioi). To surrender this ideal with the concept that in a sinful world it is impossible to attain such an ideal, and that therefore the Christian is at liberty to compromise and that the church should not discipline for sin, but that all Christians should live in trustful hope for the attainment of the ideal outside of history, placing the major emphasis "in the here and now" on forgiveness, is in the Anabaptist-Mennonite understanding not only unscriptural but indeed a betrayal of the lordship of Christ. Sander Hendriksz, an Anabaptist martyr, executed (probably by beheading) in the Steen castle at Antwerp, Belgium, on Nov. 19, 1558. He is named as No. 34 in the hymn "Aenhoort, Godt, hemelsche Vader," No. 16 in the Lietboecxken (q.v.). The brief information on this martyr found in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror is borrowed from this hymn. Génard has published more particulars about Sander, including the exact date of execution. He was known as Alexander de Bode (i.e., Messenger), and was probably a "weetdoener" of the Antwerp congregation, who visited the members to announce the time and place of the next meeting. Sander was a cabinetmaker by trade. (See Alexander de Bode, which this article supplements.) vdZ.

baptists to die in Amsterdam. Van Braght in the Martyrs' Mirror, though publishing the sentence in full, does not give much information about these martyrs. Grosheide has published some particulars from the records: Sander moved to Amsterdam in 1534 or 1535; he also lived in a village near Dordrecht, but the last years before his arrest he was living again at Amsterdam. About 1560 he was baptized by Joost Verbeek (q.v.). In his house sometimes meetings were held in which he or one of the brethren read a chapter from the Bible, followed by a "vermaning" (sermon). He was tortured on the rack, but did not reveal particulars concerning the congregation. His property was confiscated. (Mart. Mir. D 620 f., E 944; Grosheide, Bijdrage, 184 f.) vdZ.

Sanders van Gremberghe (Grimberge), the son of Gillis, an Anabaptist martyr, a native of Gent in Flanders, Belgium, was executed there on March 2, 1560, at the age of thirty-one by burning at the stake on the Vrijdagmarkt, together with Joos de Vinck, Joos de Vlaminc, Michiel van Houcke, and Joos van de Velde. Further particulars are not available. (Verheyden, Gent, 26, No. 72.) vdZ.

Sandhill Community Church, located about 6 miles northeast of Clarence, N.Y., was used by the western New York Mennonite (MC) congregation that took rise in 1920 when several families of Mennonites were attracted by low-priced farms in the vicinity of Lockport, Akron, and Clarence. The Rural Mission Board of Ontario gave aid for organization and ministerial help. In 1923 a congregation was organized in a brick church east of Akron. Soon the place of worship moved to the Sandhill church. For a few years from 1923 Irvin E. Burkhart ministered to the congregation. Others who preached here were Chris L. Ressler, D. D. Kauffman, and Jacob W. Birky. In 1928 this congregation joined the Mennonite Conference of Ontario. The membership grew to almost 200. In the late 1930's a new meetinghouse was built nearer Clarence (see Clarence Mennonite Church), and Sandhill fell into disuse for the Mennonites. J.C.F.

Sandhill Hutterite Bruderhof, near Beiseker, Alberta, belonging to the Dariusleut (q.v.) branch, was founded in 1936 by a group from the Springvale (q.v.) Colony, with the preacher Jacob K. Wurz. The Sandhill Bruderhof has in turn founded the Ferrybank Colony at Ponaka, Alberta, and is in process of establishing a Bruderhof at Leask, Sask. Ministers ordained by Sandhill are Frank A. Wollman and John M. Wurz. In 1958 the baptized membership was 46, and the total number of souls 160. J.M.W.

Sangerhausen, a town of Thuringia, Germany, in the vicinity of which the Anabaptist movement won a large following during the Reformation. The movement was brutally suppressed. In or about 1535 twelve Anabaptists were put to death for their faith. But it took several years to stamp it out completely. (Wappler, Thüringen; ML IV.)

Sanitarium, Bethesda, at Hillsboro, Kans., was opened in 1920 by J. V. Wiebe in a two-story building adjacent to the Salem Hospital (q.v.) for the purpose of caring for the sick, poor, and aged. Later the building was taken over by the Salem Home for the Aged of Hillsboro. (A Guide to Hillsboro, 1940, 54.) C.K.

Sankra (Zion) Mennonite Church (MC), located in Madhya Pradesh, 18 miles west of Dhamtari, a member of the India Mennonite Conference, began as a mission in 1908, under M. C. Lapp, P. A. Friesen, and G. J. Lapp, and was at first called the Zion Evangelistic Station. The first Christians came from other mission stations. Worship services were conducted on the veranda of the bungalow. In 1912 the Malguzar of Sankra offered a small plot of land in the hamlet for a church building, and in 1913 a small meetinghouse was built. The Christian community grew rapidly during the famine of 1920-21 when many people came to this and other mission stations for relief and responded to the appeals of the Gospel. A new and larger church was built in 1925 at the mission station, a mile from the village. Under Dr. Friesen a larger medical dispensary with an operating room and several wards was built in 1926. The missionaries also conducted roadside medical clinics. Soon after the Christian community was established at Sankra an elementary school for the children of the community was opened. The government school was some distance away. The children received more kindly consideration in the church schools. In 1946 the name appeared in the Yearbook (Scottsdale) as Zion. In 1957 the membership was 102, with O. P. Lal and S. Paul Miller as ministers. G.J.L.

Sankt Johann (Johanniskirchen): see Johann, Sankt.

Sankt Johann (Sant Johannes), a Hutterite Bruderhof in Hungary. Its inmates fled into the forest on Nov. 4, 1623, when it was attacked by Turks and Tatars. Twenty-six persons were abducted (women and children); only two returned, and one of these had to leave her child behind. In September 1663 the house was plundered by Turkish troops; two brethren who had remained were murdered and two boys carried away. In the following years the Bruderhof declined rapidly, so that by 1757 only six families remained. On March 12, 1761, the decree of the chancellor (see Sobotiste) was announced which compelled them and all the other Bruderhofs in Hungary to adopt the Catholic faith. The leader, Johannes Mayer, was arrested and transferred to the Jesuits in Stuhlweissenburg. Meanwhile the Brethren refused to attend the services of the Jesuit priests (see Hildesheim and Halle). Mayer finally declared himself willing to take the required step and was released on October 2. At the end of October he arrived at St. Johann, a sick and broken man. Jacob Schulz, the lay member who resisted the violent conversion most vigorously, was also delivered to the Jesuits in Tyrnau. The brotherhood at St. Johann had no property in common at this time. Most of the members were not to be persuaded by kind words or by violence to become Catholic, declaring that the mandates were contrary to their principles. But finally those who did not flee yielded to force. By March 11, 1763, seventy-nine persons, fifty of whom were married, declared their transfer to the Catholic faith. Santa Catarina, a coastal state in Brazil (area 36,435 sq. mi., pop. 1,578,159), lying between Parana on the north and Rio Grande do Sul on the south, in 1930 became the home of two colonies settled by Mennonite refugees from Russia, Krauel (q.v.), called Witmarsum, and Auhagen (q.v.) on the Stoltz Plateau. Both colonies were sponsored by the German government and settled on land purchased from the Hanseatische Kolonisations-Gesellschaft. The Auhagen Colony was abandoned in 1934, the settlers moving to Curitiba. The Krauel Colony was dissolved in 1952, and most of the families have moved away, some earlier to Curitiba, others at the very end to Bage in Rio Grande do Sul. Heinrich Martens, the original leader of the colony, early settled in Blumenau, the capital of the state, where he remains as one of the few Mennonites left in Santa Catarina. H.S.B.

Santa Clara Sommerfeld Mennonite settlement at Chihuahua, Mexico, located north of the Manitoba Mennonite settlement, was established in 1926(?) by some 600 Sommerfeld Mennonites from Manitoba. For a while, c1950, the Mennonite Central Committee operated a hospital there. The General Conference Mennonite Mission Board was operating an elementary school at this place in 1957. C.K.

Santa Fe Railroad Company (or Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company) was founded by Cyrus Holliday and incorporated in 1859. The Santa Fe deserves considerable credit for a large number of Mennonites settling on its land north and south of Newton, Kan., in 1873 and later. The railroad had reached Newton by 1871 and had received a land grant of three million acres from the federal government. Interested in settling this land, the railroad employed successful agents and produced literature to attract settlers. One of the earliest leaflets carried the title "If You Want a Farm or Home You Should Buy of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway for the Following Reasons." Many of these promotional pamphlets were translated into foreign languages and distributed not only among people arriving in America, but also among prospective immigrants in Europe. One was entitled Die Mennoniten Niederlassung auf den Ländereien der Atchison, Topeka und Santa Fe Eisenbahn-Gesellschaft in Harvey & Marion Co., Kansas, which was published by the "Committee zur Ordnung der Ansiedlerangelegenheiten der Mennoniten . . ." and written by David Goerz. The committee consisted of Christian Krehbiel, Jakob Leisy, David Lehmann, Bernhard Warkentin, and Abraham Naufer, of Summerfield, Ill. The pamphlet Die Deutschen Ansiedlungen in Süd West Kansas auf den Ländereien der Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Eisenbahngesellschaft, published in Topeka in 1878, was possibly also written by David Goerz (q.v.) and appealed particularly to the German and Mennonite settlers. It contains numerous illustrations of Mennonite farms.

The earliest Mennonite settlers in the Santa Fe territory were the Amish near Hutchinson. Eli M. Yoder purchased 300 acres of land which resulted in this settlement. The agents Case and Billings of Marion Center sold 5,000 acres to M. W. Keim and his friends of Johnstown, Pa., in 1869-70. With the coming of the Mennonites from Russia, Mennonites from Summerfield, Ill., also became interested in settling in Kansas. Christian Krehbiel (q.v.) became a promoter of this venture. A. E. Touzalin, George Heriot, and C. B. Schmidt were the early Santa Fe agents through whom the contacts were made. Peter and Jacob Funk established themselves in Marion County in 1873. Bernhard Warkentin was an early promoter of the settlement of the Santa Fe land and established himself with the Summerfield Mennonites at Halstead, Kan. When Touzalin resigned as land commissioner for the Santa Fe, he was replaced by A. S. Johnson under whom C. B. Schmidt (q.v.) of Lawrence, Kan., worked among the German-speaking settlers. When the Alexanderwohl group arrived in 1874, Schmidt met them in New York.

C. B. Schmidt received a commission from the Santa Fe to visit Russia to encourage immigrants to come to Kansas, in order to settle on the Santa Fe land. He left New York on Feb. 1, 1875, with many letters of introduction from Mennonites in Kansas to their relatives and neighbors. He also stopped in West Prussia. Schmidt had been in contact with some of the twelve delegates who came to investigate the land of the Great Plains. Of the 1,275 Mennonite families who came to America in 1874, six hundred families came to Kansas. The Santa Fe had considerable competition from other railroads, particularly the Kansas Pacific and the Burlington. The large groups of immigrants were met in New York and other places and the agents tried to persuade them to settle on the lands of their respective companies. In spite of C. B. Schmidt's trip to Russia in 1875, the preceding year, 1874, remained the peak year for the Mennonite migration to settle on Santa Fe land in Kansas, when nearly 3,000 Mennonites came to Kansas. The Santa Fe deserves a considerable amount of credit for this large-scale successful settlement. (See also Kansas and Newton.)

Santa Rosa (Argentina) Mennonite Church, located at Santa Rosa, F.C.O. Pampa, Argentine Republic. Santa Rosa (pop. 20,000) is the capital of La Pampa. It is located about 360 miles west of Buenos Aires. Work was started here in 1921 by D. Parke Lantz and his wife, who moved here simply to hold the town. Later in the same year meetings were begun by Albano Luayza who had come with his wife from the Alliance Church. The following year the congregation was organized; the Luayza family lived here until 1939, during which time 75 persons were baptized. Santa Rosa is a center of Catholicism and the work was started under much opposition. The pastor has always been an Argentine. The membership in 1957 was 36, with Pedro Lanik as pastor.

Santfirderrijp (Santvoorderrijp), a hamlet in the Dutch province of Friesland, where Elder Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 17 persons in 1554-56 and another 16 in 1563-65. From this time a Mennonite congregation existed here, of which however there is only scarce information. T. H. Siemelink has surmised that during the period of persecution Santfirderrijp, surrounded by lakes and pools, was the meeting place of the Workum (q.v.) Mennonite congregation, and that the martyr Claesken (q.v.), executed in 1554, who is said to have been baptized "near Workum in the fields," received her baptism here about 1549. But this could not be proved. In any case, besides the Workum congregation there was an independent congregation at Santfirderrijp in the 17th century. In 1695 this congregation, then numbering 24 baptized members, joined the Sociëteit (conference) of Mennonite churches in Friesland. In 1726 it contributed ten guilders to the Dutch Committee of Foreign Needs for the relief of the Mennonites in the Palatinate. During the early 18th century Douwe Djurres was its preacher, serving until about 1750 (his son Djurre Douwes was a preacher of the congregation at Koudum, Friesland, 1741-78). Soon after, at least before 1765, the congregation of Santfirderrijp died out; the few remaining members joined the Workum congregation. Probably Elder Hoyte Rienx (q.v.), who was also called Hoyte Renix Santvoort, came from here.

Sao Paulo, the largest city of Brazil with an approximate population in 1958 of 3,000,000. In 1958 there were about 150 Mennonites, mostly young women, living in this city. Mennonite women have been in great demand as domestics and as governesses for the well-to-do Brazilian families since the early thirties, soon after the first permanent Mennonite settlements were made in Brazil. There are very few young men or Mennonite families in Sao Paulo. In 1947 the MCC sent Mr. and Mrs. John E. Kaufman to Brazil to establish a home for Mennonite girls where they could meet regularly for fellowship, worship, and counseling. Later directors of the home have been Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Jantzen, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Wiens, Mr. and Mrs. David Quapp, Emma Schlichting, and Mr. and Mrs. Abram J. Dick, the present directors who have served since 1952.

Sappemeer, an industrial town in the Dutch province of Groningen (pop. 7,224 in 1947, with 180 Mennonites), which together with the adjacent town of Hoogezand (pop. 13,194 in 1947, with 225 Mennonites) is the seat of a Mennonite congregation, in the 19th century mostly called Hoogezand-Sappemeer, and now officially Sappemeer, the town where the meetinghouse is found.

In 1618 a large lake east of Hoogezand, called Sap-meer or Sappemeer, was reclaimed, and in 1621 the first houses of what later was the town of Sappemeer were built on its grounds. In 1628 the adjacent wild peat moors had been opened up and the reclaimed land immediately settled. Among the settlers there were a number of Mennonites, some of them coming in from the province of Friesland. As early as Aug. 10, 1629, the Reformed Synod of Groningen made mention of Mennonite activities here, and by 1631 there existed at Sappemeer a Flemish and a Frisian Mennonite congregation. Complaints about Mennonite activity were then made to the magistrates of the city of Groningen, which at this time was the owner of the reclaimed grounds.

Soon the Mennonites must have been rather numerous at Sappemeer. There were at least nine different Mennonite congregations: (1) Frisians, (2) Flemish, (3) Ukowallists (a branch of the Old Flemish, followers of Uko Walles, q.v.), (4) Danzig Old Flemish, (5) Waterlanders, (6) Groningen Old Flemish, (7) from about 1680 also Paltzers (Mennonites from the Palatinate, Germany), and from the early 18th century (8) Oude Zwitser (Old Swiss Brethren), and (9) Nieuwe Zwitser (New Swiss). Of some of these congregations there is little information. (1) Of the Frisians nearly nothing is known but the fact of their existence in the earliest period. This group probably claimed Heero Jans and his son Berend (Bene) Heeres (from which the Benes family descended, still found at Hoogezand-Sappemeer), who in 1631 with a number of other Mennonites moved in from de Wijngaarden near Heerenveen, Friesland, and who settled at the Oude Friese Compagnie, later called Kalkwijk (q.v.) at the south part of the reclaimed area. This Frisian congregation apparently soon merged either with the Flemish or the Waterlander congregation. (2) Concerning the Flemish congregation there is no more information; it also existed from the very beginning. It had a meetinghouse in the Kleine Meer (the former little lake, also reclaimed) in the southeast section of Sappemeer; this meetinghouse was renovated or rebuilt in 1691. About 1730 this congregation merged with the Waterlanders.

(3) Ukowallists (Uke-Wallesvolk) are mentioned at Sappemeer first in 1640. This group of the Mennonites especially had much trouble with the magistrates. In the conference of the Reformed Classis at Groningen, May 30, 1636, it was reported that the Mennonites at Sappemeer were building "a church to hold their meetings in it"; the magistrates of Groningen were requested to prevent this, and in 1640, apparently before the meetinghouse was complete, Johan de Mepsche, estate steward of the city of Groningen, bought this house by order of the magistrates. Consequently it could not be used as a meetinghouse. This house was located on the main road in the west part of Sappemeer. Probably this occurrence pertained to a planned meetinghouse of the Ukowallists. In 1647, when the new lands of the Borger Compagnie were distributed, a condition was made that the landowners were not allowed to sell their land to the "people of the Uke Walles sect." In 1642 the Ukowallists are said to have held their meetings on a farm belonging to Macke Gerkes van Dam (the family name of van Dam is still found at Sappemeer) on the Jouwerswijk. This was a canal, dug in 1630, along which farms were established, partly occupied by Mennonites moving in from Joure in Friesland, from which it took its name. It could not be ascertained whether the Ukowallists were identical with the group which later was called Groningen Old Flemish, or were a separate independent group. If the latter, they soon, at least before 1670, merged with the Groningen Old Flemish.

(4) The Danzig Old Flemish Mennonites are mentioned in the 18th century, but they obviously had a small congregation at Sappemeer from about 1650 or even before. They held their meetings in the homes of members, most living at the Kleine Meer. Hindrick Coops Boon, a well-to-do proprietor of land reclamations, peat merchant, and shipowner, the ancestor of the Boon family still living at Sappemeer, was about 1700 an elder of this church, which in 1699 acquired a meetinghouse on the Jouwerswijk. Jan Panneman and Jan van Dalen were preachers of this group about 1740-70. Jan Panneman at the same time served the Danzig Old Flemish congregation at Pekela (q.v.), to which town he seems to have moved about 1665. In 1777 the Danzig Old Flemish congregation of Sappemeer died out after most members in course of time had joined the Groningen Old Flemish church.

(5) The Waterlander congregation at Sappemeer also dates from an early period. In 1647 this congregation was represented at a large Waterlander conference at Amsterdam by Egbert Harmsz and Doede Harmsz, apparently its preachers. During the first decades they held their meetings in private homes; later they had a meetinghouse in the Kleine Meer. In 1695 this Waterlander congregation, then numbering about 30 baptized members, joined the Sociëteit (conference) of Mennonite congregations in Friesland, and remained a member until 1769. About 1730 the Waterlander congregation merged with the Flemish congregation (2). Henceforth it is called either Flemish and Waterlander or Waterlander and Flemish or simply the Flemish congregation. This congregation contributed liberally to the needs of the Mennonites in Prussia and Poland in 1734. It was a member of the Flemish-Waterlander Humsterland (q.v.) conference c1756-65. Outstanding families in this congregation have been Mulder (q.v.), Mandema, and Benes. Hendrik Jacobsz was a preacher here in 17? -c1733, Harm Jacobsz 1730-72, Watse Joukes (Mandema) (d. 1763) 1710-60, and Roelof Sebes 1764-72. In 1772 the Waterlander-Flemish congregation merged with the Groningen Old Flemish Mennonites.

(6) The Groningen Old Flemish had the largest congregation at Sappemeer. No figures as to the membership are available for the 17th century; in 1710 they numbered 140 baptized members, about 120 in 1750, and 116 in 1767. At first they too held their meetings in the homes of members, nearly all farmers living on the Kalkwijk, the Jouwerswijk, and the Borger Compagnie. At least in 1734, but probably some decades before, they had a rather large but very plain meetinghouse in the eastern section of the town (Borger Compagnie). This meetinghouse was used until 1847. The Groningen Old Flemish congregation was a member of the Old Flemish conference (sociëteit). Next to the congregation in Groningen (city) it was by far the largest Old Flemish congregation in the Netherlands. Like all Old Flemish congregations it was served by untrained preachers chosen from the members. Of the preachers of the 17th century only a few names have come down; they are Jacob Alberts and Harke Pieters, mentioned in 1681, Asink Abels in 1683. The first Dutch Naamlijst (1731) lists for 1731 Engelbert Jochems, Maarten Obbes, Maarten Garbrands, and Evert Hendriks. Maarten Garbrands (d. 1762) served 1704-c60. Not only did Maarten Obbes (1676-1736) serve for a long period, but also his sons Obbe Meertens (1703-82), serving 1733-79, when he retired, and Hinrick Meertens, serving 1736-80, as well as his grandson Meerten Obbes (Ubbens), serving 1774-d.86, were able and active preachers of the church. Others were Sjoert Clases, serving 1736-c50, Alle Feyes mentioned in 1734, Jan Harms in 1748. Koert Izaaks Verveld (1719-1804) served from 1756 until his death, Harm Jacobsz, formerly preacher of the Waterlanders, from the union in 1772 until 1780, Sybolt Aans 1782-85(?), Jacob Luitjes (Reinders) 1780-1807, Pieter van Kalker (Calcar) 1786-c1813, Hayke Harms (Mulder) 1786-d.1833, Rigt Eppes 1786-c1812. Pieter Hendriks (q.v.), the author of Schriftuurlijke Catechismus (1744), was very probably also a preacher of this congregation. In the course of time a number of members of other Mennonite branches joined the Old Flemish congregation; in 1772 the Waterlander-Flemish congregation (5) merged with the Old Flemish, in 1777 the few remaining Danziger Old Flemish (4) joined them, and about 1802 also the remnant of the Swiss congregation (8-9). From then we can trace the united church of Sappemeer (10).

(7) According to tradition, which, however, is not proved by documents, a number of Mennonites from the Palatinate, Germany, emigrated to Sappemeer in 1680-90, settling as farmers in the eastern-most parts of the reclaimed area. If this tradition is true, they may have joined the Swiss Brethren, who settled here in 1711 ff.

(8) In 1711 a number of Mennonites came to the Netherlands from the Swiss canton of Bern. (See Swiss Mennonites in the Netherlands.) A number of them settled in the Dutch province of Groningen, partly in and near the city of Groningen, partly near Sappemeer. They were soon (1726?) divided into two separate groups—the Oude Zwieters (Old Swiss) being more conservative in life, dress, and doctrines, and using the German language in their church services until the end of the 18th century, and the Nieuwe Zwieters (New Swiss) being more progressive and soon using the Dutch language in their meetings. The Old Swiss living at Groningen and at Sappemeer formed one congregation, meeting alternately at Groningen and at Sappemeer; the New Swiss of Groningen and Sappemeer also founded a single church, meeting alternately at Groningen and Sappemeer. Swiss Mennonite families settling at Sappemeer in 1711-14 were Ancken (Anken), Baur (later called Boer, also de Boer), Fruttiger, Furrer, Gerber (Gerwer), Gut(h), (Goet, later de Goede), Kneubühl (later Kneubel), Gautschy (later Kousie), Krähenbühl (Krejenbul, later Kreiboer and Kraaiboer), Krätzer (Kratzer, Kraster), Krebs (Kreps), Lang (Lange), Lienders (Leenders), Lörts (Leurts), Lötscher (Latscha, Leutscher), Maihuser (Meihuizen), Mayer (Meyer), Moerer (Murer, Muur), Rich or Richen (Ricken, Righen, Rijkens), Roth (Root), Rüsser (Risser) or Reuscher (Ruysser, Ruischer), Sarbach, Schabels, Stauffer, Steiner, Stähly (Stehle, Stelli), Stucky (Stukje), Stutsman, Thöne(n) (Teune), Teutscher, Witwers and Sorg (Zorge). A number of these families after a few years moved elsewhere in the Netherlands or back to the Palatinate, while others came in from Kampen, Deventer, and Groningen. Most of them were provided with farmlands and houses through the agency of the Dutch Committee of Foreign Needs at Amsterdam and the Groningen Old Flemish conference. Especially Alle Derks (q.v.), an elder of Groningen, deserved well of these Swiss immigrants, many of whom took along considerable amounts of money for the rest, which enabled them to run their businesses without the usual difficulties of settling in a foreign country. In 1811 descendants of the following Swiss immigrant families were still found at Hoogezand-Sappemeer: Anken, Boer, Gerber, Kneubel, Kousie, Kraaiboer, Kraster, Kreps, Leenders, Leutscher, Meihuizen, Meyer, Rijkens, Schabels, Stukje, and Teune. At the present time the church records of the Sappemeer Mennonite congregation still contain the names of members of the Boer, Meihuizen, and Rijkens families.

The Oude Zwieters held their meetings in a home in the Kleine Meer. There is no information about the number of their members, and the list of their ministers is somewhat unclear. The first Naamlijst in which they are mentioned is that of 1755. Ministers then were Abraham Looover (Lauffer), living at Groningen, from 1726, an elder, and Claus Gerber (from 1739) and Peter Riegen (Ricken) preachers. Other ministers were Jacob Stehle (Stähly) and David Righen (Ricken) from 1767. Claus (Nicolaas) Gerber served 1739-61, Peter Righen 1740-d.72, Jacob Stehle 1736-57. Abraham Looover served until his death in 1774; Preacher David Righen then became elder, serving until his death in 1796. David Righen lived at Sappemeer; until the end he preached in German. A copy of Die ernsthafte Christenpflicht, darinnen schöne geistreiche Gebätter damitt sich fromme Christen-Herzen zu allen Zeiten und in allen Nöthen trösten können, which copy was owned and used by Ricken, is now the property of G. N. Schutter at Sappemeer. In the Old Swiss congregation, after the preacher had finished his sermon, other brethren spoke briefly to express their agreement with the sermon or to add a few words from the Bible. They knelt for (silent) prayer and practiced footwashing in connection with their communion services. They seem not to have used a confession of faith; their hymnal was the German Ausbund. After the death of David Righen the Old Swiss seem to have merged with the New Swiss.

(9) The Nieuwe Zwisers (New Swiss) also had a room on a farm at the Kleine Meer, probably the same as the one used by the Old Swiss, where they met every two weeks. Figures concerning the membership of this group are also not available. This group may have been somewhat smaller than the Old Swiss group, and in the course of the 18th century some of them, through marriage, joined the Danzig and particularly the Groningen Old Flemish congregations. They too practiced silent prayer and footwashing, but soon used the Dutch language in their services. They were not as strict in their dress regulations as the Old Swiss were, tolerating buttons instead of hooks and eyes, and shoes instead of boots. They used a Dutch confession of faith, drawn up by Jan van Koomen (q.v.), Belijdenisse des Geloofs onder de doopsgezinde Christenen (1744), and also Dutch hymnbooks. Some of the Old Flemish Mennonites who had moved from Deventer (q.v.) to Hoogezand-Sappemeer in 1720 soon after joined the New Swiss congregation. Ministers of the New Swiss were Hans Ancken, serving from 1712, Michiel Ruysser, serving 1711-59, elder, Peter Leenders, 1711-57, elder, Jan van Ko(o)men, d. 1743, Anthony Kratzer 1740-79, elder from 1760, Christiaan Ancken 1754-70, Jan Leenders 1754-59(?), Rudolf Leutscher 1755-61, Jan van Kalker (Calcar) 1755-75(?), Balster Franszen 1762-82, Hendrik Cornelis 1770-1808, elder from 1794, Isaak van Kalker (Calcar) 1772-96, Roelof Jans 1781-d.90, Alle Cornelis 1791-1800, Ties Hansen Top 1791-97. Most of these New Swiss preachers lived at Groningen. Van Komen and both the van Kalkers were not of Swiss decent. Obviously after 1800 meetings were only at Groningen, the Swiss brethren living at Sappemeer all having joined the main Mennonite congregation. In 1802 the deacons of the "former Swiss congregation" sold a house and a tract of land on the Kalkwijk, which had been the property of this church. The remaining Swiss congregation in Groningen merged with the main Mennonite church in this town in 1824.

Not all descendants of the Swiss Mennonites remained Mennonites. Some of them may have joined the Reformed as early as the last decades of the 18th century, but more left particularly when the Mennonite Sappemeer congregation called a salaried preacher (see below), and again in 1847 when the old meetinghouse was abandoned for the new one, more in the center of the town. All of the Kneubel and Kreps families left the church in 1847, joining the Separate Reformed Church, and many members of other families, e.g., Kraster, Rijkens, and Stukje, also left.

Among the outstanding Mennonite families of Sappemeer there is also the van Calcar (van Kalker) family. This family originally lived at Deventer, Dutch province of Overijssel. In 1720 Hendrik van Calcar and his wife moved from Deventer to Sappemeer and joined the New Swiss Mennonites. Hendrik's son Izaak van Calcar was married here to Maria Brunner, widow of Peter Lienders. Izaak van Calcar bequeathed his farm to Pieter Leenders (the son of Peter Lienders and Maria Brunner) on the condition that he assume the family name of van Calcar. Thus Pieter Leenders became Pieter van Calcar (married in 1783 to Dievertje Verveld, a daughter of the preacher Koert Izaaks Verveld); they have numerous descendants.

Other settlers at Sappemeer were Georg Grüber and his family, refugees from East Prussia, who emigrated to the Netherlands and after living a few years on the island of Walcheren (q.v.), settled at Sappemeer in 1744.

(10) Since the Flemish-Waterlander and Groningen Old Flemish had merged congregations in 1772 and the Swiss Mennonites had joined them about 1800, there has been only one Mennonite church at Sappemeer. Until 1847 this congregation used the Groningen Old Flemish meetinghouse, which was remodeled and provided with an organ in 1808. A new church was built in the center of Sappemeer, dedicated on Feb. 21, 1847. A parsonage had been built here in 1838.

The membership of this united congregation was about 270 in 1790, 300 in 1834, 438 in 1861, 464 in 1900, 345 in 1926, 265 in 1958.

The last untrained and unsalaried minister at Sappemeer was Heyke Harmens Mulder (Hayke Harmze) serving 1786-d.1833. In 1790, because of lack of able men in their own group, the congregation decided to call a preacher from outside who was to be salaried. This was Foeke Wigles Gorter, a self-made man, not specially trained for the ministry, then preacher at Knijpe (q.v.). Gorter served at Sappemeer until 1836. During his ministry a second minister was called; this was Pieter Feenstra, who had been trained at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary. He served at Sappemeer 1824-27 and again 1837-71. He was followed by S. G. Binnerts, serving 1872-1913, S. H. N. Gorter 1914-16, F. ten Cate 1916-35, B. Dufour 1935-40, R. de Zeeuw 1941-47, and G. M. Kusters from 1947. Since 1946 the pastor of Sappemeer has also been in charge of the Noordbroek (q.v.) congregation.

Church activities now are a Sunday school for children, a Youth Group (ages 12-15), Youth Circle (ages 18-35), Brethren Circle, and Ladies' Circle.

The Mennonites have always occupied an important place in the economic and cultural life of Hoogezand-Sappemeer. Until the end of the 18th century they were mostly farmers, a few being engaged in business, e.g., the Mulder family, who owned a tannery. The wealthy Boon, Boer, and Reinders families were large landowners, often engaged in land reclamation elsewhere. The Meihuizen and van Calcar families, who were farmers at Kalkwijk in the 18th century, later spread over the other peat colonies (Pekela, Veendam, Wildervank) of the province of Groningen, but many of them from the early 19th century had other trades and became millers, grocers, distillers, tanners, grain merchants, wood dealers, etc. The later generations have spread all over the Netherlands and both the Meihuizen and van Calcar families are now dying out at Sappemeer. In the 18th and 19th centuries some Mennonite families also were shipowners (Boon, Romkes, van Calcar, van der Goot, and Meihuizen). The Romkes and van der Goot families particularly have been wood dealers. The Calkema family, now extinct, owned an important lime burning business in the Oude Vriese Compagnie which was called Kalkwijk after this business.

The Mennonites also owned a number of sawmills. Some of the businesses at Sappemeer under Mennonite direction and in part Mennonite owned are: the van Calcar distilleries (until 1896), Benes' flour mills, Smit's shipbuilding yard at Westerbroek, shipbuilding yard of Coops Brothers, engineering works of Douwe E. Gorter, dairies, a potato-flour mill, the Dijkhuis printing shop, Brand Brothers Lumber Yard and sawmills. Many Mennonites have been outstanding in the cultural and political life of Hoogezand-Sappemeer. The Hoogezand-Sappemeer section of the Maatschappij tot Nut van 't Algemeen (q.v.) and the public library have largely been stimulated and led by Mennonites. A number of burgomasters of Hoogezand have been Mennonites.

Sarasota, Fla., a city (pop. 40,000) in Sarasota County on the west coast, 50 miles south of Tampa. The population doubles in winter. About 300 Mennonites are living permanently in the area, winter visitors increasing this number to 1,000-1,500. Both permanent settlers and winter tourists are scattered throughout the city and surrounding vicinity, the largest concentration being in Pinecraft just outside the city limits to the southeast. The first settlers came in 1927, then there was a very gradual increase until 1945, since when there has been a sharp increase annually.

There are five organized Mennonite (MC) churches in the Sarasota area as follows: Bay Shore (Ohio Conference), membership 187, within the city; Tuttle Avenue (Virginia Conference), membership 93, within the city; Newton Community Chapel (colored mission, Virginia Conference), membership 12), within the city; Pinecraft (Lancaster Conference), membership 30, in Pinecraft; and Palm Grove (Conservative Mennonite Conference), membership 40, in Pinecraft. Some Old Order Amish also hold services in homes in Pinecraft in winter but have not organized a congregation. Practically all branches of Mennonites and Amish are represented in the thousands of Mennonites who spend some time here each winter. The number of young married and retired couples who are establishing their homes here is on the increase. There is no important industry in the city, many Mennonites depending upon the building industry for a livelihood. T.H.B.

Saratov Mennonite Brethren Church was established in the early days of the Slavgorod Mennonite settlement (q.v.), Siberia, and served the following four villages: Saratov (89), Khoroshye (89), Nikolayevka (75), and Silberfeld (86). The first leading minister was Bernhard Wiens, who was succeeded by Daniel Heide. Other ministers were P. P. Löwen, Jakob Dück, David Löwen, and David Nachtigall. In 1914 a church building was erected in Saratov. Additional smaller places of worship were located in other villages. C.K.

Sarcerius, Erasmus (1511-89), a German Lutheran clergyman. Of his numerous writings, mention should be made of his book, Wider die Secten Rotten und falsche Lerer (Eisleben, 1560), in which he includes the Anabaptists.

Sardis First Mennonite Church (GCM), a member of the Canadian Conference, located at Sardis, B.C., a town 65 miles east of Vancouver. The first Mennonite church to be organized here began in 1929, when the first settlers came to Sardis. The first meetinghouse was built in 1940, enlarged in 1941, and replaced in 1947 by a new church seating 1,200. The members are farmers, most of them in berry farming. Services are conducted every Sunday in German; there is a Sunday school for the children, a chorus, a young people's organization, and three women's missionary societies. Footwashing is not observed. The first elders were Nicolai Bahnmann and Johann Klassen. The ministers assisting them were David Hausknecht and Abram Warkentin. After a period of difficulty in the congregation Elder Wilhelm Martens of Alberta was called as elder of the congregation in 1946. Isaak Harms and Gerhard Peters were called to the ministry. In 1957 the membership was 262, with Bruno Enns as pastor. C.G.T.

Sargent Avenue Mennonite Church (GCM), Winnipeg, Man., a member of the Canadian Conference, first called "Winnipeg Mennoniten Stadtmission," in 1950 renamed Winnipeg Mennonite Mission Church, and in 1955 renamed Sargent Avenue Mennonite Church, was organized in 1949 with 11 members, and in 1958 had 265 members. Two thirds of the members immigrated as refugees from Russia after World War II. The meetinghouse was purchased in 1951. In 1958 the congregation was served by three ministers, Gerhard Lohrenz, Johann Adrian, and George Epp. J.Re.

Saron Mennonite Church (GCM), located one mile south of Orienta, Okla., a member of the Western District Conference, was organized in 1897 with 11 charter members, under the leadership of Christian Ramseier, assisted by John Bartel. The first meetinghouse was dedicated in 1906 and was replaced in 1940 by a brick structure built on the original site. The membership in 1957 was 124, with A. C. Siebert as pastor. W.J.F.

Sarrebourg (German, Saarburg), a Mennonite congregation in Lorraine, France. Though it is not possible to trace the origin of many of the Mennonite families who now comprise the Sarrebourg congregation, it is known that there have been Mennonites living here since the beginning of the 19th century. They were not known (nor are they for the most part today) as Mennonites, but as "Anabaptistes" in the French-speaking villages and "Täufer" in the German-speaking ones.

Thus the books of Erkmann-Chatrian describe the Anabaptist Pelsy, who lived in a remote mountain region of the Vosges Mountains, and their community; a résumé of his account follows: Most of the families still hold firmly to their manner of worship, and since they live great distances apart they have to cover many miles on foot to attend the meetings. Some of the older persons still recall starting out at three in the morning and returning after dark. Until about 30-40 years ago most of the members were engaged in agriculture or some trade in the village. The farms were often quite remote from the towns. They were thus removed from the temptations that accompany city life, and God could grant these simple rural people many a spiritual blessing in heavenly goods in their rough and laborious existence; most of these blessings have since been lost or have passed into formalism or traditionalism. But our faithful God, in view of the forefathers, will not permit their descendants to be easily submerged in the darkness and the enticements of this world. For many years meetings were held in the homes on various farms, as for example in Schacheneck, Imling, and Sarrebourg; later a meetinghouse was built in Sarrebourg, which was a rather central point for most of the families. For many years Valentin Pelsy (q.v.) served as elder, a faithful, devoted witness of the Lord. He avoided no effort, and his affectionate nature helped in reminding the members of their duty and responsibility. But in spite of all these admonitions the spirit of the world has found its way into the congregation, so that in many cases the simple and childlike faith of the fathers has been lost and the enemy of souls has reaped a rich harvest, many a heart turning to the world for its joy and contentment. But the Lord has been watching and has given them a period of repentance and revival, when Emile Kremer was chosen elder after the death of Valentin Pelsy. A happy time of revival began, and many committed themselves to the Lord and placed their lives at His disposal. Thus many of the members of the congregation are not of Mennonite descent.

The present Sarrebourg congregation meets twice a month in a chapel in Sarrebourg. In 1957 the membership, including children, was 142. The elders were Emile Kremer and René Pelsy, and the minister Ernst Stalter. R.P.

Sarreguemines (German, Saargemünd) Mennonite church, located in northeastern France, was organized in 1927 by Reiseprediger (q.v.) Henri Volkmar under the direction of the Alsatian Mennonite Conference after attempts by Reiseprediger Christian Guth, of Germany, beginning in 1920, had failed. The twenty or more families forming the group were a remnant of the former Bitscherland (q.v.) congregation (dissolved c1902) who had thereafter transferred to the Ixheim (q.v.) congregation just across the German border. (Up to 1918 Alsace-Lorraine was a part of Germany and there was no national border.) Since 1918 Sarreguemines has been politically French, although the Mennonites have continued the German language like those living in Alsace. Sarreguemines, a city of c12,000 population, lies on the French-German border. In 1957 the congregation had 35 members and was served by Elder Willi Hege. H.S.B.

Sartorius, Johannes (Jan Snyder), b. c1500 at Amsterdam, d. 1570 at Delft, Dutch province of South Holland, was a Dutch Sacramentist (q.v.) who by his Biblical preaching and teaching promoted the development of the evangelical faith in the Netherlands. Sartorius was influenced by the Dominican monk Wouter (q.v.). As early as 1525, severely critical of the doctrines and practices of the Roman Catholic Church, Sartorius preached salvation by faith, and published a treatise (Latin) on the Lord's Supper in which he rejected the Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation. In the same year he was imprisoned at The Hague on a charge of heresy, and upon recanting was set free. But he continued his evangelical preaching. A few months later he was a schoolteacher at Amsterdam, protected by its liberal magistrates. He is said to have taught at the Groote School at Amsterdam that "all the people are seduced by monks and priests." He taught in Amsterdam until 1535. For some time he was head of a Latin school at Noordwijk near Leiden, influencing and stimulating the evangelical-minded of Leiden and Haarlem. He also stayed at Zutphen, and c1545 at Basel in Switzerland. In 1558 he became the leader of a group of evangelicals at Delft, Holland, the only town, as far as is known, where the Sacramentists had a sort of congregation. Unlike most Sacramentists, Sartorius did not join the Ana-Saskatchewan, a province of Canada, is the central one of the three prairie provinces in Western Canada. On the east is Manitoba and on the west is Alberta. The name Saskatchewan is an Indian name meaning rapidly flowing river. In fact, two rivers of this name flow through Saskatchewan—the North Saskatchewan River and the South Saskatchewan River, which originate far apart in the West in the Rocky Mountains and meet just east of the city of Prince Albert, then continue as one to Lake Winnipeg.

Regina is the capital of the province. One of the first members of the parliament was Gerhard Ens (q.v.), of Rosthern, a Mennonite, who later joined another church. In Regina there are also a Mennonite Brethren church and a General Conference Mennonite church.

The second city is Saskatoon, where a university and a teachers college are located which usually have a good number of Mennonite students. Saskatoon has four Mennonite churches—two M.B. churches and two G.C.M. churches. Prince Albert and North Battleford also have G.C.M. churches. The first Mennonite settlers came from Russia to Manitoba in the 1870's, but because of their large families they were soon looking for new land. The first five families from Manitoba arrived in Rosthern, 50 miles north of Saskatoon, in 1891-92. Soon the adjoining districts of Eigenheim, Laird, and Waldheim were settled. Some came directly from Russia to this district. Some Mennonites from Prussia settled in the Tiefengrund district, which is only a few miles north of Laird. In the main, these districts formed the Rosenort Mennonite Church, which now has about 1,500 members. In the beginning of this century, the Old Colony Mennonites, mostly from Manitoba, took land near Hague and Osler and settled in many villages. Some went across the South Saskatchewan River, where the town of Aberdeen is located. They were joined by other Mennonites and generally live on separate farms. A somewhat milder branch of the Old Colony Church is called the Berghthaler Church. In the early 1920's a large part of the two groups emigrated to Mexico and Paraguay, because they were dissatisfied with the requirement of the public school system in Canada that the English language be used in instruction. In the southern part of Saskatchewan, near Swift Current, a number of villages were settled by Old Colony Mennonites. Other Mennonites came from Minnesota, Nebraska, and the Dakotas and settled near Langham, Dalmeny, and up to Mennon and Hepburn. Many of these were Mennonite Brethren, whose church interests are centered mainly in Hepburn and Dal-meny. South of Langham a group of Krimmer Brethren settled, where the names of Waldner and Stahl predominate. Across the North Saskatchewan River from Waldheim and Langham Mennonites also settled, and here the small town of Borden is located. A greater party from Kansas and Oklahoma settled near Drake about 100 miles southeast of Saskatoon. Not far away from these, near Guernsey, there is an M.C. group.

The southern part of Saskatchewan also received Mennonite settlers. Besides the Old Colony Mennonite settlement near Swift Current other settlers located at Herbert, between Regina and Swift Current, and in surrounding districts. In Herbert (q.v.) and in Swift Current (q.v.) there are both M.B. and G.C.M. congregations.

Later smaller and larger colonies of these first settlers were established in the northern parts of Saskatchewan, near Meadow Lake, Carrot River, Lost River, and other places. When the immigrants in the 1920's came from Russia, larger settlements were established near Herschel, Fiske, Kindersley, and Superb (Ebenfeld congregation) in the western part of the province; also at Rabbit Lake and Glenbush (Hoffnungsfeld) the congregation in the northern part of this province, which is more or less settled; and also in the Hanley and Dundurn districts south of Saskatoon. Somewhat northwest of Regina is the Eyebrow Mennonite Church.

In 1957 there were about 20,000 (pop.) Mennonites in Saskatchewan, who in the main belong to seven branches.

The yearbook (1954) of the Conference of the Mennonites in Canada gives the following statistics of its congregations in the province:

This would give us the following totals of population:

Canadian Conference GCM, over 7,000; Mennonite Brethren, 4,000; Bergthaler (statistics of individual congregations not available), 3,000; Old Colony, 1,000; MC, one near Guernsey 136; the Krimmer Brethren two at Waldheim and Langham, 175, and others. The latest congregation is the Rudnerweide Church near Osler and Hague. The total baptized Mennonite membership in Saskatchewan in 1957 was c9,000.

In 1903 Mennonites (GCM) of Rosthern and surrounding districts gathered in Eigenheim, near Rosthern, to consider the question of establishing a Mennonite high school. In 1905 the German-English Academy was opened in Rosthern and still functions as the Rosthern Junior College. This school was incorporated in 1908 under a special Act under the name German-English Academy. During these 50 years the school had many ups and downs, but in the last years it had well over one hundred students.

In 1932 the Rosthern Bible School was opened in connection with the German-English Academy, now Rosthern Junior College. In 1939 the Bible School moved into a separate building which it occupied until 1957, when it was again united with RSC.

Until recently Rosthern was the Mennonite center in Saskatchewan. In the last decades, however, many Mennonites have been moving into larger cities, and at present Saskatoon (pop. 72,858) has the largest Mennonite population. In 1922 the Canadian Mennonite Board of Colonization was founded with its office in Rosthern and in 1923 the immigrants from Russia started to come in. Up to 1930 over 20,000 Mennonite immigrants came to Canada, mostly from Russia. The Canadian leader of this immigration was David Toews, elder of the Rosenort Mennonite Church in Saskatchewan, who was living in Rosthern. After World War II a new stream of immigrants to Canada set in when J. J. Thiessen of Saskatoon was chairman of the Canadian Mennonite Board of Colonization which has now moved to the city of Saskatoon.

The Mennonite Youth Farm, located on the Experimental Farm near Rosthern, was discontinued as such by the government, because the Agricultural Department of the University of Saskatchewan in Saskatoon, only 50 miles south, was doing a similar work. In the winter of 1943-44 the Experimental Farm with 640 acres was bought by the Youth Organization of Saskatchewan. In 1944 the Invalid Home was opened on the Youth Farm and now (1955) has 80 patients in two separate buildings.

In 1945 the Elim Gospel Beach (q.v.) in South Saskatchewan was bought. In 1946 the first Children's Home on the Youth Farm in Rosthern began and in 1953 another home, the Crippled Children's Home, was opened on the same Farm. Combined these homes are able to take 20 children. In 1949 the pasteurization plant on the Youth Farm was built. This Farm has about 30 cows and supplies the town of Rosthern with pasteurized milk. In 1951 the Invalid Home in Herbert, South Saskatchewan, was built by the Youth Farm. It now has about 20 patients.

The Rosenort Mennonite Church of Saskatchewan has now (1954) divided into two churches. It had 11 districts and now has the names of United Mennonite Church (Rosthern, Osler, Laird, and Horse Lake) and the Rosenort Mennonite Church of Saskatchewan (Tiefengrund, Hague, Hochfeld, Neuanlage, Aberdeen, Garthland, and Capasin).

Besides these there are four Bible schools. The G.C.M. have one at Swift Current; the E.M.B. have one at Dalmeny, and the M.B. one at Herbert, founded in 1913, and Bethany Bible Institute at Hepburn. The General Conference maintains a bookstore at Rosthern. J.G.R.

Saskatchewan Conference of the Mennonite Brethren Church was organized in 1946 as an annual gathering of ministers, including two subdistricts (North and South) with semiannual gatherings. In 1957 it had 26 congregations with a total baptized membership of 2,301 (North 1,467, South 834). As is the case in other Canadian M.B. provincial conferences, the conference devotes its attention to matters of local or provincial nature, including home missions, ministers' conferences, Bible conferences, etc. H.S.B.

Saskatchewan Mennonite Youth, a 6-page monthly, edited by Isaac Epp, was started in 1944 and published in Rosthern, Sask. The last issue in the Bethel College Historical Library was dated March 1949.

Saskatoon, Sask., population 72,858, chief commercial center of central Saskatchewan and site of the provincial university, has five Mennonite churches (3 GCM: First, 348 members; Mayfair, 115; Pleasant Hill, 28; 2 MB: Saskatoon, 302; and City Mission Chapel, 22), and the headquarters office of the Canadian Mennonite Board of Colonization (q.v.) since 1947. The Mennonite Brethren began work in the city in 1927, the G.C.M. Church in 1930. The Mennonite population in the city is over 1200, including children. The nearest Mennonite congregations are 20 miles to the northwest at Dalmeny (MB, 262 members; EMB, 212), 30 miles northwest at Langham (EMB, 87; GCM, 178), 30 miles north at Hepburn (MB, 241), and 30 miles south at Dundurn (GCM, 293). Rosthern (q.v.) is 60 miles north.

Saskatoon First Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Saskatoon, Sask., a member of the Canadian District Conference and the Conference of Mennonites in Canada, had its beginning with the coming of the Mennonites from Russia after World War I. Mennonites who settled in Saskatoon were at first served occasionally by visiting ministers and students at the university. In 1930 Jacob John Thiessen was stationed here by the Home Mission Board. In 1932 a congregation was organized as a branch of the Rosenort Mennonite Church of Saskatchewan and Thiessen was ordained as minister. A new church was dedicated on Oct. 18, 1936. In 1937 the congregation was reorganized as an independent church, and in 1938 Thiessen was ordained as its elder. The congregation began the Pleasant Hill and Mayfair mission centers; the latter is now known as the Mayfair Mennonite Church. The membership of the First Mennonite Church in 1957 was 348, with J. J. Thiessen as elder.

J.J.T.

Saskatoon Mennonite Brethren Church, located in Saskatoon, Sask., began in 1927, when members gathered for worship under the leadership of Peter Funk. As more Mennonite Brethren moved into the city a congregation was organized under the leadership of Gerhard Penner, which met for services in a Baptist church. The first church was built on the corner of Avenue C and 25th Street West in 1935, and H. S. Rempel became the leader of the city mission and also of the congregation. As the work grew the congregation was separated from the mission and a new church was built in 1954 on the corner of Avenue C and 33rd Street. Other pastors who have served the church have been H. H. Epp, Dan Wiebe, Art Martens, and G. L. Braun, the last of whom was serving in 1957, with a membership of 302.

Sattler, Michael. Sattler's Pre-Anabaptist Life. Michael Sattler, an outstanding Anabaptist leader and martyr of South Germany, was born at Staufen in the Breisgau near Freiburg, Germany, about 1490.

The Hutterite chronicle relates that he was a learned man. All of his writings show that this was a fact. He was familiar with the original languages of the Bible; for in his trial he offered to prove his teaching from these languages. But where he was educated is not yet known. His name is not on the matriculation lists of the University of Freiburg; nevertheless it is possible that as a monk in the nearby Benedictine monastery of St. Peter he attended lectures at Freiburg. Nor is it known when he entered the monastery. In the monastery he reached the office of prior, second only to the abbot, as is reported in the Berner Chronik (V, 185 ff.) of Valerius Anshelm, whose wife was a native of Staufen. This also agrees with the mocking question why he did not remain a lord in the monastery, put to Sattler by the soldiers just before his death in Rottenburg in 1527, to which Sattler replied, "According to the flesh I would be a lord; but it is better so."

The Reformation caused great excitement in the Breisgau area; Freiburg seethed. In Kenzingen Jakob Otter preached evangelical doctrine, in Neuenburg Otto Brunfels, in Schlatt the venerable dean Peter Spengler. Sattler began to study the Pauline epistles in the monastery, and soon discovered that the way to righteousness before God was not the one required by the old church and the monastic life. The earnest, morally upright monk was horrified by the unspiritual life of the priests and monks. He knew the dangers of celibacy as required by the Catholic Church. He therefore left the monastery and married a Beguine, whom Anshelm called "a talented, clever little woman." But now he could no longer stay at home, since Ferdinand I of Austria, the ruler of the Breisgau, under the influence of Cardinal Campeggio, had ordered the extirpation of heresy. He went to Zürich in 1525, and there, probably under the influence of Reublin, he joined the Anabaptists. With Muntprat of Constance and Konrad Winkler of Wassberg, near Ufter, he zealously preached in forests, and among others won Jakob Zander, of Bülach, called Schmid, for the Anabaptist cause. It is improbable that he attended the first Zürich disputation with the Anabaptists, Jan. 17, 1525, or the second, March 20, 1525; but it is certain that he was present at the third on Nov. 6, 1525, for the authorities were now aware of him and expelled him on Nov. 18. He returned to his home town, but could not stay under the bloody regimen of Ensisheim (the seat of the Austrian government of the Breisgau in Alsace). He turned to Strasbourg (q.v.), where Capito (q.v.) received him in his home.

The Theology of Sattler and Denk Compared. At Strasbourg Sattler met Hans Denk (q.v.); but very soon the great difference in their views became apparent. Sattler adhered to the principles of the Zürich Brethren, whereas Denk was more independent. Sattler clung to the letter of the Scripture, whereas Denk rated the inner Word, the revelation of God in the human spirit, above the written Word. Both questioned the Lutheran doctrine of justification and also held works to be important to man's salvation, but they differed on Christ's work of redemption. Sattler agreed with Protestant teaching:

"Who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works" (Titus 2:14). Denk rejected the concept of total depravity, for every man, he said, bears in him a spark of God's Spirit, and is related to God. Christ is our example and shows the way to become one with God. The confession of Christ's death or reconciliation he disregarded. Though he did not expressly deny that Christ's suffering is reckoned to the believer, he put it into the background. On the other hand, he stressed that Christ by fulfilling the law has opened the path which no man could find alone. In other words, Denk's emphasis was on Christ as an example rather than as a sacrifice.

Sattler wanted to build a church of Christ, pure, God-fearing, and genuine, cleansed by the blood of Christ to be holy and blameless before God and men. His brethren were God's obedient children, who had separated from the world. Denk's writings contain practically nothing about the church and the world. Nowhere, except in the debated conclusion of his booklet Von der wahren Liebe, does he discuss the relation of the church to the world and its attitude toward government, to military service, or other requirements.

Sattler and Denk also differed on the value of baptism. Sattler believed that through baptism the believer was admitted into the church of the saints. Denk did not place much value on the sacraments, which were for him nothing more than external symbols. Denk's entire concept of church and baptism is derived from the great influence of Mysticism, as represented by Tauler, Deutsche Theologie, and the Imitation of Christ.

Sattler, like the Reformers, taught that Christ came to save all who believe on Him, but that he who does not believe will be condemned. Denk taught that Christ died for all, and that God has destined all men for salvation. In Denk is seen the bold flight of the spirit which wants to penetrate into the deepest questions of faith. Sattler clung to humble simplicity and withdrew from highflying spirits and theologians (Schriftgelehrte).

Sattler's Discussion with Bucer and Capito in Strasbourg. After Denk, Ludwig Haetzer (q.v.) was staying in Capito's home; but the serious, quiet, and upright Sattler was repelled by the restless and impure man. His association with Capito and Bucer (q.v.) was so much the more sincere. He presented to them a summary of Anabaptist teaching after consultation with the Anabaptists of Strasbourg, which shows a mystical-quietistic piety, but at the same time a deep inwardness and holy earnestness. The points of discussion between them were baptism, communion, power or sword, oath, and the ban. Sattler drew up his articles of faith as follows:

(1) Christ has come to save all who believe in Him.

(2) He who believes and is baptized will be saved, but he who does not believe will be condemned.

(3) Faith in Christ reconciles us with the Father and gives access to Him.

(4) Baptism seals all the believers into the body of Christ, who is now their Head.

(5) Christ is the head of His body, that is, of the believing church.

(6) As the Head, so shall the body be.

(7) The predestined and called believers shall be conformed to the image of Christ.

(8) Christ despises the world; His children shall do the same. He has no kingdom in this world; the world is against His kingdom.

(9) The believers have been chosen out of the world; therefore the world hates them.

(10) The devil is the prince of all the world; through him all the children of darkness reign.

(11) Christ is the prince of all spirits; through Him live all that walk in the light.

(12) The devil seeks to destroy, Christ to save.

(13) The flesh is at enmity with the spirit, the spirit with the flesh.

(14) The spiritual are Christ's; the carnal belong to death and the wrath of God.

(15) Christians are quite at rest and confident in their Father in heaven, without any external worldly armor.

(16) Christ's citizenship is in heaven, not on the earth.

(17) Christians are the family of God and citizens of the saints, not of the world.

(18) But they are the true Christians who do the teachings of Christ with works.

(19) Flesh and blood, display, worldly honor, and also the world cannot comprehend the teachings of Christ. In short, Christ and Belial have nothing in common.

Capito and Bucer discussed these points with Sattler in "brotherly discipline and peace," but did not reach an agreement. Sattler realized the untenability of his situation. On the one hand, he must have feared that the learned theologians would influence him to change his mind, which would for him denote a denial and blasphemy of God. On the other hand, he feared that if he persisted in his views he would fall into the hands of the authorities.

The Schleithem Conference. It is probably right to assume that in the last months of 1526 (not in 1527) Sattler went into the Hohenberg territory in Württemberg in response to an invitation by Reublin. There he wrote a letter of farewell to Capito and Bucer, defending his departure. Reublin and Sattler divided the Hohenberg region between them, Reublin taking the work south of Rottenburg (q.v.), and Sattler in the north, with his headquarters in Horb (q.v.). Sattler was very successful and won a large following for the Anabaptist movement in and around Horb. His influence is indicated by the fact that he presided at the conference at Schleithem (q.v.) on Feb. 24, 1527, which adopted a confession of faith drawn up in seven points and sent to the brotherhood in the form of an epistle (see Brüderlich Vereinigung). Though these articles did not attain the status of a full confession of faith, they offered a firm foundation for the High German and Swiss Anabaptists, and at the same time rejected the libertinism of a man like Haetzer. The goal set by Sattler for the Brethren was the creation of a holy church, which was forbidden all association with persons of other faiths, all participation in the religious services of Catholic or Protestants, all association in civilian life including trade, all acceptance of public office, all use of weapons and legal compulsion, and all swearing. At the same time Sattler created a proper organization. Each congregation was to choose and dismiss its "shepherd." The "shepherd" had the leadership of the congregation in his hand in the broadest sense, especially the conducting of worship services, communion, reading, admonishing, teaching, reproving, banning, and audible prayer. Very carefully Sattler provided for the preservation of the office of preaching during persecution, so that the congregations should never lack a firm hand, even though their preacher should be banished or killed. The seven articles of the Schleithem Confession testify to Sattler's holy zeal and his unfeigned warmth and devotion.

Sattler's Arrest and Trial. When Sattler returned from Schleithem, the Anabaptists had already been discovered at Rottenburg, without Sattler's having any premonition of it. Then at the end of February he with his wife and Reublin's wife, Matthias Hiller, and Veit Veringer of Rottenburg, and a number of men and women of Horb were arrested. The government had made a valuable catch. For on Sattler were found not only the seven articles, but also some important written notations on the plans and activities of the Swiss Brethren. The authorities did not trust the feeling in Horb, and the prison was not strong enough or large enough for the great number of prisoners; they feared a revolt. Therefore the prisoners were led by Count Joachim von Zollern and the foremost officials, with fourteen horses, to the more secluded town of Binsdorf. Here Sattler wrote a letter of consolation to the congregation at Horb. He admonished them to be steadfast and bade them farewell. For he was constantly threatened, now with the rope, now with fire, and now with the sword. But these did not terrify him; with his wife and brethren he had committed himself entirely to the will of the Lord, but he knew that martyrdom awaited him.

The Innsbruck (Austria) authorities, under whose jurisdiction this territory fell, had decided to hold court in Rottenburg, and on March 18 the towns of Ueberlingen, Radolfzell, Stockach, and Villingen received orders to send two judges each to Rottenburg. The University of Tübingen was also required to send two doctors of the imperial law, since it was feared that laymen might pass an unsuitable verdict, and also because they wanted to be protected against public opinion, which might have accused the government of dealing too lightly with so serious a matter as a religious trial in committing it solely to the laity. The trial was set for April 12; but all sorts of hindrances interfered. Horb refused to deliver the prisoners to the court. The government was acquainted with the mood of Horb and had therefore taken the four Anabaptist leaders to Binsdorf.

The strictly Catholic University of Tübingen also flatly refused to send two lawyers, for they knew that the outcome would be a death sentence, which would disqualify them for the priesthood; some had already taken the first steps toward entering the priesthood, and others were planning to do so soon, and they could not be consecrated if they took part in a criminal court. The university also raised the objection that it had a burden of work accruing from the courts in its own principality, whereas Rottenburg belonged to another rule. And finally they noted that the Rottenburg parish belonged to the University of Freiburg, which should therefore be interested in an ecclesiastical trial in Rottenburg. Did the government feel that the real motive behind the university's refusal was horror of the capital punishment its representatives were to approve?

With amazement the authorities noted the large number of appeals for mercy for the prisoners, an indication of the mood of the people. For Count Joachim, a man of indolent calm, and his officials the entire case, which was creating so much work, was most inconvenient. How easily they could have been relieved of the work of holding court by simply calling in the imperial provost Aichele (q.v.) to hang the Anabaptists quietly on the nearest tree, as the Swabian League did! The Count actually made this proposal to the government. The government replied contemptuously that the honor of the house of Austria did not permit execution without trial and sentence. Even Ferdinand, who in his hasty manner declared "the third baptism," i.e., drowning, the best antidote to Anabaptism, and who had expressed the wish that Sattler be drowned without delay by Aichele, but felt that for the others there was no need to hurry, was persuaded to postpone the court session to May 17. Ehingen was added to the towns mentioned above which were to send representatives to Rottenburg. Freiburg also sent two men, though they were not members of the university. The Innsbruck authorities appealed to Stuttgart to use its influence on the University of Tübingen to send two jurists; they were not to be doctors of spiritual law, but of temporal law, who were laymen. Once more the university protested that it had no jurists but those who were now priests or about to take orders, and claimed papal and imperial law. Indeed, on May 6 the university sent two of its members to Stuttgart to present their refusal to send delegates. Stuttgart rejected the appeal, for it wanted to please Innsbruck. A clever evasion was agreed upon, probably suggested by Stuttgart. Two doctors actually went to Rottenburg; they were better paid than was usual for the first court session; they were, however, not doctors of law, but of the arts. They were Georg Farner of Kirchheim and Balthasar Stumpp of Waiblingen.

Now Innsbruck also considered it necessary to call two men from Ensisheim because of their wealth of experience in religious trials. But there was no other government with so bad a reputation as Ensisheim. Their lack of earnestness and strength was matched by an ambitious attitude, full of sycophancy toward their superiors and bloodthirstiness toward their inferiors. The men sent by Ensisheim had no lack of experience in or of inclination for "Blutgericht." They were the city secretary Eberhard Hofmann and Jodokus Gundersheim, the city secretary of Neuenburg.

Michael Sattler and his wife, Veit Veringer, and Matthias Hiller, who had thus far spent eleven weeks and three days in jail, were taken to Rotten-burg by the mayor of Binsdorf, Peter Putz with twenty-four horsemen. Since Count Joachim feared a revolt in the town fifty-six additional foot soldiers were drawn from the villages of the lower district and sent to Rottenburg.

On Wednesday, May 15, 1527, the judges called to the trial were already assembled, so that the court could open. According to the Villingen chronicle the court consisted of twenty-four judges. The chairman was the "Landeshauptmann" Count Joachim of Zollern. The attorney for the defense was the mayor of Rottenburg, Jakob Halbmayer, whom Sattler made responsible for the outcome of the trial; but he appeared only at the beginning and the end of the trial. During the trial, feeling inadequate to the position, he had Hofmann speak for him. The assumption is probably correct that this eloquent legal expert was the conspicuous character in the affair and that he was responsible for the cruel sentence, which aroused great excitement.

There are four accounts of the course of the trial; the simplest and most credible has the title, Ayn neues wunderbarliches geschicht von Michael Sattler zu Rottenburg am Neckar sampt andern 9 mannen seiner lere und glauben halben verbrannt und 10 wyaber ertrenkt, 1527 (copy in the Wolfenbüttel library, photostatic copy in GCL). This account is based on the narration of Klaus von Gravenack, a Swabian who had presumably been forced to come to Rottenburg with arms to protect the court. He was a Protestant. In the Peasants' War he had in person gathered a company of peasants and was therefore arrested, and not released until May 5, 1526. His sisters Kunigunde and Margarete had been nuns in the Königsfelden convent, but had married Zürich clergymen. The account was probably written by a brother-in-law of Klaus von Gravenack and printed in Zürich. The second account appeared as an appendix to the Brüderlich Vereinigung and was headed, Folgen die Artikel und Handhabung, so Michael Sattler zu Rottenburg am Neckar mit seinem Blut bezeuget hat (Walther Köhler, Flugschriften II, no. 3). This appeared in a Dutch translation with some of Sattler's writings as early as 1560 (reprint 1565). The third account is Eines Wiedertäuffers Nachricht an die Brüder und Schwestern des Schweizerlandes von Hinrichtung einiger ihrer Secte zu Rothenburg am Neckar und der dabei vorgefallenen Wunderzeichen, printed in Füsslin (II, 374-88), written by Reublin and sent to the Brethren in Zollikon, Grüningen, Basel, and Appenzell. A fourth account is found in the chronicles of the Hutterian Brethren, published by Josef Beck (pp. 26 ff.). A fifth account, written by Johannes Schlegel of Ravensburg, first prebendary at Zürichberg, then assistant in Dübendorf, then three years in Bernese territory, about 1525 assistant in Höngg, 1528 pastor in Otelfingen, 1530 in Elgg, d. 1552, has not yet been found. Christian Friedrich Sattler gives brief but independent data certainly based upon material in the state archives.

The trial opened on Friday, May 17, and continued on Saturday. On the bench of the accused sat Michael Sattler, his wife, Matthias Hiller, Veit Veringer of Rottenburg, and seven other men and eight other women. According to the Villingen chronicle there were fourteen defendants. First they were given their choice of attorney. Sattler, speaking for the group, declined the offer, since it was not a legal matter. The way of law was forbidden them by God's Word; he was willing to be shown the contrary from the Word of God. Sattler spoke in a courteous, modest, but definite manner. Very wisely he called the judges the servants of God, thereby on the one hand recognizing their authority, though of course only to the extent that it did not concern religious matters, and on the other hand he appealed to their conscience by calling attention to their responsibility. Sattler briefly questioned the competence of the court. But no attention was paid to this objection, for they had been appointed by the Austrian government, and were therefore competent.

The Charges Against Sattler. Count Joachim now had the charge read. It comprised nine articles, seven of which pertained to all the defendants, and two to Sattler alone. The charge is not unskillfully written, but it reveals that there was no understanding for the Anabaptist case, and that the authors did not even have the pertinent facts about the Anabaptists. An analysis of its contents follows.

The first article accused the Anabaptists of trespassing against the imperial mandates. Anabaptism was therefore to this court not only a religious crime, but also a civil crime. It meant not only the overthrow of the Roman Church, but of the entire Christian Church, an unchristian attack against the faith, which placed the Anabaptists on the same level as the Turks; and in addition it was a secret revolt. The mandates had been posted in all the churches and town halls. This being the case, the court was of course competent. The emperor was the protector of the church—this was the premise and conclusion of medieval history—and the church was none but the Roman Catholic Church. This church, its doctrine, its organization, and its law were alone valid on Austrian soil. What had been going on for ten years to prove the untenability of this medieval view did not exist for Austria; and where it showed itself it was to be extinguished like a dangerous fire.

The first article concerned the law of the church acknowledged by the empire; the others were concerned with the splendors of this church in its means of grace and miracles, first of all with its sacraments. The second article accounts the Anabaptist denial of the Roman doctrine of transubstantiation, indeed of the presence of Christ in the emblems, as a crime; the third, their rejection of infant baptism; the fourth, their rejection of the extreme unction. The seventh article, which is incorrectly placed, belongs here. It reproaches the Anabaptists with an unheard-of practice in the communion; they broke bread and wine together into a dish and took them together. It is not known where this charge originated. The Schleithem Confession presupposes the Biblical manner of breaking bread. It must be assumed that a false rumor played a part here, connected with the term "breaking" the bread, which was foreign to the judges. From the Roman Catholic point of view breaking the bread was in itself unthinkable, since the bread was the body of Christ. The fifth article accused the Anabaptists of despising the "Mother of God" and the saints. The sixth dealt with their refusal to swear an oath to the government. These were the charges made against all the Anabaptists.

The last two articles applied to Sattler alone. The eighth charged him with the crime of abandoning the monastic order and marrying; his appointment as an Anabaptist preacher was evaded. In the ninth article a statement of Sattler's, perhaps taken from one of his writings, was cleverly put at the conclusion, which made him an especially dangerous man in the eyes of any Austrian. He was accused of having taught that if the Turks came into the country, no resistance should be offered; indeed, if war could be morally justified, he would rather fight against the Christians than against the Turks. This charge could not fail to make the deepest impression on the court. The Turks for years had been considered the worst foe of the empire and the Christian faith. Vast sums of money had been sacrificed by the faithful and paid as a Turkish war tax to make war on this archfoe of Christendom. The Turks had caused Ferdinand inexpressible distress; at great pains he had aroused the German estates and raised an army to fight the Turks. And now the Turk was to be considered less dangerous than he and the representatives of the old faith. To be sure, Sattler was not charged, as other Anabaptists had been, with having made an alliance with the Turks, but the charge that was made was sufficient to make him an archtraitor to the empire.

A glance over the nine articles shows that the center of gravity rests in the first article, and that besides it only the sixth and ninth were important. Accusations concerning the erroneous views on the sacraments and disregard for the saints were actually the concern of the ecclesiastical court at Constance and not of the secular court at Rottenburg. How was the secular court to consider a man a criminal on the basis of a question of the communion or baptism or for marrying, when no other crime could be proved against him? Was Sattler not right in claiming that the court was not competent?

But the accusation was based on the law of the empire. The faith of the Catholic Church was the only legitimate one in the empire. This had been confirmed by all the imperial mandates since the Diet of Worms in 1521; and these mandates were alone valid in Rottenburg. The view of the law was still that of the Middle Ages. Opposed to it stood a new world in the person of Sattler and the Anabaptists. They sponsored the principle of faith and freedom of conscience and adherence to the Word of God, but this concerned only a minority and was not the law of the empire. To the representatives of the medieval world it must have appeared as arbitrariness, or even sedition. But the course of the trial was even for that time a horrifying one. Responsibility for this state of affairs must be placed on the indolence and bungling of the presiding judge and the venom of the secretary of Ensisheim.

Sattler's Defense. Sattler now consulted the other defendants as to the manner of the defense. Then he began, unafraid, skillfully, but modestly, to discuss each article in its turn. At first he tried to refute the charge that the Anabaptists were disobedient to the imperial mandates; for these required that the Lutheran doctrine and error should not be followed, but alone the Gospel and the Word of Christ. This the Anabaptists had done. But the mandates threatened not only Lutheran doctrine, but all deviation from the Gospel as Rome understood it; to the Catholics, the Anabaptists were merely a Lutheran sect.

On the second article Sattler admitted at once that the Anabaptists rejected the teaching of the presence of the body and blood of Christ in the communion and attempted to prove his point as Luther and Zwingli had done: Christ had gone to heaven and was seated at God's right hand. If He is in heaven, He is not in the bread and cannot be eaten. Also on the third article Sattler admitted the charge. He did not try to conceal that the Anabaptists repudiated infant baptism. The command to baptize has faith precede baptism. Baptism is merely the symbol of the covenant with Christ. On the extreme unction Sattler made a distinction between oil as a creation of God, which is good, and the pope's oil. The pope had never created anything good. The oil mentioned by Mark and James was not the pope's oil. Here Sattler had a good point, but he assumed too much on the part of the judges.

The charge that the Anabaptists despised Mary and the saints Sattler could deny with a good conscience; but he had to admit that they believed that Mary was not yet elevated, but, like all men, awaiting the judgment; they did not accept her as a mediator and intercessor. But in the eyes of the court, such an attitude was contempt. As saints Sattler would acknowledge only those who live and believe. Dead believers he called the "blessed ones."

The charge that they refused to render an oath Sattler justified with Matt. 5:34 and 37. Sattler hardly found it necessary to refute the charge that the Anabaptists ate bread mingled with wine as the Lord's Supper; at least none of the accounts of the trial recorded it.

After Sattler had answered the charges against the Anabaptists in general he turned to the accusations made specifically against him. He justified his departure from the monastery with the knowledge derived from the study of the Pauline epistles, that the monastic position was an unchristian, deceptive, and dangerous one; and from his own experience of the life and conduct of the monks and priests, their show, deception, usury, and their great fornication in seducing this man's wife, that one's daughter, and the third man's maid. Paul had prophesied this in I Tim. 4:3.

Concerning the last point Sattler admitted that he had taught that if the Turk should come, no armed resistance should be made, for it is written, Thou shalt not kill. We should not resist any of our persecutors with the sword, but with prayer cling to God, that He may resist and defend. Sattler even admitted having said that if war were right, he would rather march against supposed Christians who persecute, capture, and kill the God-fearing. The Turk knows nothing about the Christian faith; he is a Turk according to the flesh. But you want to be considered Christians, boast of being Christ's, and still persecute His pious witnesses. You are Turks according to the spirit. To this strong admonition to the conscience of the court, Sattler added in conclusion that it was their calling to punish the wicked and protect the good. He could bear witness that the Anabaptists had done nothing contrary to God and the Gospel. Likewise the closest examination would substantiate that he and his brethren had never opposed the government by any act or word, neither in revolt or sedition nor in any other way. He demanded that experts be called and the Bible used in the original languages; a debate should be arranged. The Anabaptists were ready to be taught from the Bible. If they were proved to be in error, they would gladly bear the punishment. "But if we are not shown to be in error, I hope to God that you will accept teaching and be converted." The idea that the judges might be taught and converted by Sattler seemed so peculiar to them that they put their heads together and burst out laughing. The secretary of Ensisheim snapped at Sattler, "Yes, you rascal of a monk, should we dispute with you? Yes, the hangman shall and will dispute with you." The chairman found not a word to say in defense of the accused. Sattler did not allow himself to be disturbed and replied, "What God wills, will happen." His calm earnestness irritated the city secretary, so that he cried, "Indeed, it would be good if you had never been born, you archheretic; you have seduced pious people. If they would only acknowledge their error and commit themselves to mercy!" Sattler replied, "Mercy is with God." One of the other defendants said, "It is wrong to deviate from the truth." Now the wrath of the secretary reached its limit. He cried, "Yes, you desperate rascal, you archheretic, I say, if there were no hangman here, I would hang you myself and be doing God a good service thereby." Reublin reports that he had partly unsheathed his sword and said, "If you do not desist, I will execute you myself with this sword." Reublin probably confused a later scene with this one.

The Sentence and the Execution. The secretary may have felt that his poisonous attitude was making an unfavorable impression on the court, and began to speak in Latin with Sattler; this Klaus could not record, for he did not understand it. He remembered only Sattler's last word, "Judica." Now the city secretary became aware that he was playing a role that was not his. He therefore turned to Count Joachim with the words, "He will not cease this chatter today anyway. Therefore you may proceed with the sentence; I call for the decision of the court." Now Joachim asked Sattler whether he wished to ask for the verdict. Sattler replied, "You servants of God, I am not sent to judge the Word of God; we are sent to testify; but we are not for that reason removed from being judged, and we are ready to suffer and to await what God is planning to do with us. We will continue in our faith in Christ as long as we have breath until we are shown from the Scripture to be wrong."

Again the city secretary replied instead of the chairman, repeating the threat, "The hangman will instruct you and will debate with you, you archheretic!" Sattler replied, "I will appeal to the Scriptures." At this point the discussion was broken off. The judges withdrew to consult on the verdict. Their discussion evidently did not proceed as smoothly as the city secretary had imagined, for it lasted one and one-half hours.

The Anabaptists were then committed to the soldiers. Sattler saw himself subjected to scenes similar to those his Lord and Master had experienced. One cried to him, "When I see you get away, I will believe in you." Another seized his sword from the table, drew it, and said, "See, with this we will dispute with you." Klaus von Graveneck was horrified by all these words of contempt which were not at all fitting to the gravity of the situation; he felt that in such a situation one would have pitied the worst murderer, and here he saw innocent people tormented with no defense. Sattler's silence toward all personal insults annoyed the soldiers. One of the prisoners said, "Pearls should not be cast before the swine." Once more Sattler began to speak when someone asked him why he had not remained a lord in a monastery. It seemed incomprehensible to the man that anyone would for the sake of his faith sacrifice the haughty rank of a priest and the comfortable life of a prior in a monastery. Then Sattler answered, "According to the flesh I would have been a lord, but it is better so," and then showed from the Scriptures that his exchange was a fortunate one.

The period of painful waiting came to an end. The judges reappeared; the verdict was read. It read, "...Michael Sattler... shall be committed to the executioner. The latter shall take him to the square and there first cut out his tongue, then forge him fast to a wagon and there with glowing iron tongs twice tear pieces from his body, then on the way to the site of the execution five times more as above and then burn his body to powder as an archheretic."

Klaus von Graveneck adds, "All this I saw myself. May God grant us also to testify of Him so bravely and patiently." Reublin says that the trial lasted two days, that the verdict was read on Saturday, May 18, and that when the sentence was read, Sattler's wife comforted him with great joy in the sight of the entire crowd.

Before the prisoners were led away, Sattler had another conversation in a private chamber with the mayor of Rottenburg, whom Sattler had made responsible for the final verdict, although it is to be assumed that the city secretary of Ensisheim bore most of the guilt for the sentence. Sattler said to the mayor, "You know that you with your fellow judges have sentenced me contrary to law; therefore take care and repent. If you do not, you will with them be condemned to eternal fire in God's judgment."

Three more days were granted Sattler. Reublin is probably correct when he says, "What fear, conflict, and struggle flesh and spirit must have undergone, cannot be imagined." Sattler had agreed with his group to give a sign as evidence of his constancy and cheer. There is a difference of opinion concerning the day of Sattler's death. The Anabaptist chronicles and the Ausbund give May 21 as the day of his martyrdom. Klaus von Graveneck gives May 20. Reublin says, "Sattler lay in prison from Saturday to Monday and was executed on that day." It is most likely that the Anabaptist chroniclers became confused in their counting by the termination of the imprisonment "until the third day," and thought Sattler was executed on Monday, May 20. This is also the opinion of Hulshof (p. 65) and Baum, Capito und Butzer (p. 373).

First Sattler was taken to the market place and a piece cut from his tongue, but not enough to prevent speech. Then pieces were torn from his body twice with glowing tongs. Then he was forged to a cart, and between the city gate and the place of execution the tongs were applied five times again. The number of times the tongs were used is variously given. The sentence ordered two and five applications, Reublin speaks of six, Capito in his letter to the Council of Horb of two and five. The place of execution is a quarter hour's walk from the town close to the highway to Tübingen. The tortures of the unfortunate victim under the tongs, a monstrous heightening of the execution, must have been unspeakable, but nothing could shake Sattler. On the market place and the site of the execution he prayed for his persecutors and Klaus von Graveneck. When he was bound to the ladder with ropes to be pushed into the fire, he admonished the people to be converted, to repent and fear God, and to intercede for his judges. Then he turned to the judges. He especially remembered the mayor and the admonition given him in private. The mayor replied defiantly and angrily that Sattler should concern himself now only with God. Then Sattler prayed, "Almighty, eternal God, Thou art the way and the truth; because I have not been shown to be in error, I will with Thy help on this day testify to the truth and seal it with my blood."

Reublin says that a sack of powder had been tied around Sattler's neck to hasten his death. He was now thrown into the fire on the ladder; then his voice could be heard bright and clear with prayer and praise. Soon the ropes on his hands were burned through. He could now raise the two forefingers of his hands, thereby giving the promised signal to his group, and prayed, "Father, I commend my spirit into Thy hands."

Reublin could not avoid adorning Sattler's death with miracles. He reports that Sattler's right hand and his heart did not burn. The executioner cut the heart to pieces, the blood spurting high toward heaven. In the night after Sattler's death the sun and moon were seen for three hours above the site of execution with golden letters in them. The glow had been so bright that everyone thought it was midday. The authorities forbade anyone's speaking of it under oath, in order to suppress the matter. The death of Sattler, steadfast to the end as a martyr to his faith, does not need adornment from Reublin's imagination.

Three other Anabaptists were executed, among them Matthias Hiller. The furrier's apprentice of St. Gall, the wife of Stoffel Schuhmacher, and Salome Katler(in) of Rottenburg had recanted publicly. These like all other recanting Anabaptists were lighted out of Rottenburg with burning torches, and expelled forever from Austrian territory. Veit Veringer, who had first recanted and then returned to the Anabaptists, lay in prison at Schömburg for over thirteen weeks and was then executed. Valerius Anshelm relates that the countess of Hechingen, i.e., the wife of Joachim von Zollern, tried to persuade Sattler's wife to desist from her faith and stay at her court. But she declared that she would be true to her Lord and to her Christian husband, and was drowned in the Neckar on the eighth day after her husband's death. She would have preferred to die in the fire with him. According to some reports she was drowned on Wednesday, May 22.

The Reaction of the Public. Sattler's character lies clearly before us. He was not a highly educated divine nor an intellectual; but his entire life was noble and pure, true and unadulterated. The impression made by his death sentence in Rottenburg was profound. Klaus von Graveneck's horror is clearly felt in his report. It is as if the hand of Heinrich Hug, the chronicler of Villingen, trembled when he concluded his narrative about the Anabaptists in Rottenburg with the words, "It was a miserable affair, they died for their conviction" (Publikation des Literarischen Vereins 164, p. 459). Especially great was the impression on Strasbourg, where Sattler was personally known. Word had scarcely been received there that four others had been executed in addition to Sattler, and that still others lay in prison, when Capito seized his pen and on May 31 wrote to the council of Horb, "This Michael is known to us here in Strasbourg and he was somewhat in error, which we showed him through the Scriptures; but since he saw a lack in our preachers and other preachers of the true doctrine, especially in the outward life of the congregation, he perhaps paid less attention to our admonition. But at the same time he showed such great zeal for the honor of God and the church of Christ, which he would have pure and blameless and without reproach to those who are outside. We never censured this but praised it highly, but his method and the articles of his faith we always kindly rejected, and that after mature reflection before God. Now we did not agree with him herein. He wanted to make pious Christians through a fixed creed and outward compulsion, which we considered the beginning of a new monkery. But we desired to correct the life of the believers through consideration of God's good deeds, which He has shown us in body and soul, that it might be a fruit of love and gratitude, for this is the way and the order of salvation" (Baum, 373). Bucer speaks with equal respect in his Getreue Warnung (July 1527): "We do not doubt that Michael Sattler, who was burned at Rottenburg, was a dear friend of God, although he was a leader of the Anabaptists, but much more skilled and honorable than some."

Reublin's booklet seriously embarrassed the Austrian government, which would have liked to issue a counter report, but feared that nothing fruitful would result, and rightly so. But one consequence of the enormous excitement caused by Sattler's execution can be observed. In Württemberg the authorities now had the Anabaptists indoctrinated by clergymen, at this time by the Tübingen professor Käuffelin, to persuade them to recant.

The Anabaptists ascribed to Sattler the hymn, "Als Christus mit seiner wahren Lehr," which is in the Ausbund of 1583. Keller (ADB XXX, 412) considers Sattler the author of the leaflet, Wie die Gschriift verständlich soll unterschieden und erklärt werden (n.p., n.d.). Michael Sattler was as deserving of a monument at the site of his execution as John Huss in Constance.

On Aug. 16, 1957, the Sixth Mennonite World Conference dedicated a memorial plaque to Michael Sattler in the Lutheran parish church in Rottenburg, at which time a special memorial service was held.

Saucon Mennonite Church (GCM), a member of the Eastern District Conference, is located on the Old Bethlehem Pike between Coopersburg and Center Valley, Pa., in Upper Saucon Twp., Lehigh Co. The first meetinghouse, a log building, was erected in 1735-38. It had one room for the church and one room for the church school, separated by a swinging partition. In 1749 the following trustees were appointed to build another meetinghouse: George Bachman, Philip Geissinger, John Rieser, Samuel Newcomer, and Samuel Bechtel. The deed, dated 1751, is well preserved. More than a dozen Indians worshiped regularly in the services. In 1782 a schoolhouse was built on the grounds near the highway. It was abandoned when the Penn Schoolhouse, a public school, was built by the township. In 1847 (1841?) a beautiful stone meetinghouse replaced the old building.

In the Oberholtzer division of 1847 in the Franconia Conference most of the Saucon members followed Oberholtzer, so that the congregation became a charter member of the Eastern District Conference (GCM). The small group which stayed with the old conference continued to use the meetinghouse for some years. The last resident Franconia Conference (MC) minister who preached to the small M.C. flock at Saucon was Samuel Moyer (1806-77); he himself first went with the majority into the new conference, but returned to the Franconia Conference about 1861. The last M.C. member died in 1899. In 1957 the pastor of the Saucon church was M. Lawrence Smith, and the membership was 64.

Sauder (Sauter, Souder), a Swiss Mennonite family name no longer found in Europe but strongly represented in the Mennonite Church (MC) in the Franconia and Lancaster Conference districts in Eastern Pennsylvania and to some extent in Ontario, as well as in the Amish Mennonite area in Fulton County, Ohio. In 1746 two Souder brothers settled in Montgomery County. Of their descendants the following have served in the ministry of the Franconia Conference: Mahlon D. Souder (1859-1924) and Edwin A. Souder (1882-1957) at Rockhill, and Menno B. Souder (1892-) at Franconia. John D. Souder, a brother of Mahlon D., was prominent as a historian and artist in illuminated manuscripts. The town of Souderton, founded in 1860 and named Souderton in 1876, was named for the many Souders in the community.

In Lancaster County some of the Sauders who have served in the ministry are John M. Sauder in the Weaverland congregation as preacher from 1895 and as bishop from 1926, his son Eli G. Sauder, minister at Grofidale since 1920, Noah N. Sauder, minister at New Holland since 1923, J. Paul Sauder (b. 1902) at Tampa, Fla., and two other congregations. Roy Sauder is bishop at the Tedrow congregation near Archbold, Ohio. Levi S. Sauder was long superintendent of the Millersville (Pa.) Children's Home. Elvin R. Souder, of Souderton, Pa., is an active church and conference worker (GCM) and attorney.

Saur (written both Saur and Sauer by the family itself, Sower being the later anglicized form), Christopher (1693-1758), a noted Dunkard (Church of the Brethren) printer and publisher of Germantown, Pa., was born in Laasphe, Wittgenstein, Germany, emigrated to Germantown in 1724, and was baptized a member of the Dunkard church in 1728. After a residence near Ephrata in Lancaster County as a farmer, he returned to Germantown and in 1738 began his notable career as the first German printer and publisher in America. His annual almanac, Der Hoch-Deutsch Amerikanische Calendar (1739-77), and his newspaper, Der Hoch-Deutsch Pennsylvanische Geschicht-Schreiber (1739-77), had wide circulation among the Germans of Pennsylvania and Maryland and had great influence among the German sects, including the Mennonites. In these and other publications he spoke out against war and slavery. His son's (Christopher Saur, Jr.) Ein Geistliches Magazien (1764-73), the first religious journal in America, published hymns and other writings of the Mennonite schoolteacher Christopher Dock (q.v.), the good friend of both the father and the son. It was the father who persuaded Dock to write his famous Schulordnung in 1750, which was published by the son in 1770. The Saur Press published the first European language Bibles in America (German in 1743, 1763, and 1776); copies of the first edition are still found in some Mennonite (MC) pulpits in the Franconia Conference.

The Saur Press, carried on by the son until its confiscation by the Revolutionary authorities in 1778, printed the following Mennonite books: Ausbund (1742, 1751, 1767); Henry Funck, Ein Spiegel der Taufe (1744); and J. P. Schabalie, Die Wandlende Seel (1768, 1771). The other colonial Mennonite printer, the Ephrata Cloister Press, handled seven imprints during the same time: Guldene Aepffel (1745); Das Andenken einiger heiligen Märtyrer (1745); Die ernsthafte Christenpflicht (1745, 1770); Der blutige Schau-Platz oder Märtyrer-Spiegel (1748-49); and Christliches Gemüths-Gespräch (1769, 1770). — H.S.B.

Savary (Savery, Savry), a Dutch Mennonite family of artists (painters, copper engravers, sketchers), originally from Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders, Belgium, from where Jacques (Jacob) Savry moved to Amsterdam, where he died in 1602. One of his pictures, "Jephtha's daughter," is found in the Rijksmuseum at Amsterdam. His son Salomon Sav(a)ry (Amsterdam 1594-1665), married to Maria Levynsdr Panten, was a copper plate engraver as was his son Jacob (Amsterdam 1617-66). It could not be ascertained whether Roelant Savery (Kortrijk c1578-Utrecht 1639), who obviously was a brother of Jacques and the most prominent of all Savrys, was a Mennonite.

Another Savary family, probably related to the former, was found at Haarlem, Holland; here Marten Savry, married to Margaretha Snep, was from 1687 a trustee of the Flemish-Waterlander orphanage. — vDZ.

Sawatzky (Sawatzki, Sawadsky, Sabatzke), a family name which originated among the Mennonites of Prussia and was found in the church records of Tiegenhagen, Ladekopp, Rosenort, Fürstenwerder, and Elbing. The name is of Slavic origin. No information is available as to when it first appeared among the Mennonites. Han Sawatzky (Naamlijst 1743) was a preacher in the Elbing district of the Marienwerder (Frisian) Mennonite congregation.

From Prussia the name spread to Russia and to North and South America.

Franz Sawatzky, a pioneer minister (GCM) at Herbert, Sask., and his son Jacob F. Sawatzky, Newton, Kan., and his grandson, Victor Sawatzky, minister at Pawnee Rock, Kan., are representatives of the Sawatzky family which came to Canada in 1874. J. G. Rempel lists as G.C.M. ministers in Canada also A. Sawatzky, F. Sawatzky, J. J. Sawatzky, and G. W. Sawatzky. Some descendants of Abr. A. Sawatzky of Schönfeld, Russia, are now located in Ontario. Peter C. Sawatzky is Principal of United Mennonite Educational Institute, Wheatley, Ont.; Jacob Sawatzky, of Hague, Sask., is chairman of the Board of Rosthern Junior College, Rosthern, Sask.; Peter G. Sawatzky is a minister of the Mayfair Mennonite (GCM) Church in Saskatoon. — C.K.

Sawyer County (Wis.) Old Order Amish Mennonite Settlement, now extinct. In 1908-13 about 15 Amish families moved to Exeland, Wis., among them Bishop Eli J. Bontrager and family of Mylo, N.D., formerly of Indiana. In September 1913 Rudolph Hochstetler was ordained to the ministry. In 1916 Bontrager returned to Indiana for church and personal reasons. A minister, Ira Nissley, was ordained in 1919 and with two ministers the church prospered, as a number of other families moved in. After another bishop who lived close by took over the bishop care of the church, however, the unity of the church suffered and the families started to leave. The settlement was dissolved. — E.J.B.

Sawyer Mennonite Brethren Church, located 7 miles west of Sawyer, N.D., a member of the M.B. Central District Conference, was organized by Christian Reimche in 1909 with nine members. Reimche, the first pastor, served the church for many years with the assistance of other ministers. The first church building was erected in 1909. This was replaced by a new building in 1924, which was again enlarged and remodeled to 20 x 58 ft. in 1947. Ministers who have served the congregation include D. J. Gerbrandt, J. F. Thiessen, and Gustav Faul. In 1957 the membership was 84; the pastor was John D. Block. — A.A.D., J.F.T.

Saxony existed as an electorate in Germany 1356-1806, then became a kingdom and in 1918 a free state. It was the cradle of the Lutheran Reformation in the 16th century, promoted and protected by the electors of the Ernestine line of the Wettin-Saxon princely house, who lived in Wittenberg at the time. Among them were Frederick the Wise (1486-1525), his brother John (q.v.) the Steadfast (1525-32), and his son John Frederick (q.v.) the Magnanimous (1532-47), who was compelled after the battle at Mühlberg (1547) to give the electoral honors and lands to Duke Moritz of the Albertine line resident at Leipzig, which turned Catholic in 1697 and ruled until 1918.

As freely as Lutheranism was permitted to develop, so violently was Anabaptism attacked and suppressed by both the spiritual and temporal leaders. It was feared that there lurked within this religious lay movement the revolutionary and fanatical spirit of a Thomas Müntzer (q.v.) and the "Zwickau prophets" (q.v.).

Early in February 1527, in the district of Königsberg (q.v.), a Saxon enclave in Würzburg territory, where the movement gained an early foothold through the efforts of Hans Hut (q.v.), Volk Kolerlin, and other Anabaptist apostles, the first Anabaptists were seized. On Feb. 26, 1527, the elector issued the public order, "that no one, be he citizen, peasant, or anyone else, except the regular clergyman, preacher, and chaplain, to whom pastoral care is entrusted and who is qualified at each place is permitted to preach, baptize, or exercise other similar offices in his house or other places owned by him." Soon afterward he had the Königsberg (q.v.) citizens, Beutelhans (q.v.), Wolf Schominger (Schreiner), and ten other men besides a woman put to death as Anabaptists.

On Jan. 7, 1528, a new mandate was issued against the Anabaptists and the dissemination of their doctrine by spoken or written word, after the church inspectors had on June 16, 1527, been ordered to summon to court all those suspected of false doctrine, question them, and if necessary hear the testimony against them. Those who persisted in their error must sell their possessions and leave the country; those who acted contrary to the mandate should be arrested.

In 1528 Luther wrote his booklet, Von der Wiedertaufe an zwei Pfarrherren, in which he gave the assurance that there had not yet been an Anabaptist in Saxony. He adds, "I do not yet know exactly what is the cause and foundation of their faith."

The Saxon reformers approved of the elector's violent measures, so that on April 23, 1529, at Speyer he could without qualms of conscience give his consent to the well-known Anabaptist mandate (see Punishment of the Anabaptists) and henceforth strove to act in accord with it.

In 1529 ten Anabaptists were imprisoned at Reinhardtsbrunn, and the six who remained steadfast were put to death on Jan. 18, 1530, causing great excitement among the people. The reformers now found it advisable to formulate a vindication of the right to punish heretics. To this end Justus Menius, the superintendent of Eisenach, wrote Der Widdertauffer lere und geheimnis aus heiliger Schrift widerlegt, with a preface by Luther and a dedication to Philip of Hesse (who, they were convinced, was too lenient), dated May 4, 1530; and Melanchthon drew up a formal opinion addressed to the elector of Saxony at the end of November 1531.

In a long-drawn-out dispute with Philip concerning the penalizing of several Anabaptists in the Hausbreitenbach district, which was under the joint jurisdiction of Saxony and Hesse, the elector insisted on their execution. In the end the prisoners were divided between Saxony and Hesse. Of those allotted to the elector at least three were put to death: Berlet Schmidt, Hans Eisfart, and his wife. Later he also insisted upon the execution of the Anabaptist leaders, Melchior Rinck (q.v.) and Fritz Erbe (q.v.), who were held by Philip. They died in prison.

In Schweinitz near Wittenberg death in prison terminated the many cross-examinations and long martyrdom of Hans Sturm of Steyer, though he had neither preached nor baptized in Saxony. His countryman Peter Pestel of Linz, also a victim of the intolerance of the Wittenberg theologians and jurists, was beheaded on Friday after Corpus Christi at Zwickau in 1536.

After the fall of Münster in 1535 the elector's severe attitude was, of course, sharpened. On Nov. 21, 1535, Hans Peissker of Kleineutersdorf near Orlamünde was arrested in his own house with his sixteen-year-old daughter Margarethe and fourteen others; he was taken to the Leuchtenburg, and after a minute cross-examination, attended by Melanchthon, put to death with Heinz Kraut (q.v.) and Jobst Möller in Jena at the end of January 1536. Of the four prisoners who were transferred to Neustadt a. d. Orla because of lack of prison space in the Leuchtenburg, Heinrich Möller sealed his faith with his death.

On April 10, 1536, a new mandate was issued in Saxony against the "Anabaptists, Sacramentists, and fanatics," which was composed by Melanchthon, and also a polemic from the same pen, Verlegung etlicher unchristlicher Artikel, welche die Wiedertauffer jurgeben, which every pastor in Saxony had to read and explain to his congregation on each third Sunday.

In January 1538 the elector had two men executed who were caught conversing with Fritz Erbe in the tower of the city wall of Eisenach, and who persisted in their faith in spite of all efforts to convert them. They were Hans Köhler (q.v.) of Eyeroode and Hans Scheffer of Hastingsfelde. Other admirers of Erbe recanted on the rack.

In the territory of Mühlhausen, an imperial city, where after the Peasants' War in 1525 the Duke of Saxony had the protective magistracy every third year alternating with the elector of Saxony and the langrave of Hesse, Georg Köhler and Klaus Ernfarf were among those who suffered death. A large number of Anabaptists were drowned in the Unstrut between Mühlhausen and Ammern and buried on the bank; among these were Jakob Storger and Klaus Scharf besides eight women on Nov. 8, 1537, and Hans Hentrock of Amra and Ottilia Goldschmidt, a Mühlhausen girl, on Jan. 17, 1538.

In spite of the frightful severity of the measures taken to suppress Anabaptism in and around Saxony, representatives of the movement now and then ventured to appear, especially in the Hausbreitenbach district, where on Jan. 7 and 8, 1544, a group of sixteen persons was tried at Berka (q.v.). Six of them escaped death by the intervention of Philip of Hesse; the rest were executed.

In 1543 John Frederick had Peter Rube (q.v.) beheaded. After the catastrophe of Mühlberg (1547) he apparently adopted a more lenient attitude; in 1551 he wrote to his son John Frederick the Middle, "To threaten heretics with the fear of fire and not to instruct them from the Scriptures we cannot consider Christian or right."

Under the Albertine electors, however, Anabaptism continued to be a capital offense and was completely eradicated. Early in 1584, under Elector August, who succeeded his brother Moritz, the Anabaptist Hans Dohn ended his life at the stake.

Scarboro Mennonite Mission (GCM) of Calgary, Alberta, was opened by the Alberta Conference in July 1944 and taken over by the General Conference in 1945. The building, formerly a United Church, was purchased in 1945. In 1957 there were 188 members, with J. J. Sawatzky as pastor. J.J.Sa.

Schabaelje (Scabalie, Scabalje, Schabaelle), a Dutch Mennonite family found at Amsterdam, Netherlands, in the 17th and 18th centuries as members of the Waterlander (Toren) congregation and after the merger (1668) of this congregation with the Lamist (q.v.) church, of the united Lam en Toren congregation. Jan Philipsz Schabaelje (q.v.), the renowned author of Lusthof des Gemoets and many other books, belonged to this family. Dirk (Philipsz) Scabalie (Jan's brother), b. at Zoutelande, Dutch province of Zeeland, about 1590, d. at Amsterdam after 1641, a member of the Waterlander congregation at Amsterdam, was a miller (also called Dirk Philipsz Molenaar), who had made much money by an invention for making white flour from buckwheat. This Dirk Scabalie was during his lifetime noted as a dramatic poet; his play Spel des Gheschils tot Athenen, a paraphrase of Acts 17, was played in the city theater of Amsterdam in 1617. He also published Aerdige comedie van Eigenbaet and Spel van des Heeren Wyngaert (Amsterdam, 1614), a tract on Romans 9 (Amsterdam, 1616) and Spel des Oproers tot Efesen (Amsterdam, 1641). With his brother Jan Philipsz Schabaelje he published a hymnal called Walchers Liedboek (Vlissingen, 1611). His father Philips Scabalie seems to have been a rather liberal Mennonite, who for some time shared the radical views of Robbert Robbertsz (q.v.).

Carel Scabalie was a deacon of the Waterlanders 1659-61, and of the Lam en Toren congregation 1683-88. Pieter Schabaelje was a public notary at Amsterdam 1695-c1735.

The Schabaelje family at Amsterdam died out in the early 18th century. vdZ.

Schabaelje (Scabalie, Scabalje), Jan Philipsz (Philipsen), b. at Amsterdam about 1585, d. there in April 1656, and buried at Alkmaar, was a member of the Mennonite Waterlander (Toren) congregation at Amsterdam. At first he, together with his brother Pieter, owned a grain mill and was rather wealthy; later he lost his money. In 1620 he was chosen deacon of his home congregation, and soon decided to devote himself to study; he then moved to Alkmaar, where he in 1636 or 37 was called to the ministry of the Waterlander congregation as a colleague of Hans de Ries (q.v.). After a few years, however, he was dismissed on a charge of offensive conduct with his housekeeper, whom he later married. The exact years of his service at Alkmaar are not known. After his dismissal he returned to Amsterdam, where he opened a bookshop in the Langestraat. This business did not prosper, and gradually Schabaelje's circumstances became rather poor; then he was appointed visitor of the sick in the Amsterdam Waterlander congregation with a small salary.

Schabaelje published a large number of writings, partly because he was forced to earn his living in this way, partly also because he felt an inner call to do so. With his brother Dirk Philipsz Schabaelje he published a hymnal entitled Walchers Liedboek (Vlissingen, 1611). His other publications are Harmonia ofte Eendrachtighe Vertellinghe der Vier Evangelisten (Amsterdam, 1624); Sommarium ofte corten inhoudt des Bijbels, followed by a Historielied van het leeven onzes Heeren Jesu Christi and two other hymns (Amsterdam, 1629, repr. Haarlem, 1654); Tractaet teghen de Successie der Pausen van Rome (Amsterdam, 1633); Dialogus van den Corinthischen twist . . . op deesen onsen tijd gepast (de Rijp, 1640); Aenmerkingen, of Gulden Annotatien (Hoorn, 1641; with a somewhat revised title reprinted De Rijp, 1641, and Amsterdam, n.d.); Den grooten Figuer-Bibel, a Biblical history with 477 copper engravings (Alkmaar, 1646); Historische Beschrijving van het Leeven Jesu Christi, 1069 pages with illustrations (De Rijp, 1647; 3d ed. Leeuwarden, 1707, 4th ed. Amsterdam, 1716; 64 pictures found in the third edition of this book are taken from the N. Visscher's Prentenbijbel); Bibelsche Figueren anders ghenaeemt Spiegel des Evangeliums (Amsterdam, 1648); Emblemata Sacra (1653); his Metamorphosis ofte Transformatie onses tijds waar in Poetischer Wijze beweezen word de groote, en wonderbaareljke veranderinge der Menschen uit hunne ware scheppinge: gesteld by maniere van Zaamensprekinge tusschen eenen welbelezten Historicus en eenen Pelgrim (Alkmaar, 1657) appeared after his death. Of his book Corte Maniere om de Siecken in haer wtersten te troosten the first edition has been lost. A second revised and enlarged edition was published at Amsterdam in 1682. He also wrote a booklet on De eeuwige Godtheyt Christi; of this book no separate edition seems to be extant; it is only found in a volume, published at Leeuwarden in 1688, containing (a) Hans de Ries' Van de eeuwigheyd ende Godtheyd Jesu Christi, (b) Schabaelje's De eeuwige Godtheyt Christi, and (c) Menno Simons' Van den eenigen ewigen ende waren Godt, Vader, Soon ende H. Geest. Besides these and a number of his hymns found in Mennonite hymnals such as Gheestelijck Kruydt-Hofken (q.v.) and Stapel's (q.v.) Lusthof der Zielen, two of his publications have been of outstanding significance for the Mennonites, viz., Lusthof des Gemoeds and Vereenighing van de principale Artiickelen des Geloofs.

In 1635 Schabaelje published at Alkmaar a devotional book, Lusthof des Gemoets inhoudende verscheyden geestelijke Oeffeningen met noch twee Collatien der wandelende Ziele met Adam en Noach (The Mind's Garden of Pleasure, Containing Various Spiritual Exercises with Two Dialogues of the Wandering Soul with Adam and Noah). This book has gone through more than 50 Dutch editions and has been the most widely read Mennonite book, also very popular among non-Mennonites. The second and following editions were augmented by a dialogue with Simon Cleophas, the title henceforth reading: Lusthof des Gemoeds . . . met nog drie Collatien der Wandelende Ziele met Adam, Noah en Simon Cleophas. In the second and following editions also a number of small additions were added. Most editions have a few rather primitive pictures and an illustrated title page; a 1724 edition has some copper engravings by Jan Luyken (q.v.). The last Dutch edition is dated 1768.

The last part of this book was separately published in a German translation, entitled Die Wandlende Seele, das ist: Gespraech der Wandlenden Seelen mit Adam, Noah und Cleophas, verfasst die Geschichten von der Erschaffung der Welt an biss zu und nach der Zerstoerung Jerusalems. This translation was made by B.B.B., who was very probably Bernhard (?) Benedict Brechbühl (Brechbill, q.v.; 1665-1720), who was among the Swiss refugees who came to Holland in 1710 and later emigrated to America. The German translation was edited in Europe at least 13 times, chiefly at Basel and Frankfurt-Leipzig.

It was very popular among the Mennonites in America, where 18 German editions of Die Wand(e)lende Seel(e) are known (first ed. Germantown by Chr. Saur, 1768) and 9 English editions of The Wandering Soul. As in Europe the American editions of this book, both German and English, were widely read by non-Mennonites. (See Wandering Soul.)

In 1640 (at Amsterdam) Schabaelje published: Vereenighing van de principale Artiickelen des Geloofs eeniger Doops-ghesinde Ghemeynten, diemen noemt Waterlanderen, Vlaminghen, en Duytschen, getrocken uyt hare uyt-gegevene Confession, waer uyt men sien kan het klein en nietigh verschil der selver Confessien, Tot dienst van alle vreed'lievende, door I.P.S. (Combination of the Principal Articles of Faith of Some Mennonite Congregations, called Waterlanders, Flemish, and Germans, Extracted from Their Published Confessions, from Which One Can See the Slight Difference Between These Confessions, in the Service of All Peaceful [Christians]). A second edition of this book appeared at Amsterdam 1674, 3d ed., Rotterdam 1739. In this book, written for the promotion of greater unity among the Dutch Mennonites, Schabaelje compares the Waterlander Confession by Hans de Ries and Lubbert Gerritsz, of 1610, and the Jan Cents High German-Frisian Confession of 1630, showing that the differences in the main doctrines are insignificant. Schabaelje's book was much appreciated by Schijn (q.v.) and other leading Dutch Mennonites. vdZ.

Schad, Georg (Jörg), an Anabaptist of Zollikon, Swiss canton of Zürich, was required to give an account of his faith before the court. He confessed that he had once lived in vice and sin, but through the grace of God had come to the knowledge of salvation and therefore desired baptism and faith, "the sign of brotherly love," whereupon Felix Manz (q.v.) baptized him with water. Later, when he was again summoned to answer for his faith, he confessed openly that he had himself baptized more than forty persons in the region of Zollikon, Höngg, and Küsnacht. Nothing more is known of Schad. Among the Mennonites of France, Schad is a family name of frequent occurrence, corrupted in English to Short. S.G.

Schaeff (Schaeff), Catharina (d. 1692 at The Hague, Netherlands), was one of the last members of the Mennonite congregation of The Hague, which died out soon after, but was re-established in 1881. Catharina Schaeff, who never married, was undoubtedly well-to-do, for she made a number of legacies, including one to the congregation of The Hague and one to Bastiaan van Weenighem (q.v.), who was her cousin. She had a remarkable collection of books; among them were some old Dutch Bibles, a copy of the oldest Dutch martyr book, Offer des Heeren, and other martyr books, the Foundation Book by Menno Simons, Dirk Philips' Christelyk Handboeckken, a number of old Mennonite hymnals, Sebastiaan Franck's "Wereltboek" (obviously his Chronica . . . , q.v.), the poetical works of Vondel and Camphuysen, writings of Galenus Abrahamsz and Bastiaan van Weenighem, and a collection of devotional books. It is not known what became of these books after her death. (DB 1896, 55-58; De Zondagsbode VI, 1892-93, No. 17.) vdZ.

Schafbusch, a large farm (Gutshof) 2 miles east of Wissembourg in Alsace, just south of the German border, was formerly the center of the Deutschhof-Geisberg (q.v.) Mennonite congregation. Mennonite families expelled from Switzerland about 1700 settled here as renters and joined with other Mennonites of the vicinity to form the Geisberg-Niederrödern (q.v.) congregation. The Naamlijst of 1776 calls it the Schafbusch-Röderen-Geisberg congregation. The family names of Schowalter, Borkholder, Müller, Schmitt, Hirschler, and Krämer occur in the 18th century. Services were held in a room reserved for the purpose, called the "Kirchenstube." Later, when the meetings were held in rotation on the various farms the communion services were still held at Schafbusch. In 1860, when the estate passed into non-Mennonite hands, Geisberg (q.v.) became the meeting center. Consequently the name Schafbusch has been dropped from the name of the congregation.

The church records, begun in 1855, and depending for their information on oral and written tradition, list the ministers and dates of ordination as follows: Johann Krehbiel of Niederrödern 1716, Johannes Borkholder of Schafbusch 1739, J. Weldy of Bühl 1775, Elias Dettweiler of Haftelhof 1780, Christian Hirschler of Schafbusch 1786, Johannes Müller of Schafbusch 1790, Heinrich Schmitt of Haftelhof 1790, Johannes Lehmann of Geisberg 1807, Christian Hirschler of Geisberg 1810, Jacob Hauser of Haftelhof 1813, Heinrich Hirschler of Niederrödern 1827, Johannes Lehmann of Niederrödern 1832, and Jacob Schowalter of Deutschhof 1839. This list, compiled so late, is, of course, not complete. Other sources fill in some of the omissions. Ernst Müller names Daniel Hirschler 1762, Hans Greibüel (Krehbiel), Jakob Lähmen (Lehmann), Hans Schowalter, and Johannes Miller (Müller). The Dutch Naamlijst names the first three, with the note that Daniel Hirschler held the office of elder from 1736 on.

Schafbusch is now the home of Philipp Hege (ordained elder in 1943), a descendant of Peter Hege of the Branchweilerhof (q.v.) who purchased it in 1912. The buildings of Schafbusch and Geisberg were severely damaged during World War II, but have been rebuilt. P.So.

Schaffhausen, city and canton in the north of Switzerland almost entirely surrounded by Baden, Germany. Dr. Sebastian Hofmeister (q.v.) is found very early in Schaffhausen working for the Reformation. He was a close friend of Zwingli's and was one of the presidents of the religious disputation held in Zürich in October 1523. Hofmeister must have been a very ready debater. The favorable outcome of this disputation encouraged Hofmeister to take further steps in introducing the Reformation into his home town. At the third Anabaptist disputation held in Zürich (Nov. 6-8, 1525) he was one of the four presidents; and in the Anabaptist disputation held at Zofingen (q.v.), July 1-9, 1532, he was one of the leading preachers who debated with the Anabaptists.

In September 1524 Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.) of Waldshut (q.v.), who later became an Anabaptist leader, came to Schaffhausen. His influence here was not very great, however, for he left the city after a few weeks and returned to Waldshut on October 19.

Anabaptist refugees who had been expelled from the canton of Zürich came to Schaffhausen in 1525 hoping to win Hofmeister for their cause. Johannes Brötli (q.v.), who baptized many in Hallau in the canton of Schaffhausen, as well as Wilhelm Reublin (q.v.), came to Schaffhausen. Obviously their work here was not without success. Brötli even wrote that Dr. Sebastian agreed with them in the matter of baptism. The rumor was spread that Schaffhausen would arrange a disputation on the question of baptism. In Zürich there was much concern about it since there were some doubts whether the matter of baptism would be solved in agreement with their ideas in Schaffhausen. But the council of Schaffhausen assured the people of Zürich in reply to a question that had been raised by Zürich: "We are also of the mind to baptize our young children and not to desist from this practice at this time."

Also Conrad Grebel (q.v.) had come to Hofmeister in February 1525 in the hope of influencing his opinion in the matter of baptism. But although Hofmeister at the beginning doubted the genuineness of infant baptism, he finally accepted it, certainly under some influence of Zwingli. As already mentioned, Hubmaier was also in Schaffhausen though without any great results. After he had been baptized by Reublin in April 1525, he worked with full conviction for baptism upon confession of faith and in this matter of baptism he also corresponded with Hofmeister. In his book published in 1526, Der uralten und gar neuen Lehrer Urteil, dass man die Kinder nicht taufen solle, Hubmaier reports that Hofmeister had written to him how they (the Anabaptists) publicly rejected infant baptism before the council; if Zwingli confirmed it he would not be walking according to the truth of the Gospel (ML II, 335). In this matter, Hubmaier writes, he has Hofmeister's own handwriting. This is proof for the assertion that Sebastian Hofmeister not only doubted the Scripturalness of infant baptism but even repudiated it.

On Feb. 8, 1525, the Zürich council wrote to the authorities of Schaffhausen that there had been "error and dispute about infant baptism," wherefore a public religious debate had been arranged in which it was recognized, "that infant baptism is not anything wrong." Thereupon a mandate was issued ordering young children to be baptized. At the same time it was stated that the theologians of Zürich had recognized the Anabaptist teaching as false and that Zwingli would very soon publish a writing clarifying the matter of baptism, Vom Tauf, Wiedertauf und Kindertauf. This was the occasion for a definite reversal in Hofmeister's doctrinal opinions. The entire course of the development shows a strong dependence of the city of Schaffhausen on Zürich in religious matters. On Feb. 11, 1525, the Schaffhausen council issued a mandate "that young children shall be baptized."

Whereas in the city an impasse was reached, in the country, at least in Hallau, under the work of Brötli Anabaptism made some progress. Most of the inhabitants were baptized. Brötli mentions in a letter that he and his companion Wilhelm Reublin had come to Hallau and then had gone "toward Schaffhausen and found our dear brother Conrad Grebel there." When the authorities of Zürich heard of Brötli's successful work, they at once wrote to Schaffhausen to warn them against this deceptive dangerous mission. The letter dated April 4, 1525, is new evidence of the concern felt in Zürich in behalf of Schaffhausen; it had a decisive influence there. In consequence, the council of Schaffhausen ordered Brötli's expulsion from Hallau; the Hallau people, however, refused to comply.

While Conrad Grebel was in Schaffhausen, Wolfgang Uolimann (q.v.) of St. Gall also came, to receive instruction and baptism from him. Uolimann had met Grebel in Schaffhausen and become a convert; he did not want to have the customary basin of water poured over him, "but was pushed down naked into the Rhine by Grebel" (Kessler).

After the Peasant Revolt (1525), when the matter of the Reformation was somewhat dubious in Schaffhausen, Hofmeister himself had to leave; he was accused of having preached from the pulpit that the Sacrament of the Mass, the baptism of young children, and also the confessional were the work of the devil. "Hofmeister," writes Bächtold, "did not promptly learn to distinguish between Reformation and Revolution or between intellectual religious rebirth and political and social regeneration."

An event of great importance for all of Anabaptism was the Synod of Anabaptist leaders held in the territory of the canton of Schaffhausen on Feb. 24, 1527, at Schleithem (q.v.). The Chronicler Rüeegger speaks of it in his Chronicle: "At the time of the Reformation the enemy did not neglect always to build a chapel in these places beside the churches of Christ with the weeds of the seditious, quarrelsome, and obstinate Anabaptists," and that they had worked out their confession of faith there and published it with the title Christenlichen Gloubens-Bekantnus der Kinderen Gottes zu Schleithem am Randen (i.e., the "Brüderliche Vereinigung").

In August 1527 the worried authorities of Zürich issued a warning that Hans Denk (q.v.), the well-known Anabaptist leader, was thinking of traveling to Schaffhausen, Constance, and Augsburg and that they should be careful that he does not sow tares.

In the meantime, since the Anabaptist movement was increasing more and more and Zürich and the other Protestant cities were applying sharp measures of violence against the Anabaptists, the council of Schaffhausen also let itself be persuaded to apply severe means to dam up Anabaptism. In the Abschid (Resolution) des Gehaltenen Tags zu Zürich der nachfolgenden Orten, Zürich, Bern, Basel, Schaffhausen, und St. Gall. On Sept. 8, 1526, the penalty for Anabaptism was decided upon. With satisfaction Zürich learned that the delegates "of our dear confederates of Basel and Schaffhausen . . . did not have less displeasure in such Anabaptism and the following of the same." The initiative for opening common consultation among the evangelical cities in their struggle against Anabaptism was taken by Zürich. Schaffhausen was also invited to the common Concordat against the Anabaptists of Aug. 12-14, 1527, at Zürich (ML II, 542). From this time on fines of money, imprisonment, and expulsion were the order of the day.

This conference of the evangelical cities resulted in a mandate published by the council on Sept. 13, 1527: "We the mayor and the council of the city of Schaffhausen proclaim to our citizens and to our people everywhere in our canton: since it is known that at present all kinds of tramps, rascals, Anabaptist preachers and the like who have been expelled elsewhere and are not allowed to stay in their fatherland are now keeping themselves in our city and canton . . . preach to the common and simple people and thereby mislead and confuse them the more rather than bring them to the true faith . . . so that henceforth no one shall lodge such or that kind of vagabonds . . . no one shall listen to their preaching, but shall arrest such people and commit them into our hands."

In this period occurred the first death sentence imposed in Schaffhausen, carried out on Nov. 13, 1527, against Hans Rüeger. He was charged with plans for a political revolt in addition to his Anabaptist faith, but there is no evidence for any revolutionary deed. On April 14, 1529, the second death sentence was pronounced against Jakob Schuffel from the Schufelberg. The records of the charge reveal that he had to give his life "on account of Anabaptism which cannot by any means be maintained with the Holy Scriptures and Christendom but is everywhere being rooted out of Christendom and is considered erroneous and heretical." Schuffel had been imprisoned in Zürich for one year and 18 weeks on account of his Anabaptist faith. On account of his "unchristian conduct" he was executed with the sword. It is reported concerning him: "he died firmly in his faith and rejects infant baptism which is not valid and states that his baptism is right and good and firm."

Numerous Anabaptists including some women were imprisoned in 1530 who were to be visited by the clergy in order "to lead them to the right way." Verena Mayer, also called Häckerin, the sexton's wife, who "had seen her error," was dismissed from prison upon payment of a fine of a silver mark; she also had to swear an oath not to return and had to stand in the pulpit of the cathedral and recant before the assembled congregation and ask for pardon. In spite of her public recantation she again went to the Anabaptists and was arrested. Since this imprisonment and the repeated visits of the clergy were fruitless, she was tried in the criminal court on Feb. 25, 1531, and sentenced by expulsion from the country. Because of her loyalty to her faith she was not permitted to come within four miles of the territory of Schaffhausen, otherwise "she should be executed in life and body." In this year "a series of obstinate subjects of my gracious lords" appeared before the council on account of Anabaptism. Most of them came from Hallau and were fined. While the strictly moral Anabaptists were treated thus, a frivolous life was quite noticeable in the masses of the people.

From the year 1532 there is extant a Memorial der Geistlichen in which the offensive conduct of the populace is reproved. In conclusion this document says: "From these above-stated articles it follows that the Anabaptists take a reason to separate themselves from us and make secret meetings in the city and canton saying that no improvement is noticed among us and that all vices are increasing; and because they do not have an understanding of the Scriptures they err grievously in some articles for which error we give them reason with our offensive living." This document of the clergy was not without its effect upon the "gracious lords." This is shown by the mandate of July 29 against gambling, cursing, drinking, etc., and finally against Anabaptism. After a lengthy warning against this "Anabaptist sect," persistence in the Anabaptist faith was threatened with punishment "against body, life, and property."

In 1535 Anabaptism seems to have reached its climax in Schaffhausen since the records of the council mention Anabaptists 41 times. The council saw itself compelled to issue a new mandate against the Anabaptists on March 31. They declared that such schismatics should be summoned before the council and warned. If that didn't do any good, they must emigrate. Further it is commanded with sharp threats of punishment: "because the Holy, divine Word is the true food of the soul, therefore in the future all who live in our city and canton . . . old and young shall at least once a week come to the true worship service and submit to the sermon." A letter written by an Anabaptist to the council has a somewhat ironic tone. It says that to be sure the papacy had been eliminated but one could still see no fruits of the true teaching. The strife over communion "had only given offense. . . . The Father enlightened others so they have recognized your mischief, but those you will not endure. But if you had remained in Christ's teaching you would be Christ's disciples, then your light would have shown so that men would have been reformed." Their position to Christ, the letter continues, and to His people is like that of the wolf to the sheep (Sirach, Chapter 13). One of the most important Anabaptist leaders of Schaffhausen was Martin Weniger, also called Lincki (q.v.). He was one of the principal speakers on the Anabaptist side in the disputation of Zofingen (q.v.) in July 1532. There is extant a document written by him, Rechenschaft marti Wenigers gen. Lingki's, us was ursachen sich die Töufel von unserer Kirchen, Gottesdienst und Predigten absöndern. Lincki applies to the clergy in this document everything uncomplimentary found in the Bible about the scribes and Pharisees. He saw in the Protestant church the "world" which walks in darkness. In conclusion he points to the persecutions of the Anabaptists and says: "If the Lord were not with us, they would have devoured us alive so that none of us would be left over. Our protection and shield is God. Overcoming by the faith and patience of Christ we overcome our enemies according to the example of Christ. All praise and honor only be to God and to his church in Christ Jesus." Lincki had to answer before the criminal court, was kept in prison for some time and then it is stated concerning him: "Because Martin Lincki has desisted from the Anabaptist faith he shall recant upon both pulpits, swear an oath not to fall back; then he may dwell in my lord's city and canton." The records of the Anabaptist disputation in Bern (q.v.) on March 11-17, 1538, mention the backslidden Lincki; also a Heinrich Wining of Schaffhausen is named as a representative of the Anabaptists.

Beginning with 1536 the movement visibly declined. The sharp measures of the government succeeded in subduing the fire. The Anabaptist mandates were from time to time confirmed and renewed. In the 1570's and 1590's a powerful emigration to Moravia took place, and the congregations in the canton of Schaffhausen soon were dissolved. Bächtold gives them the testimonial that he cannot find in the records the least trace of "madness or fanatical childishness." S.G.

Schagen, a Mennonite family, formerly of Alkmaar, Dutch province of North Holland, members of the Waterlander and later the united congregation. Pieter Gerrits Schagen was a deacon in 1674; Pieter Schagen was four times a deacon in 1737-54; Pieter Schagen Jr. 1749-51, and Jan Regter Schagen four times in 1777-1814. Members of this family are the preachers Marten Schagen (q.v.) and his son Petrus Schagen (q.v.). There was also a Reformed branch of this family at Alkmaar. (Church records of Alkmaar.) vdZ.

Schagen, Ma(a)rten (b. Oct. 24, 1700, at Alkmaar, d. Oct. 20, 1770, at Utrecht), was a son of Pieter Martens Schagen and Grietje Jacobs Volder. He was baptized in Alkmaar (Frisian congregation) in 1718 and in the same year he moved to Amsterdam, where he opened a bookstore and a publishing house on the Nieuwedijk in 1723. He printed and published a number of books, the most outstanding of which was a Dutch translation of the works of Josephus by A. Loosjes (q.v.) and J. L. Rogge (q.v.) in 1732. In the meantime he made a thorough study of languages (German, French, Latin, even Greek and Hebrew), literature, and theology. In 1727 he was called to be a (unsalaried) preacher of the Frisian congregation (Arke Noachs) at Amsterdam, serving here until 1738, at the same time running his business. In October 1737 he took the initiative in holding weekly meetings in a room of the church to explain and discuss the New Testament. In 1738 he was called to serve the Waterlander and Frisian congregations (then united) at Alkmaar (salary 750 Dutch guilders; 1,000 guilders after 1739); he served here only three years, in 1741 accepting a call from the Utrecht congregation, which he served until his death. By his activity, his wise policy, and his strong faith he succeeded in raising the Utrecht congregation, which had fallen into a serious decline, to great prosperity. After his death his colleague Joannes Cuperus (q.v.) delivered a funeral sermon in his memory—M. Schagen . . . plegtig gedagt in eene Lykrede (Utrecht, 1770), in which both his assiduity and his tolerance are highly praised.

This self-made man was highly renowned for his knowledge and his erudition. In 1766 he was one of the founders of the "Maatschappij der Nederlandsche Letterkunde" (Association of Dutch Literature), which still exists. He published a large number of translations of theological books. The following sermons were published by Schagen: De Messias Uitgeroeit (Amsterdam, 1735, reprinted 1736, enlarged edition Haarlem, 1739); "Drie Proeven van Aenmerkingen over den Lastbrief aen de Efezische Kerk" in Vols. II, IV, and VI of Leerzame Verlosting; Kerkrede over het oude geloof en 't goede geweten (Utrecht, 1742); 't Genadeloon der welaengelegde Twee Talenten, a funeral sermon for his son Petrus Schagen (q.v.) (Haarlem, 1755), Vryheid en zuivere Godsdienst (Haarlem-Amsterdam-Utrecht, 1762), De Muziek in der openbaeren godsdienst gewettigd. Predicatie by de inwijding van het eerste kerkorgel in de Doopsgezinde Kerk te Utrecht (Utrecht, 1771), Het eerst Kapittel van Joëls Profetie verklaert en op 's Lands Toestand gepast, six sermons (Haarlem, 1745). De Heilige Week of Nieuw Avondmaalsboekje (Haarlem, 1753) is a devotional book. Schagen tried to elevate catechetical instruction by writing and publishing some manuals: Korte Schrifuurlyke Stellingen tot onderwys der Doopsgezinde Geloofsleerlingen (Alkmaar, 1738, repr. Haarlem, 1751), Voorbereidende Overdenkingen tot het Ontfangen van den H. Doop (n.p., n.d.), Eenvoudige Handleiding tot de Algemeene Waerheden van het Christendom (Alkmaar, 1741), and Aanhangzel over de Byzondere Leerstukken des Geloofs, welke de Doopsgezinden handhaven (n.p., 1743).

But Schagen's special interest in study was church history. In this field he published a book on the Waldenses, Historie der Christenen, die men gemeenlyk Waldensen noemt tot den Jaere 1200 (Amsterdam-Haarlem, 1732, repr. 1765, 1769), and two apologetical books on the Dutch Mennonites: De Kerk der Nederlandsche Doops-gezinden in derzelver Reformatie vertoont, three sermons (Haarlem, 1743), and De Reformatie der Nederlandsche Doops-gezinden, en deselve met de Kerkhervorming in't gemeen tegen alle Bezwaering verdedigt (Haarlem, 1744). A book which is still of great value is the translation by Schagen of S. F. Rues' Aufrichtige Nachrichten von dem gegenwärtigen Zustande der Mennoniten oder Taufgesinnten wie auch der Collegianten oder Reinsburger in den vereinigten Niederlanden (Jena, 1743), which with numerous notes and corrections by Schagen was published under the title Tegenwoordige Staet der Doopsgezinden of Mennoniten in de Vereenigde Nederlanden (en) een Berigt van de Rynsburgers of Collegianten (Amsterdam, 1745). The additions by Schagen give the translation superiority over the original edition. In 1745 Schagen published a bibliography containing the names of Mennonite authors and their books with exact annotations, mentioning all reprints. Of this valuable book, entitled Naamlijst der Doopsgezinde Schryver en schriften van 1539-1745 (Amsterdam, 1745), the Amsterdam Mennonite Library has a copy, in which Schagen himself annotated new editions and reprints published after 1745.

Schagen possessed a rich library of Mennonite books including many rare editions, which he bequeathed to the congregation of Utrecht; the catalogue of this library numbers 72 pages. In 1834 the books were sold for 250 Dutch guilders to the Amsterdam Mennonite library, where they are at present. The Amsterdam Mennonite archives also contain a handwritten copy of a sermon by Schagen on Matt. 22:31-32 and also a number of historical annotations made by himself, including the manuscript of his translation of Rues' book. vDZ.

Schagen, Petrus (Pieter), b. about 1725 at Amsterdam, d. Nov. 11, 1753, at Westzaan, was a son of Marten Schagen (q.v.). He studied medicine, obtaining his M.D. degree at Utrecht in 1747; he then studied theology at the Amsterdam Lamist Seminary in 1747-51. From 1751 until his early death he served as preacher in the Frisian congregation of Westzaan-Zuid, practicing medicine at the same time. Petrus Schagen was one of the last of the many Dutch ministers who combined the ministry with a medical practice. He published a few medical studies and a treatise in Latin on earthquakes (1747). His theological-philosophical tract Oratio de Summo Bono was published at Haarlem, 1741. After his death his father edited five of his sermons: De Natuur en Zalige gevolgen van't ware Christelijke Leven (Haarlem, 1755), together with a funeral sermon, which Marten Schagen preached in commemoration of his son at Westzaan on Dec. 16, 1753, entitled 't Genadeloon der welaengelegde Twee Talenten. Schäkowitz (Schackowitz, Schakowic), a Bruderhof of the Hutterian Brethren one-half mile south of Auspitz, Moravia, the Hutterite center; it was founded in 1533. The region was at that time the possession of the barons of Lipa-Kromau. In 1535, at the outbreak of persecution in Moravia, the Brethren were driven from the houses they had just recently built; for a long time they were compelled to camp with their children and their sick on the site of the desolate village of Starnitz (identical with Starlitz?, q.v.) near Tracht on the Thaya, on Liechtenstein territory.

In 1582 the Brethren bought the Bruderhof at Schäkowitz for the third time. On July 12, 1605, it was burned down by Hungarian troops; two brethren were also killed. In 1609 the school was transferred to Gostel (q.v.). In October 1622 the Brethren were driven out of Schäkowitz, with the loss of all their property. They settled in Hungary and Transylvania. Schantz, Peter (1853-1924), an outstanding leader in the Central Mennonite Conference, was born at Congerville, Ill., April 14, 1853, the son of Jacob Schantz, an immigrant from Hesse-Darmstadt, Germany, in 1847. He became an orphan at the age of twelve and was reared in the home of Christian Imhoff, a minister. In 1872 he was baptized in the North Danvers church, in 1875 married Anna Kinsinger, the daughter of Michael Kinsinger, locating on the Kinsinger farm in 1877, then living on a farm in the White Oak district in 1892 until 1910, when he moved to Normal, Ill. He died there on July 24, 1924. He was ordained preacher at North Danvers in 1892, and in 1900 as bishop. He was secretary of the Mission Board c1907-16, and field secretary of the conference 1916-21. He was a man of vision and a good organizer, and did much in church extension work. Next to Joseph Stuckey he was the most important leader of the conference, and was followed by Emanuel Troyer in that capacity, the three men being the real fathers of the conference. H.S.B.

Scharfenberg together with Landau and the Sperlingsdorfer Bruch, in the Danzig Werder, West Prussia, were colonized by Dutch farmers as early as 1547. At least the second generation of settlers were Mennonites, the family names of Jantzen, Philippsen, Peters, and Giesebrecht, soon also those of Andres and Froese being predominant. If it may be assumed—as is probable—that the first generation of settlers were Mennonites from the Netherlands, this area was the first settlement of Mennonites in Prussia. vDZ.

Scharnschlager, Leupold (Leupold der Seifensieder), d. 1563, an Anabaptist elder who belonged to the Brotherhood of Marpeck (q.v.), a native of Tirol, Austria, where he owned an estate at Hopfgarten near Kitzbühel. His wife Anna probably belonged to a prominent family. Her father, Konrad Honigler, stemmed from Hall in Tirol, her mother Margaret Rieper, from Gossenass at the southern foot of the Brenner. A brother of her mother, Dr. Johannes Rieper, was the deacon and cathedral provost in Brixen, and there were other clergymen in her relationship. Her sister Veronica was married to Hans Steger, a judge and later clerk in Kitzbühel. Anna's first husband was Gallus Steger, the brother of this judge, upon whose death she married Scharnschlager. One daughter, Ursula, is mentioned, born about 1510; it is not known whether of the first or second marriage.

About 1530 Scharnschlager united with the Anabaptists and had to leave his home with his wife and daughter. His estate was confiscated in March 1531. They fled directly to Strasbourg (q.v.), probably invited by their compatriot Marpeck, who had been expelled from Tirol in 1528. Scharnschlager lived and worked in Strasbourg in 1530-34, but his activity in the Anabaptist cause extended as far as Speyer, where he baptized a certain Kaspar Schuhmacher (q.v.) as early as 1530, who, however, recanted. About this matter he wrote a letter to Michael Leubel (q.v.), an Anabaptist of Speyer, in 1532. The doctrinal portions of the letter, dealing with original sin and baptism, already contain the ideas found in the books he and Marpeck wrote together in 1542-48. The Anabaptists who were expelled from Speyer, Hans "the Servant" (Knecht) and Margareth "the maid," had free access to his home. At Christmas of 1532 Thomas Adolf, a citizen of Speyer, visited him and desired to be baptized by him or Pilgram Marpeck. Marpeck had, however, been expelled from the city earlier that year, and Scharnschlager had been forbidden to perform baptisms for the time being, and so

Thomas Adolf had to return without having his purpose fulfilled, taking with him the letter to Michael Leubel (the original of which is in the state archives of Speyer, Fasc. 492). A confession made by Thomas Adolf before the court in Speyer on Jan. 8, 1533, reveals that Leopold Scharnschlager is identical with Leupold der Seifensieder (the Soap-maker), whom Melchior Hofmann (q.v.) called an opponent in his trial on May 29, 1533 ("who was opposed to him in the principal doctrine"). Whether Scharnschlager actually practiced soapmaking is not known; Thomas Adolf said he had not seen him at his work.

Scharnschlager's daughter Ursula married a clockmaker, Hans Felix, in Strasbourg, whom Scharnschlager names in his letter to Leubel; he sends greetings from "Hans Uhrmacher," who had visited him at various times in Speyer. The young couple must have gone to Moravia soon after; in 1533 the mother wrote to her brother that her daughter had married a clockmaker two years before; "they are at present in Moravia." A letter from the son-in-law dated Austerlitz, Oct. 28 or 29, 1538, indicates that he had been converted to the Anabaptists by Scharnschlager, probably in Strasbourg.

The Strasbourg Täuferakten contain Scharnschlager's moving appeal which Scharnschlager made to the city council for freedom of religion when he was expelled in 1534. This document clearly shows that Scharnschlager was well acquainted with the major literature of the early Reformation. He brilliantly points out the inconsistencies between the early position of the Reformers and the course of the Reformation at that time. In many respects the appeal to the council reminds one of Marpeck's dealings with the council only two years before. Where Scharnschlager went from Strasbourg is not known, but no doubt both he and Marpeck lived a transient existence in the Grisons and the Augsburg area. Around 1540 Marpeck was already in Augsburg, and since he and Scharnschlager together published a revised and translated form of the Rothmann Bekentnisse in South Germany in 1542, it seems logical to assume that he lived in South Germany during this time. No evidence of a sojourn at Augsburg has been published to date.

Hans Felix in his letter of 1538 twice said that his parents-in-law were living "oben," whence he himself had come to Moravia, but they could not stay there either. It is possible that he meant Strasbourg (Schiess thinks it means Tirol, and ten Doornkaat-Koolman, South Germany in general). In the ensuing years at any rate Scharnschlager was no doubt close to Marpeck, who was living in Augsburg. Here they worked at the Vermanung, which was published in 1542. The book names as its authors "the believing comrades of the covenant and of the suffering that is in Christ." Pilgram Marpeck is regarded as the principal composer; Caspar Schwenckfeld, however, speaks at one place of two "scriben-ten," doubtless referring to Scharnschlager in addition to Pilgram Marpeck. At another place Schwenckfeld says that he had less to do with Leupold than with Pilgram. Scharnschlager is also named as the second of the coauthors of the Verant- wortung, the first part of which was completed in 1544 and the second in 1546. The striking similarity of doctrine concerning baptism and original sin in this book and in Scharnschlager's letter of 1532 indicates that he took a major part in drafting the work. It is in the first place the teaching, also accepted by Luther, that in baptism the inner cannot be separated from the outer, and in the second place the specifically Anabaptist idea that children "before the use of reason have no sin but the inherited weakness, which does not endanger their salvation until it breaks out into actual sin. Therefore baptism was not instituted for them." In the Verantwortung this teaching is based on an otherwise unknown point of doctrine held by the Brethren of Moravia, which Scharnschlager may have learned from his son-in-law. It is not definitely known whether Scharnschlager stayed in Moravia for a time.

From 1546 on Scharnschlager and his wife were at Ilanz in Grisons. They were probably compelled to flee from Bavaria, where, according to a note left by his wife, they had to pay a fine of 40 guilders. For nearly two decades they were able to live unmolested in Ilanz. Scharnschlager turned his knowledge to account by teaching the youth of Ilanz, and his wife restored contact with her home in Tirol and tried to regain her former property. On occasion their son-in-law visited them; during his stay Scharnschlager repaired the village clock and "bietzte," as a witness of that time testified. They renewed their connections with Moravia and Upper Germany, and Scharnschlager again placed his energy at the disposal of the brethren. From a letter of reply written by Valentin Werner, one of the younger coauthors of the Verantwortung, dated Augsburg, Aug. 26, 1559, it is known that Scharnschlager was at that time the leader of an Anabaptist congregation in Grisons. Werner's letter, which has been preserved attached to the Zürich copy of the manuscript of the Verantwortung, acknowledges the " manifold trouble and work" Scharnschlager had in making a copy of the Verantwortung, and also mentions another of Scharnschlager's writings, "Vom gericht," for which the brethren in Augsburg sent their "cotestimony" (mitzeugnus); "please accept them in the love of Christ, for which love may you continue to serve us in one thing and another, and lead us as a father with the treasure and riches entrusted to you by the Lord where need requires it and love constrains you, though to put too heavy a burden on your old age is not our intention."

The regard of the brethren for Scharnschlager throughout his life and beyond is revealed by a letter written by Wernhard Riepl from Klein-Teschau on Feb. 15, 1571, which has been preserved in the Olomuce manuscript of the Verantwortung. In this letter Riepl tells of dissension among the brethren Adam and Uhrmacher and others "on account of the Holy Scripture and the dead letter, through which spirit and life come." To settle the question Riepl called a number of the brethren together and presented to them an explanation of the matter in one of Scharnschlager's writings, known as the Unterscheid. It may have been the well-known Recent studies in South German Anabaptism (Kiwiet, Bergsten, Herbert Klassen, William Klassen) indicate that Scharnschlager must be given a place of greater importance in the total movement. The discovery of the Kunstbuch has shown that he was regarded as an elder (so he often signs his letters, while Marpeck never uses the term to refer to himself) and that he had an important place in the brotherhood. Of the 42 epistles and tracts in the Kunstbuch, six were written by Scharnschlager, while one was written by Marpeck to him (#27, dated 1545, "Concerning the Inheritance of Sin"). Of these six, two deal specifically with questions of church order, one (#19) being a brief church order divided into seven articles dealing with (1) the importance of continuing to meet as a church, (2) the place of leadership in the church, (3) the care of the poor, (4) the support of the ministry, (5) the true community of goods (he rejects the enforced communism of the Hutterites, and advocates a common fund), (6) church discipline, (7) doctrine, baptism, and the Lord's Supper, in which apostolic practice and Christ's order is to be observed. This church order, unfortunately, is without a date, but its polemic against enforced community of goods indicates that it was written after 1535. While there are some similarities to the church order of Leonhard Schiemer (q.v.), they are not so striking as to indicate direct borrowing.

The second writing dealing with church order is entitled "General Admonition and Reminder to the Edification of the Body of Christ" (#20). It is also without date, and no destination is given. The tone of this epistle indicates the fervor with which Scharnschlager worked for the Anabaptist church. It deals first of all with the lukewarmness creeping into many Anabaptist congregations where man and wife have actually joined the church, but take little interest in the affairs of the church. Related to this is his criticism of many of the Brethren who were more concerned about getting rich and leaving a large inheritance for their children than about taking the cross of Christ seriously. Next Scharnschlager deals with the attitude of those who refuse to submit to brotherly admonition, hiding behind the excuse that everyone has faults. He rejects this, saying that all submit to brotherly admonition according to the Scriptures. Finally he deals with the problems of marriage. Many are marrying because of the desire to be rich; others marry "outsiders" and then do not remain true to the Anabaptist cause. Some even justify their marriage because they desire to be strengthened in their faith by their partner, but Scharnschlager insists that marriage must remain on a Pauline basis. This epistle is one of the clearest indications that Anabaptism was moving from its early days to the second generation when the dynamic thrust of the early movement had to be consolidated into living and continuing congregations.

Another short tract by Scharnschlager bears the title "Whether a Christian May Be a Government Official," and it too is without date or destination.

It covers only two leaves, and is clearly written as a reply to questions about Scharnschlager's position. He replies that the important thing is whether one is living according to the will of Christ, and that a distinction be made between the realm of Christ and that of the world. In supporting his argument he appeals to the booklet by Michael Sattler (q.v.), whom he mentions by name, and then quotes the article from the Schleithem Confession which deals with this subject. This quotation by a prominent South German elder of a Schleithem article indicates that it is risky to drive a wedge between the Anabaptists who drew up the Schleithem articles (calling them the Swiss Brethren) and the South Germans. There is no evidence that the Marpeck Brotherhood was critical of Schleithem at any time, even though there were tensions between the Marpeck Brotherhood and some "Swiss Brethren."

Another epistle, dated May 24, 1544, is an epistle of comfort, directed to Martin Blaichner (q.v.) when he was driven out of Chur by persecution. He acknowledges Martin's letter and then comforts the recipients of the letter in their affliction. Tribulation is the very nature of the Christian faith and is a test of being a true son of God. He supports this with a number of quotations from the Bible and one from the book of Judith. He asks them to read this epistle to the church, especially to the sisters, and to preserve this epistle for him, since he failed to make a copy of it.

Another epistle dealing with the same theme (#30) has no date or destination. It deals with the strong temptation to yield a little here and there and in that way to avoid persecution. This temptation must be rejected, says Scharnschlager, and he admonishes his readers to remain faithful, comparing their persecutions with those which the earlier Anabaptists had to endure. In this letter he mentions the epistle written to Martin Blaichner, hence it must have been written after May 24, 1544.

While the above writings all deal with church order or intend to strengthen the brotherhood for tribulation, Scharnschlager's only extant theological treatise bears the title, "A Report on True Faith and Common Salvation in Christ" (#32). It is the longest of all his writings in the Kunstbuch, extending from folio 254a to 263b. This epistle (according to a marginal note) was directed to the Anabaptists in Alsace, but is without date or place of composition. Its contents include also an admonition to remain faithful in assembling and a discussion of the two types of nourishment that Christians need, physical and spiritual bread. The heart of this epistle deals with the nature and importance of faith. It is through faith that we live, says Scharnschlager (quoting Romans), and not through external works, as certain of the Swiss (Anabaptists) insist. This reference to "certain of the Swiss" is the only indication in all the writings of Scharnschlager of a critical attitude to some Swiss Anabaptists. Apparently he did not disagree with them to the same extent as Marpeck. Faith consists basically of two things: (1) faith in the death of Christ Jesus, the Son of God, which results in forgiveness and the appeasement of the wrath of God; (2) faith in the future kingdom of God with its heavenly essence and glory. External works can spring up only from this faith, which is a living active work and which only Christ can give. This faith is not a dead, historic (historisch) faith, but rather a living union with Christ, as James saw clearly when he wrote his epistle. It is apparent that Scharnschlager is here in conversation with both Schwenckfeld, who accused the Anabaptists of being tied to a "historisch" faith, and the Lutheran group which had little use for James. After a definition of faith, Scharnschlager defines the result of such a faith. These results are atonement and a clearer perspective on this world, since it gives one an inner eye to see beyond the earthly to the heavenly essence. This separates one from the love for creatures, and results in the true "Gelassenheit of which also the Theologia Deutsch and the Imitation of Christ write." This reference to the booklet about the Nachfolge Christi indicates again that Scharnschlager was well read, and it may be that he supplied the references to the Theologia Deutsch in the Verantwortung (q.v.). In the rest of the epistle he deals with the themes of love, good works, and the strength of this kind of faith. It was to help his readers to withstand the Papists, Lutherans, Zwinglians, and even the false Anabaptists. The epistle closes with an admonition to be obedient to the elders and to support the "Vorsteher" so that the latter would not have any lack or need to spend their time trying to earn a living to the neglect of the cause of the church.

It is apparent from this that Scharnschlager must be considered as an important South German leader. He was much more than merely an assistant to Marpeck; they were no doubt equals in every sense of the word. The epistle which Marpeck wrote to Scharnschlager (Kunstbuch #27) indicates clearly the intimate relationship between them, and there is no evidence of friction. In this letter Marpeck mentions a previous letter he had written to Leupold, and discourses at length about the many false servants of Christ abroad. The reason he does so is that the brethren in Moravia have written him about the divisions and deceptions taking place there. May the Lord protect us, he adds.

If an attempt must be made to say what is distinctively Scharnschlager's in the literature of the Marpeck Brotherhood, a comparison must be made on the basis of Scharnschlager's letters in the Kunstbuch with the other writings. This would reveal that Scharnschlager's insistence on the union of the inner and outer (a powerful weapon against spiritualism), whether it be in baptism or in his view of the Word of God, no doubt helped Marpeck's Brotherhood to overcome the arguments of Schwenckfeld. Any attempt to analyze differences between Marpeck and Scharnschlager is, however, futile, because in their writings we have what Horst Quiring first called a type of "Gemeindetheologie." In this type of thought individualism is replaced by a corporate search for truth, especially as this truth is revealed in God's Word.

The Ausbund (No. 57) preserves a hymn by Scharnschlager. It is a song in praise of love (I Cor. 13) and has seven stanzas (printed in Wackernagel III, No. 519).

Scharnschlager died in Ilanz in 1563. His wife lived a few years longer, but was in poor health and sent a messenger for her daughter, who, after the death of Uhrmacher, had married a weaver named Stoffel Krieger, and requested her to come with her husband to care for her and to receive the inheritance. But she did not see her daughter again, for she died in that year. The daughter also died soon afterwards in Moravia. The inheritance, probably considerable, was given to grandsons of Scharnschlager in March 1566 by the court of Ilanz. We owe many a bit of information about Scharnschlager to the lawsuit caused by the false claims made on the estate by a carpenter. G.H., W.K.L.

Schartner, a family name among the Mennonites of Prussia, spread to Russia and America. The first member of the family to join the Mennonites was Friedrich Schartner, who during the 18th century left Königsberg to avoid conscription. A widower, he married Maria Jantz, a Mennonite, at which time he joined the Mennonite church in the village of Karolswalde, Volhynia, Polish Russia. Four of his thirteen children became ministers. His oldest son, Johann Schartner (q.v.), went to Russia and served as minister of the Alexanderwohl Mennonite Church (q.v.). His son Gerhard Schartner is an educator and minister among the Fernheim Mennonites in Paraguay. In 1874 the family was transplanted to South Dakota during the migration of the Mennonites to America. Friedrich Schartner (1842-1916) was a leader of this group. He and his son Jacob F. Schartner served as ministers of this group. Representatives of this family, small in number, are found primarily in South Dakota and Russia. C.K.

Schartner, Johann (1827-1912), a Russian Mennonite elder, was born at Karolswalde, Volhynia, Polish Russia, on Aug. 22, 1827, a son of Friedrich Schartner. He was ordained to the ministry at Karolswalde in 1852. Before or at the time of the great migration of the Polish Mennonites to America Schartner went to the Molotschna (q.v.) settlement in Russia, where after the exodus of the Alexanderwohl congregation he was elected elder of the newly organized church in 1877. As elder he frequently visited the Mennonites of Poland, particularly those who had been left without a minister. His contribution lay in his knowledge of the Bible, Christian sincerity, and a brotherly and tolerant attitude in matters of congregational life. He was first married to a Becker and later to Elisabeth Schmidt. To the first marriage twelve and to the second eleven children were born. He died at Landskrone, Molotschna, on Aug. 12, 1912. C.K.

Scharwoude. Noord- and Zuid-Scharwoude are two small villages a few miles north of Alkmaar in the Dutch province of North Holland. There was some Anabaptist activity here in 1534-35. Reinier Brunt (q.v.), an attorney-general of the Court of Holland, adopted harsh measures against the Anabaptists at Scharwoude in the spring of 1535, demolishing the house of the widow of Jan Zyboetszoon, probably because Anabaptist meetings had been held in it. In 1541 a few Anabaptists of Zuid-Scharwoude escaped their persecutors by flight. There was later no congregation at Scharwoude; the Mennonites living here joined the congregation of neighboring Langendijk (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 240; DB 1909, 15.) vdZ.

Schelben, a shoemaker of Schlicht in the Upper Palatinate, Bavaria, Germany, was considered as belonging to the Anabaptists with his wife and children. For seven years, says the court record, this family "partook of communion only in the spirit when they broke bread at home with their children, because Christ's body and blood were in heaven, and with us only in the spirit." They were expelled in 1535. On May 23, 1534, the Count Palatine had ordered this mild penalty "for this sect without loss of life." There were only isolated Anabaptists in the Upper Palatinate. W.W.

Schellenberg (Schellenburg, Schöllenberg, Schellingburg, Schellenberger), a Mennonite family name found in Switzerland, Germany, Russia, and America. It is a German family name that first occurs in Liechtenstein, and appears in the early Middle Ages in the records of Bavaria, Württemberg, and Upper Franconia. Early in the 14th century a branch of the family settled in Switzerland. The American "Schellenbergers" are of Swiss origin and are traceable to Johannes Schellenberger, who arrived in Philadelphia on the Pennsylvania Merchant on Sept. 11, 1732. A branch of the family also migrated from Emmenthal, canton of Bern, Switzerland, to join the Anabaptists of the Netherlands, and its descendants later migrated to Prussia and Russia. The Alexanderwohl church record names a Tobias Schellenberger, who was a refugee from Moravia and joined the Przechovka Mennonite Church in Prussia in 1634. His son, who remained with the Mennonites, had no male offspring. The name appeared as early as the 17th century in Danzig, Tiegenhagen, and Rosenort. Among the Mennonites of this name migrating to Russia were Anton, Aron, Bernhard, Georg, Gerhard, Jakob, Johann, and Paul Schellenberg.

Prominent leaders of the Mennonite Brethren Church were Abraham Schellenberg (q.v.), Abraham L. Schellenberg (q.v.), and David Schellenberg (q.v.). Töws lists Johann J. Schellenberg, who was killed during the Revolution, as an M.B. minister in Russia. J. G. Rempel lists Wilhelm Schellenberg as a minister of Russia and Canada, Peter P. Schellenberg, minister in Coaldale, Alberta, and B. J. Schellenberg as an educator. Who's Who Among the Mennonites lists Peter E. Schellenberg, professor of psychology, former president of Tabor College, who since 1957 has been dean of Bethel College, and Theodore R. Schellenberg, Assistant Archivist of the United States National Archives, Washington, D.C. A Schellenberg of Saskatoon, Sask., is the founder of the O. K. Economy grocery chain. Some of his sons have changed their name to Shelly.

Schellenberg, Abraham (1845-1920), an elder and outstanding leader of the Mennonite Brethren Church, was born in the village of Halbstadt, Molotschna Mennonite settlement, South Russia, on Aug. 29, 1845. His father was a calico dyer. In Abraham's early life his parents lived in Tiegerweide and Tiege. At the age of fifteen he began to work in his father's shop. He married Katharina Lohrenz on Feb. 25, 1868, and they established their home in Tiegerweide. They had seven children. In 1864 Schellenberg was converted and baptized the following summer. He soon became active in his home church at Rückenau, where he was elected minister in 1869 and elder 1875. Until 1879 he was a very influential minister and leader of the Mennonite Brethren Church in Russia, traveling extensively and preaching very effectively in all of its congregations.

In the spring of 1879 Schellenberg emigrated with his family to America and settled on a farm southwest of Moundridge, Kan. In 1884 his first wife died. He married Suzanna Flaming on Feb. 17, 1885. To them twelve children were born.

Elder Schellenberg was very active in the M.B. Church from his arrival in America until his death. He was at once chosen as the pastor of the newly organized Ebenezer M.B. Church east of Buhler and served for thirty years. Under his ministry this congregation developed into one of the strongest of the M.B. Conference. Elder Schellenberg filled a very important role in the M.B. Conference. In the two decades 1880-1900 he was elected moderator eighteen times. He served much as an itinerating minister, being a gifted public speaker and Bible expositor. He was one of the first of the M.B. leaders to urge foreign missions and was chairman of the Foreign Mission Board for many years. His oldest daughter, Dr. Katharina L. Schellenberg, became the first medical missionary of the M.B.

Church. Schellenberg took a leading part in establishing the mission endowment fund for the support of its foreign missions.

Among the other phases of Conference work in which Schellenberg had an important part was that of publication. He urged the establishing of its church organ, the Zionsbote, and advocated the establishing of a Conference publishing house. His oldest son, A. L. Schellenberg, carried out this plan and served as its manager for many years. Schellenberg also contributed valuably to the cause of education in the M.B. Church. Largely through his influence the Conference established a German Department School in conjunction with McPherson College, McPherson, Kan., in 1898. He later also encouraged the establishment of Tabor College and faithfully supported this institution.

In 1907 Schellenberg moved with his family to Escondido, Cal., where he organized an M.B. Church and served as its pastor until 1915. He then returned to Kansas, and after living on his farm four years, retired to Buhler, until his death April 11, 1920. He was interred in the Ebenezer M.B. cemetery east of Buhler. J.H.L.

Schellenberg, Abraham L. (1869-1941), editor and publishing house manager of the Mennonite Brethren Church, was born in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement, South Russia, May 30, 1869, the oldest child of Elder Abraham and Katharina (Lohrenz) Schellenberg. When he was ten years of age, the family moved to America and settled on a farm southwest of Moundridge, Kan. Here Abraham grew up and received his early schooling. Later he attended school at McPherson College and at Rochester, N.Y. He taught in country schools in the vicinity of Buhler, Kan., for twelve years. He was converted in 1897 and joined the Ebenezer M.B. Church east of Buhler. On Feb. 27, 1898, he married Sarah Schroeder. To them ten children were born. In 1907, when the M.B. Publishing House was transferred to McPherson from Medford, Okla., Schellenberg became manager of the M.B. publishing work and editor of the church organ, the Zionsbote. He served the Conference as business manager of the Publishing House and editor of the Zionsbote 1907-19 and again 1923-29, a total of 19 years. In 1913 he built the M.B. Publishing House at Hillsboro, Kan., to which the publishing work was then transferred. He also edited and published Der Deutsche Westen while at McPherson, and the Hillsboro Vorwaerts 1913-29.

Schellenberg served the M.B. General Conference as its secretary 1907-15. He was deeply interested in the educational activities of his church and served for some time as chairman of the Board of Directors of Tabor College. While living at Littlefield, Tex., 1919-23, he was engaged in farming. After retiring from the publishing work in 1929 he settled on a farm at Coldwater, Tex., where he also served the M.B. Church as minister. He died at Hooker, Okla., April 11, 1941, and was interred in the M.B. cemetery east of Buhler.† J.H.L.

Schellenberg, David (1852-1919), a Mennonite Brethren elder in Russia, was born in Neukirch, Molotschna, Sept. 13, 1852, the son of Abram and Maria Pauls Schellenberg. He supplemented his elementary education with extensive reading. In 1879 he married Lena Enns, a daughter of Daniel and Maria Peters Enns. Four children were born to this union. His wife died in 1903, and in the following year he married Sara Koop (nee Klassen). After years of Sunday-school teaching he was called to the ministry at the age of 24 and ordained on April 15, 1878. When his older brother, Elder Abraham Schellenberg, left Russia on May 15, 1879, to emigrate to America, he took a part of his church with him and David Schellenberg was elected as elder of the remainder on April 14, 1881, and ordained to the office on May 23, 1882.

P. M. Friesen pays the following tribute to David Schellenberg: "The elder was modest and wise and gladly recognized the talents of others. Many blessings accompanied the earlier part of David Schellenberg's eldership. This changed however later, until circumstances developed in 1909 which brought the office of elder in Rückenau to a standstill." The leadership was henceforth given to a church council. The last ten years of his life were spent in quiet but in full fellowship with his church. His funeral was held on March 3, 1919, when the Molotschna settlement was overrun by the Machno bands.

B. B. Janz, a contemporary of David Schellenberg, in consultation with other contemporaries, wrote a biography in the German, of which the above is an abbreviated translation.

Schellinger, a Mennonite family, now extinct, found at Amsterdam, Holland, in the 17th and 18th centuries; they were usually ironmongers and in the 18th century came to great prosperity. Some members of this family belonged to the Old Frisian (Arke Noach) Mennonites at Amsterdam, among whom was Abraham Pieters Schellinger, who was a preacher of this church 1718-d.66. Members of the family were found in the Jan-Jacobsz, Lamist, Zonist, and (in the 17th century) Waterlander congregations. A few members of this family were warmly interested in the Hershutter (q.v., Moravian) Brotherhood and some joined them at Zeist, as did Jacob Schellinger (b. 1706) and his brother Cornelis. Both were members of the Amsterdam Lamist church and were won over to the Hershutter by Johannes Deknatel (q.v.), the Lamist minister, who was a warm friend of the Hershutters. Jacob married Magdalena Beuning, and Cornelis married Sophia Centen; both women were Mennonites. In 1736 Jacob Schellinger provided the money for the purchase of a tract of land near IJsselstein in the Dutch province of Utrecht, where a suitable building was then erected for the Hershutter colony, which was named 's Heerendyk. In 1745, 's Heerendyk having become too small, Cornelis Schellinger bought a manor with a large area of land at Zeist near Utrecht (for 155,000 guilders). He also contributed generously to the furnishing of the manor at Zeist, to which the Brethren now moved from 's Heerendyk. Cornelis Schellinger and his family lived for a number of years in a wing of this castle; Jacob Schellinger and other families lived here temporarily. Count Zinzendorf (q.v.) also lived there for some time; his eldest daughter was married in the castle chapel, which had also been built largely by Cornelis Schellinger's contributions. About 1749 discord arose between Cornelis Schellinger and Count Zinzendorf. In 1752 the former was involved in the financial difficulties of the Hershutter group; in 1767 after some disappointment he sold the castle and most of the other property to Count von Dohna, Zinzendorf's son-in-law, and left Zeist, without, however, entirely leaving the Hershutters. vdZ.

Schellingwou (Schellinckwou), Jan Jansz (not to be confused with the Anabaptist leader Jan van Schellingwou, q.v.), was in the early 17th century a Waterlander preacher (congregation unknown) in the Dutch province of Friesland. In 1610 he and some other Waterlander preachers and elders, e.g., Hans Matthysen (Matthijs, q.v.), Dirk Doedes, Ane Anes, and Yeme de Ringh (q.v.), opposed the plan of the Waterlander congregation of Amsterdam to merge with the English (Brownist) church of John Smyth (q.v.). Schellinkhout, near Hoorn in the Dutch province of North Holland, was formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation, of whose origin and history very little is known. It belonged to the Frisian branch and died out or merged with Hoorn before 1700. (Blauput t. C., Holland I, 251; II, 45.) vdZ.

Schelte Aedelezoon, an Anabaptist martyr, from Friesland, Netherlands, was burned at the stake at Leeuwarden, the capital of Friesland, on May 13, 1553, because he was rebaptized, opposed the Roman Catholic sacrament of the Mass, saying "that all that is done in the (Catholic) church is idolatry." He refused to recant and died loyally for his faith. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, No. 746.) vdZ.

Scheltema, a Mennonite family, from the 16th century found at Harlingen and from the 18th century at Franeker, both in the Dutch province of Friesland, where they were engaged in business. A descendant of this family in the female line was Jan Jansen Agricola (1658-94), of Franeker, who later also took the family name of Scheltema. He was a merchant and a preacher of the Franeker Mennonite congregation. His son and further descendants joined the Reformed Church. One branch of this family has taken the family name of Scheltema de Heere. Elder Jan Jacobsz (q.v.), who according to tradition was a son of Jacob de Heere, may have been a son of a Jacob whose great-grandson took the name of Scheltema. (Ned. Patriciaat XXVII, 1941, 208-81.) vdZ.

Schenck van Tautenburg, George (d. Feb. 2, 1540, at Vollenhove, Netherlands), was a German nobleman, who was a stadholder of Emperor Charles V (q.v.), governing the province of Friesland in 1524-40. Being a convinced Catholic, he fought Sacra-mentism and Anabaptism with all his power. He personally led the attack on the cloister of Bloemcamp (Oldeklooster, q.v.) near Bolsward in March 1535, which had been taken by revolutionary Anabaptists some days before. During Schenck's government, besides those who had participated in the Oldeklooster uprising, all of whom were put to death, 19 Anabaptists were executed whose names are known; the number of anonymous Anabaptist martyrs in Friesland during his rule is estimated at about 80.

In 1534 Schenck, as a confidential agent of the emperor, negotiated with Franz von Waldeck, Bishop of Münster, Westphalia; the emperor wished to have the territory of the bishopric added to his dominion. Though the negotiations were strictly secret, something of the imperial plans became known and were opposed by the Protestant princes in Germany, particularly Philip of Hesse. Schenck also seems to have dealt with Jan van Geelen (q.v.) the ambassador of Jan van Leyden, in order to acquire the city of Münster for the emperor. voZ.

Schenk, a Mennonite family found at Wormerveer, Dutch province of North Holland, since the 16th century, and formerly belonging to the Frisian congregation. In the 18th century some members of this family were adherents of the Collegiant (q.v.) movement, particularly Jan Gerrit Schenk (d. June 25, 1760, at Wormerveer), who in 1726-52 repeatedly addressed the Collegiant meetings at their center at Rijsburg (q.v.). He also contributed liberally to the building of the large brick baptismal tub at Rijsburg in 1736 (for baptism by immersion as practiced by the Collegiants) and bequeathed 40,000 Dutch guilders to the general fund of the Collegiants for the maintenance of the buildings at Rijsburg. voZ.

Schermerhorn, a hamlet in the Dutch province of North Holland, formerly situated beside Lake Schermer, which was reclaimed in 1632-35. A Waterlander congregation existing here sent delegates to the Waterlander conference at Amsterdam March 4-7, 1581. A letter of 1673 mentions the congregation of (Groot) Schermer, which probably means Schermerhorn. There is no further information about this congregation; it very probably died out or merged with a neighboring congregation soon after, at least before 1700. voZ.

Schertz, a Mennonite family name of Swiss origin, found in the Palatinate after 1664. In 1940 twenty-two persons bearing the Schertz name were members of the Ixheim-Saar Mennonite Church in South Germany. A Johann Heinrich Schertz, possibly Amish, arrived in Philadelphia in 1742. Some 19th-century Amish Schertz immigrants settled in Butler County, Ohio, but more of them located in central Illinois, where most of the Mennonite Schertzes are found today. Over 75 per cent of the obituaries of members of the Schertz family in Mennonite periodicals are from Illinois. Among the early Amish immigrants arriving in Illinois were David Schertz and his father, who settled in Tazewell County near Peoria, in 1831, and whose descendants were found largely in the Metamora congregation. Harry Weber (History of the Mennonites in Illinois) refers to more than twenty individual members of the Schertz family. Among the Illinois Mennonite (MC) ministers have been Peter D. Schertz (1848-1928), Christian S. Schertz (1851-1937), and Henry R. Schertz (1886-1954), bishop of the Metamora Mennonite Church (q.v.). M.G.

Scheuten, Mennonite family of Crefeld, named from the farm "uf der Schutten" in the parish of München-Gladbach. Daem (Adam) Scheuten (1607-18) came to Crefeld in 1654, became a citizen there in 1679; he was a dealer in linen. As lay preachers of the Crefeld congregation mention should be made of his son Adam (1639-68) and his grandson Leonard Ewalds (d. 1743). His grandson Adam Scheuten (1697-1765), married to Aletta von der Leyen (1699-1757), the sister of Friedrich (1701-78) and Heinrich van der Leyen (1708-82, q.v.), was a versatile industrialist in Crefeld. With his brothers Johann (1699-1757) and Hermann (1702-49) he was engaged in distilling brandy and vinegar, curing tobacco (a business he probably acquired with his wife's dowry); they also established a linseed oil plant and manufactured starch and barley grits. He also sold silk goods manufactured by his brothers-in-law, and built a warehouse in Essenberg (on the Rhine, opposite Ruhrort) in 1743 for better disposal of his wares. In the list of taxpayers in Crefeld he ranked among the most highly assessed, second only to his brothers-in-law. His grandson Adam Wilhelm Scheuten (1753-1801) endowed by bequest the "Scheutensche Lehranstalt," which later became the Crefeld Realgymnasium. The male line of the family died out in 1914. "Sammlung Scheuten" is a collection of genealogical notes on the history of the old Mennonite families of Crefeld, an important and reliable source, probably begun by Abraham Scheuten (1707-89), who was also a lay preacher, a grandson of Daem.

Schiedam, a city (1956 pop. 77,500, with about 100 Mennonites) in the Dutch province of South Holland, near Rotterdam, in which Anabaptists were found as early as 1534. During the winter of 1534-35 Leenaert Boeckbinder (q.v.) and Jan Claesz Cock (q.v.) baptized a number of persons here. In September 1535 twenty-five Anabaptists of Schiedam saved their lives by flight. In 1539 Claes Claesz (Snyder), a deacon of the Schiedam congregation, was arrested at Leiden and on November 16 severely tortured at The Hague; he was beheaded at Leiden on Dec. 20, 1539. Claes Willems, a (non-Mennonite) bailiff of Schiedam, was charged in 1545 with having protected the Anabaptists and other heretics in this town. Elder Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 14 persons at Schiedam during his visits in 1563-65.

Soon after, at least by 1580, there were three Mennonite congregations at Schiedam, a Flemish, a Frisian, and a High German or Waterlander. Jan Hendriksz, at this time a preacher or elder of the Frisian church, soon after sided with Lubbert Geritzs (q.v.) and the progressive Young Frisians. The moderate views in his congregation and also in that of the High Germans led to a merger of these two groups, probably as early as 1591, but in any case before 1620. Negotiations opened about 1625 between the Frisian-High German group, now mostly called Waterlanders, and the Flemish with a view to union miscarried. The Flemish congregation, being rather conservative, rejected the offer of the Waterlanders; particularly the Flemish preacher Cornelis Cornelisz Bom van Cranenburgh, who served 1623-50, opposed the merger. Lambert Lamberts Paeldinck and Lubbert Wolferts (van Vollenhoven) of the Flemish congregation in 1626 signed the Outerman (q.v.) confession. The information by P. J. Twisck (Blaupt t. C., Friesland, 117) that about 1628 the Flemish Mennonites of Schiedam held their meetings in the same house as the High German or "Overlanders" is not clear, unless he means that the united High German and Frisian congregation, then called Waterlanders, were about this time preparing for this merger, and were using the same meetinghouse for this purpose.

At a conference of conservative Flemish delegates held at Leiden, June 1660, of which T. J. van Bragt (q.v.) was the moderator, it was reported that the Flemish congregation had just merged with the Waterlanders (this indeed had happened in 1650) and that the united congregation was inclined to the liberal views of Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.).

In the meantime some difficulty arose in the newly united church of Schiedam between a progressive and a more conservative faction. About 1655, the progressives, then in the majority, invited Galenus to preach at Schiedam; but in 1671 after an address of the conservative elder Bastiaen van Weenighem (q.v.) of Rotterdam, the congregation promised to follow the views of the conservative Zonists (q.v.). A few years later, however (1675), the Schiedam congregation sided with the Galenists or Lamists (as this group was mostly called then), and in this year it joined the Lamist South Holland Sociëteit (conference). During this tumultuous period Jan Huygen van der Linden (d. 1678), who had already been a Waterlander preacher before the merger of 1650, served the congregations until 1677. He was followed by Jan Ariens van Raemburg, a preacher of the Rotterdam Waterlander congregation, who had moved to Schiedam in March 1677, but who died in the course of the year. Thereupon Melis Ates Spinneker (q.v.), subsidized by the Lamist South Holland conference, was a preacher at Schiedam until his death in December 1681. He was followed by Jan de Jager, serving 1682-c90. After de Jager had been dismissed, Petrus van Loon served at Schiedam until about 1705, followed by Jan Arkenbout 1721-22, Dirk van Beek 1721-25, Simon Buys 1726-28, Jan Visser 1728-31, Petrus Plantinus 1731-41, and Hendrik Seije, the last preacher of Schiedam, 1741-47. In 1747 discord arose and he was dismissed; thereupon the few remaining members joined the neighboring Rotterdam congregation.

To this survey can be added a few facts. In 1642 the Mennonites of Schiedam were granted permission to have their marriages performed in their meetinghouses. Concerning these meetinghouses there is not much information. The united congregation used one that had been built shortly after 1610 on the Schie River in the center of the town. This meetinghouse, probably rebuilt at least once, was sold to the Lutherans in 1756. The membership was always small. Figures of early times were not available; in 1675 the united congregation numbered 30 baptized members, in 1745 only 14. From about 1670 it was financially supported by the Rotterdam church and the Lamist church of Amsterdam. Three members of the noted van Vollenhoven (q.v.) family, which later moved to Rotterdam, Amsterdam, and Haarlem, served the church as deacons; viz., Lubbert Wolferts van Vollenhoven, deacon of the Flemish church from 1630, Anthony van Vollenhoven and Koenraad van Vollenhoven, both deacons of the united congregation in 1712-41 and from 1732 respectively. Another Koenraad van Vollenhoven (1611-79), a member of the same family, was a preacher at Schiedam 1636-40, probably of the Frisian-High German congregation. In 1640 he moved to Haarlem.

Jan van der Beest, a Mennonite, was a public notary at Schiedam from 1622, and was exempted by the States of Holland from taking an oath.

In the early 17th century the Collegiants (q.v.) had some warm adherents among the Mennonites of Schiedam. One of them, Pieter Vijgh, was baptized in 1729 "in the manner of the Collegiants," i.e., by immersion. Preacher Hendrik Seije also regularly attended the Collegiant meetings.

The Mennonites now living at Schiedam are members of the Rotterdam congregation. vdZ.

Schiemer, Leonhard, of Vöcklabruck, Upper Austria (the Martyrs' Mirror erroneously calls him Leonhard Schöner of Becklsburg), one of the outstanding Anabaptist leaders and martyrs of the very beginning (died 1528), whose significance for the entire movement has been but recently recognized. He belongs to the line of South German Anabaptists roughly characterized by the names Denk (q.v.) and Hut (q.v.), to which group also Hans Schlaffer (q.v.), Ambrosius Spittelmayr (q.v.), and Hans Nadler (q.v.) belonged. They all represent a stronger spiritualistic emphasis in their Christian faith. The "outer word" alone does not suffice for a true understanding, Schiemer would say; rather the true light of the Holy Spirit is needed which shines in our heart.

Of his life some details are known from his Be-kanntnis (Müller, 80-81), which he submitted to his judge in January 1528. He was brought up at Vöcklabruck and Vienna by God-fearing parents, and desired to enter the Catholic priesthood. But when he found little godliness in the life and teaching of the priests he joined the Barefoot Friars (Franciscans), noted for their piety. But again he found nothing but strife and hypocrisy; finally, having tried this life for six years he fled from the monastery at Judenburg, Styria. A kind citizen of that city gave him some clothing and a guilder for his needs. Now he began to wander about: first he went to Nürnberg where he learned the tailor's trade (and probably met some of the leading men of the Radical Reformation). Thence he went to Nikolsburg, Moravia, to hear Hubmaier's teachings—having vigorously opposed them in his former days. From here he turned to Vienna to learn more about true Christianity from Hans Hut. He related that the assembly "in the Kärntnerstrasse" was greatly embarrassed when he entered, suspecting him to be a spy. After two days of talks, however, he accepted believer's baptism from Oswald Glaidt (q.v.) in the spring of 1527. From Vienna he went to Steyr, the industrial city in Upper Austria, known as a place of great readiness for radical ideas. Here he stayed for a time earning his living by his trade and baptizing many converts to the new faith. The brotherhood made him a preacher (Leermeister) and soon sent him into many lands (Salzburg, Bavara, Tirol) to spread his new message. Although he was well aware that several monasteries in Austria were trying to apprehend him as a renegade monk he obeyed his call without hesitation, and was caught in the city of Rattenberg (q.v.) on the Inn, Tirol (in the documents always written Rotenburg), Nov. 25, 1527, scarcely six months after his conversion. In Rattenberg, he claims, he had worked only one day, and yet he signs one of his epistles to the local brotherhood as "your unworthy bishop." We cannot completely reconstruct the story of that Rattenberg Anabaptist congregation but there is little doubt that Schiemer's influence was tremendous, in spite of the fact that he was in prison until his execution by the sword seven weeks later, Jan. 14, 1528. The district judge Bartholomeus Angst was most lenient to his prisoner (Beck, 61 note), allowing brethren to go in and out and to give him paper and ink to write as much as he wanted. Thus these seven weeks are among the most fruitful ones in the long and bitter story of South German and Tirolean Anabaptism. His writings were soon collected in a pamphlet or booklet presumably for the local congregation, but they found wide distribution afterwards in Moravia, Germany, and Switzerland. The Hutterites as well as Pilgram Marpeck and his people were greatly indebted to this outstanding Anabaptist teacher.

At one time Schiemer tried to escape (Müller, 76) but was caught again. Now his imprisonment was made harder. Torture and hunger made him miserable in the flesh, and the dread of death made him shudder. But he gained new strength by the thought, "If I did not place all my confidence in the Lord, I would fall; but the Lord is my comfort and my confidence; he forsakes none who trusts him" (Müller, 76). The government in Innsbruck urged Judge Angst to greater rigor and requested the speeding up of the case. Schiemer was condemned to death by fire in accordance with the mandates of King Ferdinand (q.v.), but the sentence was moderated to beheading and burning the corpse afterwards. "After him about 70 others testified to their faith [in Rattenberg]," writes the Hutterite Chronicle, thus demonstrating the amazing spiritual vitality of this "Schiemer congregation."

The writings produced by Schiemer in prison are found in numerous Hutterite codices (best perhaps in the oldest one extant, 1566, now at a Bruderhof in Montana) and, surprisingly, also in the Kunstbuch (q.v.) of 1561, which originated in the Marpeck group. The numbering and counting of these writings is not easy because the items are sometimes written together and sometimes separated, sometimes considered as "epistles" and sometimes taken as tracts or sermons. Their tremendous appeal and effectiveness in the shaping of the Anabaptist genius and tradition cannot be doubted. Fortunately, the majority of Schiemer's writings have been published by Lydia Müller (Glaubenszeugnisse); others will follow in Glaubenszeugnisse II and in the forthcoming edition of the Kunstbuch. The list is roughly as follows:

(1) Eine hübsche Erklärung der 12 Artikel des christlichen Glaubens, contained in an epistle to the church in Rattenberg (Müller, 44-58; Kunstbuch,

No. 10). The oldest codex of the Hutterites (1566) has this item too, supplemented by two pages containing a remarkable diagram of four circles: /the Will of God/ Adam/ Creature/ Christ/, plus accompanying text (not yet published).

(2) Was die Gnad sey. Eine Vorred, and a tract "concerning threefold grace." The term Vorred means with the Hutterites always "sermon" but at this place it might also mean "introduction" (Müller, 58-71; Kunstabuch, No. 9). This is a real gem of Anabaptist writing. In the article concerning "the second grace" there is a lengthy insertion called Auslegung des Vater Unser, a paraphrasing of the Lord's Prayer (reissued side by side with a similar piece by Hans Langenmantel, q.v., in Glaubenszeugnisse II). In the Kunstabuch this item runs over without interruption into item

(3) Vom Fläschl (Müller, 72-74), concluded by a lengthy epistle to the congregation of Rattenberg, dated Dec. 4, 1527 (Müller, 74-77). The Kunstabuch has Fläschl and epistle all under No. 9. It might be said that Schiemer was never more profound and close to the spirit of the great medieval mystics than in this item. The ensuing epistle is more personal; the writer suddenly interrupts his "Lehr" (instruction) by being overwhelmed by his predicament and now wants to pour out his troubled mind to his brethren.

(4) Von der Tauff im Neuen Testament, also called Von dreierlei Tauff (namely, by the Spirit, by water, and by blood), very much a counter piece to the Dreyerlei Gnad (above No. 2; Müller, 77-79). The Kunstabuch includes this item in No. 10 (see above, item 1) as a sort of appendix. The Hutterite codices call this item "the third epistle by Leonhard Schiemer," apparently meaning the third item which Schiemer sent from prison. The term "epistle" is not quite correct as this item does not contain personal communications. The Kunstabuch presents these four items as Nos. 9 and 10.

(5) Trostbrief an einen schwachen Bruder. In many Hutterite codices but not in the Kunstabuch or in Müller.

(6) Ein wahrhaft kurz Evangelium, heut der Welt zu predigen, found only in the Kunstabuch, to be published in Glaubenszeugnisse II, a rather short piece, a kind of sermonette.

(7) Ein Bekannntus vor dem Richter zu Rotenburg (most likely January 1528) (Müller, 80-81; not in the Kunstabuch), a brief biography with a concluding apologetic paragraph.

These are the known items of Schiemer's work, all produced for his Rattenberg brethren during the seven weeks of his imprisonment. The writer of this article, however, is inclined to ascribe to Schiemer also a number of anonymous items found in Hutterite codices, usually following Schiemer's "epistles" and apparently serving a similar purpose—organizing the Rattenberg church and giving it guidance, direction, and order.

(8) Ordnung der Gemein, wie ein Christ leben soll. In the Hutterite Chronicle (Wolkan, 60-61), inserted by the writer of the Chronicle for 1529 without much argument, taken most probably again from the afore-mentioned (hypothetical) booklet of Schiemer's writings. The MQR (1955, 162-66) published an English translation of the fuller text (as found in codices). It is a skeleton church discipline, a true model of Anabaptist thought concerning ordering life in the congregation, much shorter than the Schleithem articles of the same year (1527), only laying the groundwork for all future attempts in the same direction. Most likely Schiemer drew it up tentatively (in 12 points) that the brethren of the incipient congregation might have some guidance after his death.

(9 to 13) Anonymous tracts of similar purpose. One is a catechism; the rest contain more or less moral instructions. The Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (1914, p. 19) assigns all these items expressly to Schiemer.

Besides these writings several hymns are likewise ascribed to Schiemer: (1) Dein heilig statt hond sie zerstört (Müller, 82-83, after Beck 58-59, note); (2) Wir bitten dich, ewiger Gott, neig zu uns deine Ohren (Ausbund, No. 31); here the author is named Leonhard Schöner whence the Martyrs' Mirror may have taken the name; also in Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, 28-29; (3) Sollstu bei Gott dein wohnung han (Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, 28-29). According to an old codex in Esztergom this hymn is said to have been composed by Schiemer, but according to Wolkan (Lieder, 12) it was written by Ludwig Haetzer; (4) Wie köstlich ist der Heil'gen Tod (Wiswedel, 185, who took it from the Beck collection in Brno, file No. 45). No further reference found.

Schiemer's "Theology" and Main Teachings. One might easily agree with Wiswedel's statement (184) that both Schiemer and Schlaffer (q.v.) had been strongly influenced by medieval mysticism (while being priest or monk), in the main by Tauler and the Deutsche Theologie, just as Hans Denk and some of the early Spiritualists had been. Christ must be born in us, we must suffer with Him, be crucified and be buried with Him, also descend into Hades with Him, in order to be raised with Him (Müller, 53). Schiemer prefers the translation "The Word became flesh and dwelleth in us," rather than "among" us, as we likewise believe "in" God not "on" God (German: an Gott), etc. (Müller, 61). Justification without sanctification loses its deeper meaning (Müller, 78), countering Paul's thesis by references to Matt. 25. In such an outlook naturally the old problem of "the inner and outer Word" (see Bible, Inner and Outer Word, also Spiritualism) becomes a most urgent issue although this emphasis on the inwardness of God's Word never leads to a quietistic enjoyment but rather to an active witnessing and following of Christ.

This becomes perhaps most impressive in the beautiful small tract Vom Fläschl: "A reply to those who say we drink something from a small flask, of which the devil himself does not know what it contains." Very well, says Schiemer, let it be called a flask. But the drink in it is nothing but a contrite, crushed, and sad heart, pounded by the mortar of the cross. The grapes in it grew in God's vineyard and were pressed under the press of tribulation. From such a flask Christ drank on the cross. And as a flask is narrow at the top but wide at the bottom, thus is also the way of salvation: once a man has overcome all agony and tribulation the flask gets wide and he receives God's comfort and consolation.

Schiemer teaches three kinds of grace: the first is the Word given us by the Father as a divine light (the law). This divine light in man shows him what sin is (anzeigen was sind sey oder nit). Although this light is the same in all men, not all accept it and use it in the same way (Müller, 63). The second grace is Christ or divine righteousness (Gerechtigkeit). The first light is our taskmaster (Zuchtmeister), preparing us for the other light which is Christ (apparently Christ in us). But in order to see this second light one needs to go through the "furnace of suffering" (Luther: Feuer der Trübsal, Eccl. 2:5, also I Peter 1:7, "gold tested by fire"; the Anabaptists changed the word into Schmelzofen der Gelassenheit), "for the uncrucified Christ is like untried metal" (Müller, 67 and 78). In other words, an untested faith is no faith at all. Thus the second grace might also be called "the cross." The third grace, finally, is a grace of joy and rejoicing. It is the promise of the Holy Spirit and His glory. While the life of the "world" begins merrily but ends sadly, the life of a God-fearing man has a sad beginning but eventually the Holy Spirit comes to him anointing him with the oil of unspeakable joy.

As there are three kinds of grace there are also three kinds of baptism, well known from the Scriptures themselves: the first baptism is with the Holy Spirit, the second is with water, and the third with blood. Baptism with water is a confirmation of faith and an inner covenant with God. When one has written a letter he seals it. But no one would seal a letter without knowing what it contains. Whoever baptizes a child acts like a man who seals an empty letter (Müller, 79).

It would be an attractive task to search for the spiritual roots of these teachings. Herbert Klassen in his study of Hans Hut strongly suggests that many a thought of Schiemer, Schlaffer, Ambrosius Spittelmayer, and others goes back to this dynamic and dedicated leader, as far as we are able to reconstruct his doctrines. This is most likely correct. But it is certainly also true that a great many of these ideas are derived from Schiemer's own spiritual experiences condensed as they were into the unbelievably brief span of perhaps nine months. The wide use of his writings throughout the Anabaptist brotherhood, including Pilgram Marpeck, and the unique heroism of the Rattenberg congregation (72 martyrs within a few years) give vivid testimony to the spiritual force of these tracts, suggesting that also the 16th century knew something of the charismatic and pneumatic experiences of the apostolic church. Schiere, a Mennonite family found at Harlingen, Dutch province of Friesland, from the 17th century, members of the Waterlander and later of the united congregation. They were usually merchants and active members of the church, as was Jan Symons Schiere in 1695. In the 19th century one branch was engaged in book printing and publishing at Harlingen. By marriage they were related with other Mennonite families at Harlingen, such as Hingst, Roos, Menalda, van Schouwenburg, and Fontein.

Teunis Schiere (b. 1836 at Boornbergum, Friesland, d. May 19, 1907, at Arnhem), who may have belonged to the Harlingen family, studied theology at the University of Groningen and the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary, and served as a Mennonite minister at Ouddorp 1861-74 and at Den Ilp 1874-97, when he retired. vdZ.

Schijn, a Dutch Mennonite family, found at Amsterdam in the 17th and 18th centuries, members of the Zonist church. Herman Schijn (q.v.) was a noted elder and voluminous author. His brother(?) Laurens Schijn (d. May 11, 1713) was a deacon of the Rotterdam Flemish congregation from 1686 and from 1700 (merger of the Flemish and Waterlanders) of the united Rotterdam Mennonite church. Jacob Schijn, a son of Dr. Herman, served from 1721 as a deacon of the Amsterdam Zonist congregation. The Schijn family died out in the 18th century. vdZ.

Schijn (Schyn), Herman (Hermannus, Hermanus, Harmannus), b. Aug. 3, 1662, at Amsterdam, d. there Nov. 25, 1727, studied medicine at the universities of Leiden and Utrecht, obtaining his M.D. degree at Utrecht in 1682, practiced medicine at Rotterdam until 1690 and then until his death at Amsterdam. At the same time he devoted himself to the interests of the Mennonite church. In 1685 he was appointed deacon of the Rotterdam Flemish congregation and in 1686 called to the ministry in the same congregation, serving as preacher until 1688, when he became an elder. In 1690 he moved to Amsterdam and served as an elder of the Zonist (q.v.) church from 1690 until his death. Herman Schijn had two sons.

Schijn was the great leader of the conservative Mennonites (Zonists) in the Netherlands. Besides this the Dutch brotherhood is deeply indebted to him for his historiography, Schijn being one of the first Dutch scholarly historians. As a member of the Dutch Mennonite Committee of Foreign Needs (Commissie voor Buitenlandsche Nooden) he was active in behalf of the oppressed Mennonites in Switzerland and Prussia. In 1707-8 he carried on a correspondence with the Mennonites in Germantown, Pa. As a conservative leader Schijn was much disturbed when his former church of Rotterdam in 1700, then merging with the Waterlander congregation, resolved to admit to the communion services "all Christians," not only those who were members of other Mennonite churches or other Christian denominations, but even unbaptized persons who considered themselves Christians. Against this liberal formula of benodiging (q.v., i.e., invitation) with its Collegiant (q.v.) spirit Schijn published Aenmerkingen op het formulier van benodiging (Amsterdam, 1703).

Schijn wrote a large number of books; besides the Aenmerkingen and his historical works (listed below) they are: Zalige Na-gedagtenis (Amsterdam, 1695), a funeral sermon for his co-preacher Michael Fortgens; Salomons tempelbouw (Amsterdam, 1697), a sermon preached at Amsterdam; Kort onderwys des christelyken Geloofs (Amsterdam, 1697, repr. 1698, 1710, 1723, 1740, all at Amsterdam), a catechetical book, written by order of the Zonist conference; Zeedige Verantwoording der Mennoniten op zeekeer placcaat, door de regeerders der Stadt Bern tegen de z.g. Weederdoopers uitgegeeven (n.p., n.d.-c1710); Eerste Beginselen van den christelyken godsdienst (Amsterdam, 1718, repr. 1723, 1736, 1783, all at Amsterdam), a catechism; in collaboration with H. van Dam, De Kerkeraad en Gemeente der Doopsgezinde te Amsterdam . . . verdedigt (Amsterdam, 1719); De mensch in Christus of het geestelyk leeven der geloovigen (Amsterdam, 1721, repr. Amsterdam 1725, 18 sermons); Zeedige en rechtmattige verdediging tegens den E. David Bramen (Amsterdam, 1724); Belezelen des geestelyken leevens (Amsterdam, 1727), containing 21 sermons; Heilige Keurstoffen (Amsterdam, 1737), a collection of sermons published after his death.

Of special interest is a book by Schijn (published at Amsterdam in 1723, repr. there 1738) entitled Ontwerp tot vereeniging der doopsgezinde Christenen (Project for the Unification of the Mennonite Christians). In this mild and wise book the author deals with the desirability and possibility of a unification of the different branches of Dutch Mennonites, and particularly of a merger between the Lamists (q.v.) and the Zonists. Previous attempts made to unite these two largest groups of Mennonites had failed. The Lamists accused the Zonists of putting too much importance on the confessions of faith, while the Zonists complained that the Lamists were guilty of a "considerable indifference" (aenmerkelyke lossigheid) concerning the basic principles, and objected to the Collegiant and even the Socinian (q.v.) views prevalent among the Lamists. Schijn's deacon, Lambert Bidloo (q.v.), severely attacked the Lamists because of their "unlimited tolerance" (onbepaalde verdraegsaemheyt). The book by Schijn on this matter is very moderate. His position is as follows: all possible efforts should be made to bring about a unification; for many of the differences between the Lamists and the Zonists are insignificant, such as footwashing, the question of silent or "spoken" prayer, of strict or mild banning and shunning, and a number of minor questions. But on two points Schijn maintains Zonist doctrines: the practice, ignored by the Lamists, that no unbaptized person should be admitted to the Lord's Supper and that the congregation should have a confession. Schijn believed that choosing one of the outstanding confessions would cause no difficulty.

Since J. Ph. Schabaelje (q.v.) in his Vereenigingh van de principale artijckelen des Geloofs (1640) had shown that on the major points the differences between the confessions of faith were slight, it was not important which of the confessions was to be used in the brotherhood; Schijn himself preferred the confession by Hans de Ries. Schijn's book closes with a cordial encouragement to unity: "So we entreat the Doopsgezinden by the mercies of God and the precious blood of His only begotten Son, that they . . . now make an end of their divisions and follow peace, without which no man shall see the Lord." Schijn's admonition, however, was fruitless. Not until 1801 was the Zonist-Lamist schism healed by the union of the congregations at Amsterdam.

Herman Schijn is especially known for his historical works. In 1711 he published at Amsterdam his Korte historie der protestante Christenen, die men Mennoniten of Doopsgezinden noemt. In order to bring their principles before the learned world, which then often had misconceptions concerning their origin and doctrines, Schijn resolved to publish his book in a Latin translation, and thus a somewhat enlarged Latin edition appeared, Historia Christianorum qui in Belgio Foedere inter Protestantes Mennonitae appellantur . . . (Amsterdam, 1723). A Dutch translation of this Latin work was made by M. van Maurik, Geschiedenis der Protestante Christenen in't Vereenigd Nederland genaamt Mennoniten . . . (Amsterdam, Utrecht, 1727). A greatly enlarged edition of Schijn's book, revised by himself, but published after his death, was Historiae Mennonitarum Plenior deductio (Amsterdam, 1729), of which a Dutch translation by van Maurik appeared at Amsterdam in 1738: Uitvoeriger Verhandeling of vervolg van de Geschiedenis der Mennoniten . . . A new translation of the Historiae of 1729 was made by Gerardus Maatschoen. Maatschoen was a colleague of Schijn in the Amsterdam Zonist church. He not only translated Schijn's book, but also thoroughly revised and greatly enlarged it. He added a long preface and a new volume composed by himself. The title of this Maatschoen edition reads as follows: Geschiedenis dier Christenen, welke in de Vereenigde Nederlanden onder de Protestanten Mennoniten genaamt worden . . . (three volumes, Amsterdam 1743-45).

The first volume of this new edition by Maatschoen contains eleven chapters: (1) Origin of the name Wederdopers (Anabaptists) and in how far the Mennonites differ from them; (2) On the baptism of Jewish proselytes; (3) Views of the Mennonites concerning baptism; (4) Proofs adduced by the Roman Catholics, Lutherans, and Reformed as to infant baptism; (5) History of the followers of Menno Simons; (6) History of the Anabaptist doctrines in the 16th century in Germany and elsewhere; (7) Confession of faith by Hans de Ries and Lubbert Gerritsz (here found in pleno); (8) Clear testimonies of Menno Simons, showing the difference between the Mennonites and the Anabaptists; (9) The fore-mentioned differences explained from the Confessions; (10) The differences shown as to the practices of life, and according testimonies of some great princes; (11) An explanation why the Mennonites always have been averse to fanaticism

This edition of 1743-45 has some fine pictures of baptism, communion service, footwashing, and other ceremonies of the Dutch Mennonites as practiced during this time, and a large number of engraved portraits of the leaders whose lives and books are described. Schijn's portrait is found in Volume I, facing page 1.

Schijn's historical works are not historiography in the modern sense of the word, describing a number of historical facts or events in chronological and logical order, but can be characterized as a kind of apology and dogmatics, elucidated and illustrated by facts from Mennonite history. Schijn's main thesis is that the Mennonites did not take their origin and doctrines from the revolutionary Münsterites (q.v.) as generally was stated by Reformed authors and other opponents, but that from the very beginning down to the Middle Ages, they had been a peaceful group of Biblical Christians, in the 16th century gathered and led by Menno Simons. This apologetical intention is the main trend of Schijn's work. At the present time the books of Schijn are valuable especially for a large number of particulars about Mennonite leaders and about books, many of which are now lost, since Schijn related their contents.

Herman Schijn was a highly esteemed leader not only among his own group, but also among his opponents. He was a very beloved preacher in his Amsterdam Zonist church. After his death Maatschoen delivered a commemorative sermon in the Zonist church at Amsterdam on Dec. 28, 1727: Eeuwigdurende Gedagtenis des Rechtvaardigen . . . Lykrede op H. Schyn (Amsterdam, 1728). In 1727 Maatschoen and others published Ter Lijkgedagtenisse van H. Schyn, leeraar der Doopsgezinden in de Zon en Med. Doctor te Amsterdam.† vvdZ.

Schilthuis, a Mennonite family found at Groningen, Netherlands, since the early 18th century, where they were grain merchants. According to a family tradition Uko Walles (q.v.) was one of its ancestors.

One of the most outstanding members of this family was Ulferdus Gerardus Schilthuis (1799-1856), a grain dealer at Groningen. He was a member of the Provincial States of Groningen and from 1837 a justice of the peace at Groningen. He was the promoter of new branches of trade and agriculture in the province of Groningen, and through his initiative a school of agriculture (Landhuishoudschool) was founded at Groningen. He married Coenradine Catherina van Delden (1797-1871). At present a branch of this family is also found at Rotterdam; Ulferdus Gerardus Schilthuis, a lawyer at Rotterdam, is a member of the church board of the Rotterdam congregation. vvdZ.

Schimmelpennin(c)k, a Dutch Mennonite family, found since the 16th century at Zutphen, Deventer, Almelo, Zwolle, and in later times also in other towns. Johan Schimmelpenninck, the ancestor of this family, who died before 1573 at Zutphen, was a wine merchant. The members of the Zutphen-Deventer branch were usually wine merchants; the Almelo branch was engaged in the textile business. Many of the Schimmelpennincks, particularly at Zwolle and Almelo, were Mennonite deacons. Thomas Schimmelpenninck, of Zwolle, represented the Zwolle congregation at the large Flemish delegates' conference at Haarlem in 1649. Gerrit Schimmelpenninck (b. 1727 at Almelo, d. Oct. 30, 1792, at Goch), after studying at the Mennonite Theological Seminary at Amsterdam, served as a preacher at Goes 1757-74 and Goch, Germany, 1774-92. To this family also belonged Rutger Jan Schimmelpenninck (b. 1761 at Deventer, d. 1825 at Amsterdam), a noted Dutch statesman, at first a lawyer at Amsterdam, in 1795 an influential member of the national Dutch Convention, then an ambassador of the Netherlands at Paris and London, 1805-6 Grand Pensionary of the Batavian (i.e., Dutch) Republic, knighted by Napoleon as a count of the empire and from 1815 a member of the First Chamber of the Netherlands. His father, Gerrit Schimmelpenninck, a wine merchant at Deventer, was a Mennonite; Rutger Jan, however, and all the other children of Gerrit Schimmelpenninck became members of the Reformed Church as their mother was. The Mennonite branch of this family has died out in the male line. vvdZ.

Schindlberger, Kaspar, is named by Wolkan (p. 247) as the author of a Hutterite hymn, "Christliche Arth mit meinem Mundt." A very similar hymn, "Christliche Art, Eifer und Trieb" (Lieder, 697 ff.), was written by Kaspar Braitmichel (q.v.). In all probability the former is a variant of the latter. Nothing else is known of Kaspar Schindlberger. (Wolkan, Lieder, 247; ML IV.)

Schlabach (Slabaugh, Schlabaugh, Slabach, Schlappach), a Mennonite family name of Swiss origin. Peter Schlappach, of Signau, canton of Bern, was an Anabaptist in 1538. The name is found among the Swiss Mennonite refugees in the Palatinate after 1664. Jakob Schlabach (q.v.) was expelled from the canton of Bern in 1660 for being an Anabaptist. Peter Schlabach (q.v.), who was an elder in an Amish congregation in Upper Hesse, Germany, served in the Prussian Landtag in the latter part of the 19th century. Johannes Slabach, who arrived in Philadelphia in 1733, may have been Amish and if so was perhaps the first representative of the Amish Schlabachs to come to America. Other Schlabach immigrants arrived in the 19th century. The brothers John and Christian Schlabach arrived in Somerset County, Pa., in 1819. Their parents and family joined them the following year, and about five years later the entire family settled in Holmes County, Ohio, where numerous descendants are found today. A Daniel Schlabach arrived in Fairfield County, Ohio, perhaps in 1834. Nearly all of his numerous descendants live in Holmes and Geauga counties, Ohio. Daniel's brother John settled in Fairfield County, Ohio, around 1838, but after his marriage he moved to Johnson County, Iowa, in 1851, where most of his descendants live. Another John Slabaugh who settled near Johnstown, Pa., has descendants in Howard County, Ind. Obituaries in Mennonite periodicals show that the family is scattered in at least twelve states, with Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa leading. In 1937, at least seven bearing the family name were ministers in the Mennonite Church (MC), one in the Conservative Mennonite Church, and ten in Old Order Amish Mennonite churches, particularly in Holmes County, Ohio.

Schlabach (Schlebach, Schleppach), Jakob (Jegi, Jegly), an Anabaptist of Oberdiessbach in the Swiss canton of Bern, was imprisoned in Bern in 1660 with a number of other Swiss Brethren, and later transported to the Netherlands as an obstinate Anabaptist. Schlabach, Peter (1834-1906), an elder of the Amish congregation in Upper Hesse, was married to Anna Güngerich of the Albacherhof, leased the estate of the deceased Unzicker in Frielingen, Hersfeld district, and later a grain business in Wetzlar, became bookkeeper of a savings bank, and was elected the conservative representative to the Prussian Landtag. He took his office with an affirmation instead of an oath: "I, Peter Schlabach, promise that with my yea, which is yea, besides the handshake, that I will be true and faithful to His Royal Majesty the King and will conscientiously follow the constitution." He also attended the conference of the Mennonites of South Germany and was loyal to the brotherhood until his death. (Menn. Bl., 1900, 71; ML IV.)

The settlement formed an administrative unit with the Baratov Mennonite settlement (q.v.) and belonged to the Neu-Chortitza Mennonite Church (q.v.). See also Grünfeld.) Schladdall (Sladal), a suburb of Danzig, West Prussia, Germany, located outside the Neugarten Gate, was the seat of the Danzig Frisian Mennonite congregation. The meetinghouse built there in 1638 was destroyed by the French army in 1806. vdZ.

Schladming, a mining town (pop. 1500) in the Enns Valley in Styria, Austria, was one of the first communities to become Protestant in the 16th century. In the Peasants' War of 1525 it played a prominent part on the side of the revolting peasants, who defeated Sigmund von Dietrichstein on July 3, 1525, but were in turn defeated by Duke Nicolas von Salm. The town was destroyed and the inhabitants severely punished for its part in the insurrection. The restoration proceeded very slowly, and under the protection of the Protestant Baron of Grünbichel its inhabitants became Protestant; in the Counter Reformation they changed their faith (1600). That there were Anabaptists there in the 1520's is seen in a report made to the authorities, found in the archives in Steyer. (ML IV.)

LOSERTH.

Schlaffer, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr (d. 1528), highly regarded by Anabaptists as a true preacher of the Word of God, and a "highly gifted man" (Chronicle). His "Account" (Verantwortung) before the magistrate of Schwatz, Tirol, in 1527 (Müller, 115-21) states that he had entered the Catholic priesthood in 1511, and served in Upper Austria. With the coming of Luther he began to preach the pure Gospel but soon was forbidden to do so. In 1526 he resigned his priesthood, realizing that "it was the estate of a false prophet." For a time (1526-27) he stayed with the Protestant Lord Zelkin at his castle Weinberg near Freistadt (q.v.), Upper Austria. It was either then or still earlier that he had come into contact with Anabaptists, most likely with Hans Hut. It is not known when or by whom he was baptized but Grete Mecenseffy shows how heavily the Anabaptist congregation of Freistadt leaned on Schlaffer, who followed more or less the line of Hut. In any case he left the area, beginning a period of wandering, the sequence of places being not quite clear. He visited Nikolsburg in 1527 where he heard the dispute between Hubmaier and Hut, which happened prior to Hut's coming to Upper Austria. He may have been converted to Hut's ideas on that occasion and returned temporarily to Freistadt, establishing an Anabaptist congregation there; but it is also possible that he was in Nikolsburg even before he came to Lord Zelkin. In any case Freistadt soon became an unsafe abode, and he then went to Bavaria. First he went to Augsburg where he met Jacob Wideman (q.v.), and again Hans Hut; he may have been present at the "Martyr Synod" (q.v.) of Augsburg. Next he went to Nürnberg where he met Hans Denck and Ludwig Haetzer in September 1527 (Fellmann), "two excellent, in God learned men"; finally he went to Regensburg where he met Oswald Glaidt (q.v.) and Wolfgang Brandhuber (q.v.), two more of the then leading men in the growing Anabaptist movement.

From Regensburg he turned south to the Inn (q.v.) Valley of Tirol, to Brixlegg and Rattenberg (q.v.), where he had some relatives. But after a brief stay due to sickness he went on toward Hall on the Inn for the winter. On his way he attended a meeting of Anabaptists in the mining city of Schwatz on the Inn, a few miles west of Rattenberg, on Dec. 5, 1527, but was caught by the authorities and imprisoned in the near-by Frundsberg castle, together with the brother Linhard Frick (or, as the Kunstbuch calls him, Funck). He was brought before the magistrate and submitted a written Verantwortung which was sent to the provincial government in Innsbruck. His defense was very dignified: he had sought nothing evil but only divine truth; nothing was further from his mind than rebellion. Children, he contended, should not be baptized, for "they were the Lord's as long as they were in innocence, and they would not be damned." The Innsbruck government sent instructions to Judge S. Capeller for conducting the case. The statements of the prisoners would be sent to the authorities in Bavaria who also wanted to try these men. Orders were further given to convene the court with twelve jurymen to pass sentence on the two prisoners. At the same time a secret report should be made by the judge on the attitude of the jurymen, as it was known that some of them did not approve of death in such cases. Finally the death sentence was pronounced and Schlaffer and Frick were beheaded at Schwatz on Feb. 4, 1528.

Schlaffer left nine writings, all well preserved in numerous Hutterite codices. His long prayer written in the night before the execution is also found in the Kunstbuch of 1561 as No. 12. Of these writings only one rather short piece was composed while Schlaffer was still free, most likely in Freistadt, for the local brotherhood; it is a sort of shortened paraphrase of Hut's Vom Geheimnis der Tauff (Mecenseffy). All the other writings were written in prison between Dec. 6, 1527, and Feb. 3, 1528, slightly more than eight weeks. These are the writings:

(1) Kurzer Bericht eines christlichen Lebens (also Kurzer Bericht und Lehr eines rechten christlichen Lebens); it is made up of the "Hut paraphrase" (Müller, 94-96) and two prayers (ibid., 96-98; Beck, 651). Already in the first document we recognize Schlaffer's greatest potential: his profound gift of praying or communicating with his God.

(2) Ein einfältiger Unterricht zum Anfang eines gotseligen Lebens, again introduced by a beautiful lengthy prayer (Müller, 84-94). This tract, written Dec. 19, 1527, likewise reveals strongly Schlaffer's dependence on Hut (Müller, 85, note).

(3) Kurze und einfältige Vermahnung von der Kindertauff, und wie derselbige nit mag beibracht werden aus Heiliger Schrift. It was written Jan. 2, 1528 (Müller, 98-105).

(4) Brief an einen schwachen Bruder, Antwort auf etliche Fragstück, also Jan. 2, 1528 (Müller, 105-10).

(5) Von der Art und Gestalt Christi, was er geistlich und leiblich sey geformiert (unpublished, found in Canadian Hutterite codices).

(6) Bekandnus und Verantwortung [dem Richter zu Schwatz] schriftlich überantwortet, no date (Müller, 110-15).

(7) Die andere Verantwortung: Antwort auf [fünf] Fragstück vor dem Richter (Müller, 115-21). From this item all the biographical information was gained. This account was apparently first given orally before the judge, and later written down by Schlaffer for his brethren.

(8) Ein Bericht seiner Verantwortung vor der Obrigkeit getan an seine Geschwistriget im Herren zugeschiedt, Pfingstag vor Pauli Bekehrung, January 1528 (Müller, 121-25). This is another summary of Schlaffer's defense. He informed his brethren (perhaps the congregation of Schwatz) that the authorities in Innsbruck had falsified his written statement (No. 6), completely changing its meaning; for that reason he wanted to inform his brethren about what he had actually written. Thus we have three different documents (Nos. 6 to 8) in which Schlaffer gives account of the major ideas of South German Anabaptism as it had evolved at that time.

(9) Ein einfältig Gebet, also called Gebet, Beicht und öffentlich Bekenntnis, Hans Schlaffers Testament und eigen Bekenntnis gegen Gott, written Feb. 3, 1528, in the night before his execution. This is found in the Kunstbuch No. 12, and in many Hutterite codices (also Beck, 652, as a very inadequate version of this prayer). In the typescript copy in the GCL this prayer covers 18 pages; in a narrowly written Hutterite codex (1566) it covers eight leaves. This prayer is no doubt one of the most profound and moving documents in the entire German devotional literature. Like Augustine in his Confessions he talks to God at great length about his life and thoughts, strengthening his mind during the agonizing hours before his death. It is most likely here that Schlaffer's greatest power is to be found and also his greatest contribution to Anabaptist tradition.

Schlaffer composed also two hymns: "Ungnad begehrt ich nit von dir," No. 32 in the Ausbund, and pp. 22-23 in Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder; the hymn was also circulated as a pamphlet in 1527, and reprinted in 1550 and 1551 in Nürnberg; "Herr Gott, mein ewiger Vater" (with the acrostic "Hanns Schlaffer") in Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder, 21-22; it was written in the last hours of his life, either before or after the above prayer.

Schlaffer's teachings: As was pointed out above, Schlaffer's main ideas are not his own but were taken from Hans Hut, often to the point of verbatim borrowing. But this was nothing unusual in those days (compare Marpeck and Rothman); what really mattered was the particular emphasis or slant given to the ideas. In all Schlaffer's writings we meet the same spiritualistic or pneumatic atmosphere as in those of Schiemer, Ambrosius Spittelmayer, Hans Nadler, and other men connected with Denk and Hut. "Even if Christ had died a hundred times, it would avail nothing if the spiritual Christ is not preached also" (Wiswedel, 197, quoted from a copy in the Beck collection, file No. 46, in Brno). "Who ever descends into Hades with Christ, that is in Christ, will also be led out of Hades by God" (Müller, 96). Pilgram Marpeck some twenty years later liked to indulge in speculation of this kind in exactly the same way (see Nicodemus, Gospel of).

Schlafler is aware that suffering is a keynote of the Christian in the "world," and his writings abound in such thoughts. "All Scriptures speak of nothing but of the suffering of the elect, from Abel to the apostles; that is why the lamb has been killed ever since the beginning of the world" (Müller, 88). "Who ever suffers in the flesh stops sinning" (ibid., 89). And in the Account: "Here I stand as a lamb which does not open its mouth as it is being slaughtered, to which may Christ . . . grant me strength and help" (Müller, 124). "Only he who follows Christ is a Christian." Of particular appeal is a short passage in his first Bericht und Lehr where he speaks of the "Tiefe Christi," meaning Christ's lowliness (Niedrigkeit) and resignation. "It might also be called Hell, that a man could imagine himself deserted by God and all creatures. This lowliness (Tiefe) is the sign of Jonah. Into this lowliness one has to enter if one wants to be saved in Christ" (Müller, 96). This is a thought which was repeated twenty years later nearly verbatim by Pilgram Marpeck in his "Epistle to the Brethren in the Grisons, Appenzell and Alsace," Feb. 1, 1547, dealing with Von der Tiefe Christi (Kunstbuch, No. 35; see Fast, 235).

Grete Mecenseffy compared this entire tract of Schlafler (Müller, 94-96) with the Confession of the Freistadt Anabaptists (Nicoladoni, 250-52) and Hut's Vom Geheimnis der Tauff, and found a near identity of all three, at least in certain sections. She thinks that the major ideas were borrowed from Thomas Müntzer, Hut's first spiritual awakener, but this remains a debatable question. Rather one could think of the influence of late medieval mysticism as the true root of this line of tradition. In any case it remains a "gospel of the cross" which became particularly real as this cross was being experienced in the agony and dread of death.

In his "Letter to a Weak Brother" Schlafler tries to answer certain scruples of that brother concerning difficult doctrinal issues; his reaction here might be called again typically Anabaptist. "One should not worry too much," he writes, "concerning certain secrets as if it would hurt you not to grasp their meaning. Rather one should take into captivity all thought and reason in obedience to Christ (II Cor. 10:5)" (Müller, 107). This answer is found time and again in Anabaptist sources (see Reason and Obedience). On the delicate issue of the meaning of the Trinity, Schlafler answers, again typically for pneumatic Anabaptism: "God is neither this nor that" (Müller, 108; here Lydia Müller refers to a stanza of a hymn by Ludwig Haetzer which says exactly the same thing and must have been known to Schlafler, ML II, 231 or Beck, 34). But Schlafler does not deny the truth of the Trinity; in fact he defends it to the best of his ability.

Schlafler and Schiemer are usually mentioned together, and rightly so. They both had been Catholic clergymen, had become true apostles of budding Anabaptism, both pursuing mainly the Denk-Hut line. Both died as martyrs within the span of two and a half weeks, not more than five or six miles apart in the Inn Valley. Both left a valuable legacy to their brethren, who kept their memory and also their teachings alive. Schiemer was no doubt more the "bishop" who cared fatherly for his congregation or church; Schlafler never had one to care for. His accounts and tracts are rich sources of instruction and of strength, but his most lasting contributions are his numerous prayers. No other Anabaptist ever produced documents of this type as profound and spiritual as Schlafler. R.F.

Schlegel (Slagel, Slagle, Slagell), a Mennonite family name of Swiss origin now found chiefly in Illinois, Oregon, and Ontario. A Nicholas Schlegel was one of the early members of the East Zorra (q.v.) Amish Mennonite Church in Ontario. Christian Schlegel settled in the Amish community of central Illinois in 1835. He is perhaps the Christian Schlegel (1819-84) who served as an Amish Mennonite bishop in Livingston County. His son Joseph Schlegel (1847-1914) was ordained an Amish Mennonite bishop in 1891, serving the Pleasant View (q.v.) congregation at Hydro, Okla. Joseph's son John Slagell is now a minister in this congregation. Joseph Schlegel (q.v., 1837-1913), a native of Alsace, was ordained bishop at Wayland, Iowa, in 1868. In 1879 he moved to Milford, Neb., where he served the rest of his life. Daniel W. Slagel (1864-1947) was a minister in the Waldo Mennonite Church (q.v.) and Emmanuel Slagle (1869-1944) served as bishop of the Pioneer and Archbold Evangelical Mennonite churches in Ohio. Arthur Slagel, of the Waldo church, served in relief work in Russia after World War I. Five representatives of the family were in the ministry of the Mennonite Church (MC) in 1957. M.G.

Schlegel (Schlögl), Adam, early Anabaptist of unknown origin (Bavarian, Swabian?). In 1528 he joined the Moravian "Stäbler" (q.v., see Moravia) under the leadership of Jacob Wideman (q.v.) and was soon made Diener des Wortes (minister), at the same time as Franz Intzinger, Jacob Mändl (q.v.), and others. In 1531 he allowed certain liberties in the brotherhood (fleischliche Freiheiten—whatever that may mean), and thereupon was expelled from the brotherhood, along with Burckhardt von Ofen. He now turned to the Philippite Brethren (q.v.) in Auspitz, Moravia, where he was kindly received and confirmed in his function as a minister. Among the Philipppites he seems to have gained an important position, for he baptized many persons in Auspitz in 1531-35. Then the Philippites left Moravia and nothing more is heard of him. It is possible that he returned to South Germany as many others did. (Ziegelschmid, Chronik.) R.F.

Schlegel, Hans, a Hutterite from Württemberg, Germany, a tailor by trade, was chosen to preach on Jan. 25, 1568, at Nernbschitz (see Niemtschitz, Moravia) and confirmed in the service three years later. He died at Maskowitz (q.v., in Moravia), Feb. 21, 1587. He is the author of the song, "Nun harret alle eben in diesem Jammertal." NEFF.

Schlegel, Joseph (1837-1913), was born near Mulhouse, Alsace, Nov. 11, 1837, and as a youth migrated to Ontario, and a few years later to Davis County, Iowa. He was ordained to the ministry in the Amish Mennonite Church at Wayland, Iowa, in 1867, and the next year was ordained bishop. In 1879 he moved to Milford, Neb., where he died Dec. 25, 1913. He was the first moderator of the Western District Amish Mennonite Conference (q.v.) and served either as moderator or assistant moderator ten times between 1890 and 1904. He attended at least nineteen sessions between 1890 and 1913, preached eight conference sermons, and was appointed to important committees. He was known as a forceful speaker and his ability as a mediator was widely recognized. M.G.

Schleifer, Hans, an Anabaptist of Augsburg, Bavaria, Germany, was chosen with Peter Ringmacher (q.v.) on April 1, 1528, as bishop (Vorsteher) of the Augsburg congregation and sent to Regensburg to comfort the brethren. (See Augsburg; ML IV.)

Schleitheim, capital of the district of the same name in the Swiss canton of Schaffhausen, also called Schlatten in the local dialect, not to be confused with Schlatten am Randen (q.v.), a vicarage with about 1700 inhabitants. Schleitheim was one of the first communities entered by the Anabaptist movement. In 1522 Sebastian Hofmeister (q.v.) preached the Reformation in Schaffhausen, and from here it spread to the neighboring Schleitheim, proclaimed by the chaplain Nikolaus Spöhrlin. Spöhrlin's personal life was, however, not favorable to the promotion of the new teaching. This may be the reason why Anabaptism found such early entry into the town. The source of the first appearance of the movement is no longer altogether clear. Thomas Müntzer (q.v.), who was preaching in the village of Griessen in the fall of 1524, was reported by Brenz (q.v.) to have also visited Schleitheim. At about the same time (September to October 1524) Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.) was staying in Schaffhausen; but neither of these had anything to do with Anabaptism in 1524. Conrad Grebel (q.v.) was engaged in a debate with Hofmeister in Schaffhausen early in 1525 and led members of the most prominent families into the Anabaptist movement.

The entry of the movement into Schleitheim probably came from Schaffhausen. On Feb. 24, 1527, the first Anabaptist synod was held here, led by Michael Sattler (q.v.), which drew up the principles of the Swiss Brethren in seven articles known as the Brüderlich Vereinigung (q.v.), which became a widely accepted confession of faith of the Swiss and South German Anabaptists.

On Sept. 18, 1527, the first known member of the Swiss Brethren at this place was cast into the prison of Schaffhausen, but was later released upon payment of a fine and expulsion from the town, and a confession that he had erred on the question of baptism. In 1535 Martin Lincki of Thengen was compelled to recant in Schleitheim. At first the authorities hoped to be able to convert the Anabaptists back to the Reformed Church, and had the pastor conduct a number of debates with "obstinate Anabaptists." When these proved futile, severer measures were adopted. "Wetzelmayer's daughter" was threatened with drowning. Meetings in private homes were prohibited. In 1544 Heinrich Wininger was fined for lodging Anabaptists. The Anabaptists now met in the woods, in the "Kehle am Randen," by the "Täuferwegli" (Anabaptist path, a footpath still in existence by that name between Schleitheim and Merishausen). In 1560 this place was discovered and the cabin razed. But the congregation still persisted. In 1577 another disputation was arranged, which was also fruitless. It was followed by further repressive measures, such as prohibition of the use of communal property in 1580. Under this pressure several Anabaptists migrated to Moravia, and lost their citizenship. The following names are given: "Hans Bley called Rouchly with his wife and children. Zentz the son of the Stammwirt with his wife and children. Marx Wäber called Gebhart with his youngest son. Bucheler's son with his children. Michael Thigen's boy. The latter with his wife and children. Jacob Bletscher the servant with his wife and children." Orders were issued that the Swiss Brethren remaining should be reported; this was, however, not done, for the citizenry sympathized with the Swiss Brethren and honored the refugees as martyrs. Even the officials sometimes failed to obey the government orders, and several were punished; the sheriff was imprisoned in the tower.

In 1594 J. J. Rüger, the Schaffhausen clergyman and chronicler, with two councillors, betook himself to Schleitheim once more, "to remind each Anabaptist kindly of his error." Concerning this visit he writes, "At the time of the Reformation or change in religion the enemy did not neglect to build chapels beside the Christian churches, with the tares of the seditious, obstinate, and constant Anabaptists, who have increased since the Reformation to such an extent that the honorable Christian government has not been able to get rid of it, much less to uproot it. These intractable Anabaptists have had their confession of faith publicly printed. . . . Indeed, they are fine 'children of God,' while they are more infamously and obstinately rejecting their God's ordinances and are disobedient to his commands! and because they may not hold their meetings in the village they have used wildernesses and solitary places (chiefly the Küetal) in their neighborhood, but these have been shut off and forbidden by the honorable government." The outcome was the military occupation of the village in 1595, to compel the Swiss Brethren to attend church and to baptize their children by force. In spite of all this, a marked increase of the movement was noted. A new warning was issued, threatening dire punishment. The Anabaptists were forbidden to pasture their cattle with the common herds. Hans Russenberger, who had led others to Anabaptism, was ordered to leave the village within a week. Josef Rössler and his wife had refused to be married in the church (both of them "stiff-necked Anabaptists"); the man was expelled. In 1612 all the Anabaptists but five old men (Christian, Georg and Vinzenz Russenberger, Hans and Melchior Meyer) were expelled. Christian Russenberger was soon after put into prison, since he had baptized Baschian Müller of Löhningen, the husband of Anna Wanner of Schleithem. Two women who refused to leave the village were punished by the removal of all their furniture and the doors and windows. In 1620 twenty more had to leave. They fled into the neighboring communities, but were returned, lest they find shelter with relatives. Similar treatment was given Georg Gering, Bürckly Wanner, Thomas Pletscher, and others, who were extradited by Maximilian von Pappenheim in 1617, when they had fled to Stühlingen. Nevertheless the congregation blossomed. When Hans Meyer, a weaver, was unable to pay a fine, 65 sheaves of rye and 34 of oats were taken from his barn. Melchior Meyer and his two sons were put in prison, but escaped. When they were caught, each had to pay a fine of 100 florins. A man, whose wife was an Anabaptist, was ordered to leave by morning. Wanner, apparently the leader of the congregation, was put into the "Anabaptist prison." By day he had to thresh, and by night he was in ankle chains. The same lot befell the "stubborn" Georg Pletscher. Finally all the cattle were taken from the Anabaptists. The response was eight additions to the Swiss Brethren. The government again answered with imprisonment and compulsory labor. In the second half of the Thirty Years' War the Mennonites had to pay for a substitute in the protection of the national boundaries, and later they had to board and lodge him.

In spite of all these oppressions the congregation by no means declined. In 1640 an ultimatum was issued for their conversion. It was fruitless. In 1641 the village was again occupied by the military. All the men who were Mennonites were taken to Schaffhausen and placed in irons. Five of them broke out, but were caught and put into a chain gang, the chains being provided with bells. Christian Bächtold was whipped with the lash. Meanwhile the wives and children of these men were suffering the direst want. The children were reared Reformed. After some time the men were released from their chains, and it seemed that quiet had descended upon the village. But the movement was not yet quite extinct. In 1642 an order was issued imposing a fine of 100 florins on anyone who kept an Anabaptist overnight, and twenty for talking to one.

In 1648 the council of Schaffhausen learned that the Anabaptists were again refusing to send their children to school and to church. They were thereupon ordered to sell their goods and move out. When they refused, the magistrate was ordered to sell their property. But no buyers could be found, and so the government assumed the farming. Now many Mennonites were compelled to emigrate to the Palatinate. Others at least wanted to send their children there, so that they could be raised as Mennonites. These children the council threatened with loss of citizenship and banishment. Unfortunately no record of this emigration has been preserved. The congregation was now small, and still persecuted with the same severity. On Feb. 8, 1661, Nikolaus Hess was ordered to leave the town with his wife and parents-in-law; but the order was rescinded when he returned to the church. Upon his death in 1680 his widow, Margaretha Bächtold, with two children emigrated to the Palatinate, where her seven children were living, leaving one son in Schleithem. She was probably the last Mennonite of Schleithem. The struggles of the congregation had lasted 150 years. The Mennonite Pletscher and Bechtel families (Palatinate and later North America) almost certainly come from Schleithem. W.P.L.

Schleswig-Holstein, now a province of Prussia, Northwest Germany, was Danish during the Reformation and later. The Anabaptists found refuge there early in the 16th century, particularly in the rural areas. Evidently as early as 1528 action was taken against Anabaptists. Anabaptists were found early near Lübeck (q.v.), where among others the Roosen (q.v.) family was located. In eastern Holstein the king issued an edict against the Anabaptists and Sacramentists in 1553. In southern Holstein, Anabaptists were found in Wandsbeck, Pinneberg, and Oldesloe (q.v.).

In the southwest the Anabaptists were important in the economic life, transforming certain aspects of agriculture; i.e., farmers changed from cattle raising to the production of milk and cheese. Some of the places mentioned are Wilster, Brockdorf, and Wewelsfleth. As in East Friesland the first Anabaptists in Schleswig-Holstein were primarily refugees from the Low Countries.

In Steinburg the Mennonites had to report to the government on Aug. 6, 1635, with the result that an edict was issued against them and they were asked to join the Lutheran Church. Another edict followed in 1642. From the early days the Mennonites enjoyed full privileges in Wüstenfelde (q.v.) near Oldesloe, Glückstadt (q.v.), and later in Altona (q.v.). Gradually the Mennonites disappeared from the rural areas, surviving only in such cities as Friedrichstadt, Altona, and Hamburg. A law of July 14, 1863, made it possible for Mennonites to settle and move freely throughout Schleswig-Holstein.

The Wüstenfelde congregation near Oldesloe, where Menno Simons and his followers found refuge, is unique. Menno Simons (q.v.) spent the last years of his life at Wüstenfelde, where he published his books, died, and was buried. The Wüstenfelde settlement was destroyed during the Thirty Years' War and most of the Mennonites moved to Altona. Here the Mennonites became city builders as in the case of Crefeld (q.v.). Outstanding was the van der Smissen (q.v.) family.

Only a few of the early Mennonite churches have survived, among them Friedrichstadt (q.v.) and Hamburg-Altona (q.v.); the latter has grown considerably since World War II because of the influx of Mennonite refugees from the East. Additional Mennonite congregations and groups have been established in Kiel (q.v.), Lübeck (q.v.), and the group known by the name of Schleswig-Holstein (q.v.), with one meetinghouse at Wedel, built in 1958.

Mennonite settlements were established in 1952 at Pinneberg-Rellingen. The MCC helped the refugees of Schleswig-Holstein first with Kiel as a center (1946-47) and later from Hamburg (1948-56). In 1950 the Mennonite refugee population of Schleswig-Holstein was 4,300, and in 1958 the total number affiliated with Mennonite congregations was about 2,000. C.K.

Schleswig-Holstein Mennonite Church is one of the newly organized congregations in the province by that name, consisting in 1957 of 380 Mennonite refugees from East Germany. Other places of meeting are Nordhastedt, Itzehoe, Elmsborn, Heiligenhafen, Lensahn, Eutin, Schleswig, Flensburg, Husum, Friedrichstadt. C.K.

Schmaus, Cuntz, an Anabaptist preacher, stemmed from Kupferberg near Würzburg, Germany, was won to the Anabaptists by Hans Hut (q.v.), and probably baptized by him in Vienna in 1527. From Vienna he went to Waldeck, where the two founded an Anabaptist congregation of one hundred brethren in two weeks. After Hut's departure Schmaus was chosen as their preacher. But he soon fell into the hands of Mattheus Lang von Wellenburg, Archbishop of Salzburg, who sent the results of the hearing, which contained valuable information, to the council of Augsburg on Nov. 27, 1527. Nothing further is heard of the fate of Schmaus. Very likely he was one of the thirty-eight persons who were locked into a house in Salzburg (q.v.) and burned with it in 1527. HEGE.

Schmid, Bastl, also called Bastl (Wastl) Anfang, a Hutterite preacher in Moravia, was seized with two companions, Heinrich Schweitzer and Uhl Schuster, on a missionary journey through the canton of Bern, Switzerland, on May 15, 1585. In the first two weeks Bastl was questioned three times by the Reformed clergy. In the fourth week all three were tortured to make them reveal the names of those who had sheltered them. Bastl was threatened with hanging, and even had the noose around his neck. The authorities finally saw that all questioning and torture were futile, and returned them to prison. After 20 weeks in prison, when the council had made preparations for the execution and had given them their "final" meal, popular vote opposed the execution. The council therefore decided to release the prisoners. Heinrich and Uhl were beaten "with rods and burned through the ears with hot irons," and whipped to the border. Then Bastl was released without further penalty, even though he refused to vow never to return to Bern. The three Brethren safely reached the community in Moravia. Schmid, Hans (Hänsel), also called Raiffer, probably because he was born in the Tirolean village of Raiffach, a Hutterite leader and martyr (d. 1558), successful missionary, composer of hymns, writer of letters and doctrinal tracts, a strong and leading personality, one of the noblest representatives of the second period of Anabaptism. The data of birth and conversion are not known. In 1548 (a period of severe persecution in Moravia) he was made minister and four years later was confirmed in this office. Soon thereafter he began his successful mission work in Germany: in 1555 he was in Hesse (district of Nidda), in 1556 in the Rhenish Palatinate around Kreuznach and Worms, where he won over a group of "Swiss Brethren" to the Hutterite way after long and serious debates, in 1557 he worked along the Lower Rhine and around Aachen, winning the important Swiss Brother Hans Arbeiter (q.v.) and other Swiss Brethren, most of whom now moved to Moravia like those from Kreuznach. Next his work led him into the Eifel district of Western Germany and again to Aachen. Here, on Jan. 9, 1558, during a meeting, he was surprised by city authorities and together with five brothers and six sisters (all of the former Hans Arbeiter group) he was imprisoned.

On the events between January 9 and the day of his execution, October 19, there is much detailed information thanks to the 35 extant letters and the 15 hymns written in prison, which material the Chronicle used for its graphic account. Raiffer had cherished some hope of finding leniency at the hands of the City Council, but of the twelve Anabaptists imprisoned five men were finally executed, the sixth recanted and was thereupon released (he returned to Moravia, repented, and was reaccepted by the Brethren), and the six women were flogged and driven out of the city. At one time all twelve were allowed to be together from 4 a.m. to 10 p.m., but then were separated again in different prisons. They sang overly loud as often as they could to comfort each other (see Singing, Hutterite), and they wrote letters to each other between their confinements, as well as letters to the Rhineland Brethren and those in Moravia. Schmid was badly racked but remained steadfast, defending his faith courageously and helping others to do likewise. Of his 35 letters from prison 15 were addressed to his "marital sister" (wife) Madlen (Magdalena) in Moravia. Apparently messengers could communicate freely with the prisoners. A wealthy woman in Aachen sent them extra food, but Schmid refused it unless she would change her mind and allegiance. All attempts to persuade him failed as they did with nearly all Anabaptists; accordingly the city authorities finally had to obey the imperial mandates issued by the "new" emperor Ferdinand I (q.v.). In October 1558, all five brethren were publicly strangled and then burned.

Of this unusually strong personality we get a vivid picture from his numerous writings, which places him on the level of Peter Riedemann (q.v.). Letters—The letters are found in many Hutterite codices, which proves their popular appeal. Of the 37 letters the 35 written in Aachen are described above (excerpts of one are to be found in Wolkan's Geschicht-Buch, 292, note). Seventeen of these are scheduled to be published in a forthcoming volume of Anabaptist epistles edited by the present writer. One letter (perhaps of 1557), written to Romies Caltenburg and dealing with the Incarnation, is extant in a codex in Bratislava. Schmid discussed this topic several times (Chronik, 384 and 387), repeating more or less the Nicene creed. One letter of 1555

(now in Darmstadt) written to the Rentmeister of Nidda (TA Hesse, 332-36) contains a defense against slander and a sort of summary of Anabaptist teaching.

Doctrinal Writings—Of Schmid's doctrinal writings the following are known: (A) Eine Rechen-schaft vom Abendmahl und seiner rechten Bedeutung, written in prison in Aachen and sent to his fellow prisoners as well as to the Brethren in Moravia, obviously a repetition of his oral defense before the authorities. This document (to be published in Glaubenszeugnisse II, as No. 12) has two parts: (a) a defense of the Zwinglian theology of the Lord's Supper (the symbolical interpretation); (b) Vom rechten Gebrauch . . ., which explains the idea of community (Gemeinschaft) both with Christ and with the Brethren (excerpts of this tract in Wiswedel, Bilder III, 97-99). (B) Brüderliche Vereinigung zwischen uns und etlichen Schweizer Brüdern (1556), containing the debate with Lorenz Huelf and others at Kreuznach, a statement of the Hutterite position in seven articles (Chronik, 361-66) in which the main differences from the Swiss Brethren position are formulated. Andreas Ehrenpreis (q.v.) reprinted this piece in his Sendbrief of 1652. The article concerning marriage and divorce is very informative, and so is the one concerning ministers and their special honors (see Ministers, Hutterite, etc.). (C) One year later Schmid discussed 17 articles with Hans Arbeiter, the titles of which are named but their contents not published. Here we find also two theological items: Concerning Original Sin, and Concerning the Incarnation of Christ. One may safely assume that Schmid's views coincided with those of Riedemann.

Hymns—The Liederbuch der Hutterischen Brüder (pp. 551-611) contains 15 hymns by Schmid (hymn No. 3 is not by Schmid but about him), and six hymns by his coprisoners, most of them of great beauty and depth. Wolkan (211-28) discusses them at great length, reprinting five of them in full, and claiming that with Schmid and Riedemann Hutterite hymn composition reached its climax. Wiswedel (99, note 5) claims that Schmid composed 24 hymns, but does not report further. One hymn is printed by Wackernagel, Kirchenlied III, 812. One hymn, "O herre Gott vom Himmelreich merck auff und sieh die worte . . .," composed by Schmid and Jörg von Ingenheim, is found in the rare German hymnal Ein Schon Gesangbüchlein (q.v.). The main theme of all these hymns is love, obedience to God, community, and Gelassenheit (q.v.), a key attitude of the Anabaptists. Of particular beauty is hymn No. 4, "Fröhlich so wollen wir singen," a deeply felt praise of Christian love. Many a hymn shows the typical Anabaptist acrostic—a hidden message composed by the first words of each stanza. (For details see Chronik, 385 note.)

The names of the brethren who were martyred with Schmid are Heinrich Adam, Hans Weckh, Matthias Schmied, and Tillman Schneider. R.F.

Schmid, Konrad (1467-1531), a Swiss Reformed clergyman, born at Küsnacht on Lake Zürich, was appointed as commander (Comtur) of the Johannite monastery in 1519. Soon after, he became a close friend of Ulrich Zwingli (q.v.) and zealously promoted the Reformation in Zürich, publicly advocating the Reformation in the second disputation, Oct. 26-28, 1523. The topics of the debate at this large, important meeting were the unscripturalness of the images of saints and the veneration of the saints, and the Catholic Mass. In the course of the debate Konrad Schmid said tactfully that everything must proceed from God's Word, the pure Gospel, which teaches us to acknowledge Christ as the only Mediator, to whom alone honor is due. He was trying to say thereby that iconoclasm was not the essential of the Reformation, but the acceptance of Jesus Christ as Saviour. His well-meant admonitions, however, did not find universal acceptance. Even Zwingli was not altogether satisfied with him, and declared to him, "When . . . the commander remarks that everyone should first be instructed in the divine Word, that pleases me very well; if the priests had preached the Word, the populace would not have followed unfruitful things, and it would never have reached the point where one could learn to know Christ only through paintings. But if one were to postpone the removal of the images until it could create no offense, it would never happen."

On the afternoon of the third day there was a lively discussion on the Mass. Opinion as to its abolition was divided, although Zwingli had recognized the Mass as reprehensible idolatry. During this indecision Conrad Grebel (q.v.) urged the immediate abolition of the Mass by vote of the meeting, since it was not a sacrifice, but was sufficiently shown from the Scriptures to be an error, and all abuses should be uncovered and eliminated. Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.) supported Grebel and tried to explain that the Mass was nothing but a distortion of the symbols of the communion: the body and blood of Christ. He demanded that the Mass should be read in the mother tongue. Zwingli agreed with both and added that anything that had forced its way into the church without Christ's institution was an abuse of the divine, and must be countered with God's Word. But he wanted to leave the matter of eliminating the abuses to the government, whereupon Simon Stumpf (q.v.) replied that he had no right to submit the decision in spiritual matters into the hands of temporal government.

Then Konrad Schmid made an important speech, summarized as follows: Although God has completed everything in Christ people still practice superstition. It is the duty of the council to issue orders to honor, worship, and call upon God alone, and not to worship images. Christian regents should issue Scriptural decrees "that in their lands and realms none but Christ should be called upon, worshiped, and honored, and recognized as the only comforter and helper in need and Lord of all things." Paul too was protected by temporal authority when the Jews were about to kill him. If the Gospel is again brought to the world cheerfully and clearly, Christ's reign will be established. "You have hitherto assisted many a temporal prince to regain his rule for the sake of money, now for the sake of God assist Christ our Lord to regain His kingdom." "If Christ were permitted to be the only Lord and Master of all things, so that He could reign in us and fulfill His work, we would have brotherly love among us, Christian peace, divine grace and mercy here in time and afterward eternal life."

This address of Konrad Schmid's was a clever defense of an ecclesiastico-political, theocratic view. It made an enormous impression on the hearers, but more important, it brought about the union of the temporal power with the spiritual. This was the formal introduction of the Reformed State Church. From this time on the clergy saw in the church only an institution of the state, which in accord with the ordinance of God (Rom. 13) was authorized to dictate faith and if necessary use the sword against the "unbelieving."

This union, however, became the point of division between the Swiss Brethren and Zwingli. Zwingli and Schmid acquired power that developed into a dictatorship, beside which no other view was permitted. Then a committee was appointed to carry out the work of the Reformation: Zwingli, Wolfgang Joner, Heinrich Brennwald, Heinrich Engelhard, Leo Jud, four councillors, and Konrad Schmid.

In the late fall of 1525 Schmid was one of the four presidents of the third disputation on the question of baptism, the others being Wolfgang Joner of Kappel, Dr. Sebastian Hofmeister of Schaffhausen, and Joachim von Watt (Vadian) of St. Gall. It seems that at that point he abandoned his moderate point of view in matters of faith and became a violent opponent of the Swiss Brethren.

At the great disputation at Bern in the summer of 1528, where the Reformation was decided upon, Konrad Schmid was again one of the four presidents. Having in his home town participated in the bitter struggle against the Swiss Brethren, Schmid may have been so much the more annoyed to meet some of them at the Bern disputation. He published a polemic against them with the title, Verwerffen der Artickeln und stucken so die Wider-täufer uff dem gesprach zu Bernn, vor ersamen grossen Radt jürgewendt habend. Durch Cunraden Schmid, Commenthur zu Küsnacht am Zürich See. Its purpose was to induce the leaders to adopt the same policy as had been adopted at Zürich. This pamphlet, filled with epithets from the animal and demon worlds, contains many falsehoods and perversions. Schmid went so far as to assert that the Swiss Brethren were "the worst enemies of the cross of Christ, the like of which has never yet been found in any history." They were the ones who annul Christ and in His place pour forth their devilish baptism." It was his opinion that they could expect nothing but eternal damnation, and "would be cast into the lower world as the Gadarene swine had been cast into the sea, unless they returned to the unity of the Christian church, besides which there is no way to bliss." "What the devil has spun, the Swiss Brethren have reeled"; yet these erring ones had at the disputation of Bern in 1528 been quite kindly dismissed by the honorable council (with prison and threat of death)!

It is sad that so influential and gifted a man as Konrad Schmid allowed himself to be led to such boundless distortions. Hubmaier reports in his letter from Zurich, "The Johannite priest, Commander at Küssnacht," in whom there is in truth nothing but talk and pomp, "was one of those most to blame for the severity of the government measures against the Anabaptists."

Schmid served in both Kappel wars, 1529 and 1531, as an army chaplain. Like his friend Zwingli he died in battle in 1531. After his death Bullinger wrote of him, "This Conrad Schmid was a pious man, helped much in the Reformation, as can be seen in all the records." S.G.

Schmidt (Schmid, Smit, Smet, Schmitt, Smith) is a common Mennonite name, particularly among the Mennonites of Prusso-Russian background. The name appears in the early church records of Thiensdorf, Orloffsfelde, Danzig, Elbing, Jeziorka, Przechovka, Konopat, and Kazun. Particularly from the latter groups the name was transplanted to Russia and America. The first records of the name in Prussia date back to 1586. Hilchen (Hiltje) Smet (Smid) was elder of the Montau Mennonite Church in 1588. Hans Schmidt, a Hutterite preacher of Moravia, who was an evangelizing missionary in Württemberg, died in 1602. From the Przechovka-Alexanderwohl church record we learn that the first bearer of the name fled in 1634 with Tobias Schellenberger from Moravia to Hungary and then to Przechovka. He is supposed to have received the name because he was a master smith. Most of his descendants lived in the villages of Przechovka, Konopat, and Jeziorka. Some of them settled later in the Polish-Russian villages of Heinrichsdorf and Michalin.

Several Schmidts from Przechovka joined the group of Mennonite immigrants to the Molotschna settlement, where they established the village and congregation of Alexanderwohl (q.v.). In 1874 most of them settled in the community of Goessel, Kan., while those from Heinrichsdorf and Michalin established the congregations and communities of Gnadenberg, Canton, Pawnee Rock, Kan., and Avon, S.D. Later the family spread over most of the states and provinces west of the Mississippi River. The name was also transplanted to Canada and South America. The Alexanderwohl church, with its 991 members, has 135 whose surname is Schmidt (1954). Some of the bearers of the name, particularly of South German background, have changed the name to Smith. The connection between the Schmidts among the Mennonites of South German and Prussian background has never been fully investigated. It is likely that they are not of the same ancestry.

Among the Mennonite leaders of Russia were Nikolai Schmidt and Johann Schmidt, members of the Board of the Gnadenfeld Bruderschule and co-founders of the Friends of Jerusalem (Templers). P. P. Schmidt (1860-1910) of the Molotschna settlement was a cofounder of the Evangelical Mennonite Church. Hermann Schmitt of South Germany was a missionary under the Dutch Mennonite Mission Board in Indonesia. Who's Who Among the Mennonites (North Newton, 1943) lists the following: Albert G. Schmidt, minister; August Schmidt, teacher and minister; Augusta Schmidt, missionary; H. U. Schmidt, minister; H. R. Schmidt, M.D.; J. R. Schmidt, M.D.; R. Schmidt, minister. Others are H. B. Schmidt, minister; John F. Schmidt, professor. John Smith (1843-1906), a prominent bishop in the Mennonite Church (MC) at Roanoke, Ill., was of Alsatian Amish stock. C. Henry Smith (q.v.) was his son. Professor Willard Smith of Goshen College is his grandson, as is Tilman R. Smith, president of Hesston College 1959—. J. B. Smith (q.v., 1870-1951), a prominent Mennonite (MC) minister at Elida, Ohio, and sometime president of Eastern Mennonite College, was of an Ontario Mennonite family. His son Paul and nephew Norman are ministers (MC) at Elida and Cloverdale, Ohio.

Schmidt, C. (Carl) B. (Bernhard) (1843-1921?), who because of his activities as land agent for the Santa Fe in promoting the Russian Mennonite immigration to Kansas became known as "the Moses of the Mennonites," was born Sept. 7, 1843, in Dipoldiswalde, Saxony, Germany. In 1863 he became foreign correspondent in a commercial house at Hamburg. In 1864 he went to America, living in St. Louis until he came to Kansas in 1868. He became a grocer in Lawrence, later also becoming an implement salesman. As a correspondent for several German newspapers he established contact with people who wished to migrate to America.

In 1873 Schmidt began his service for the Santa Fe. Through his contacts with Cornelius Jansen (q.v.), the Board of Guardians (q.v.), and individual leaders, Schmidt influenced thousands of the Mennonites to settle in Kansas, concluding the sale of 100,000 acres of land in October 1874. In 1875 he went to Russia to persuade more Mennonites to come to Kansas. He served the Santa Fe until most of the railroad land was sold. He became personally acquainted with the Mennonite leaders; the files of David Goerz (q.v.), Christian Krehbiel (q.v.), and others in the BeCL contain extensive correspondence signed by C. B. Schmidt.

After dissolving his association with the Santa Fe Schmidt managed the Equitable Trust Company in Omaha, Neb. In 1880 he set up the London office of the Santa Fe. In 1895 he went to Pueblo, Col., as manager of the Suburban Land and Investment Company and director of the Bessemer irrigation ditch. Later he became commissioner of immigration of the Rock Island Lines, and 1914-16 he was a colonization agent of the Wyoming Development Company, with offices in Chicago. He again carried on an extensive correspondence with Mennonites, particularly H. P. Krehbiel, in an endeavor to sell lands in the area of Wheatland, Wyoming. J.F.S.

Schmidt, Christel, a Hutterite hymn writer, was excommunicated in 1564 on account of his views on divorce. Wolkan states that Schmidt is the author of a story about Judith. The Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder does not include him. Horsch mentions an "Epistel an Claus Braidl aus seinem Gefängnis 1586."

Schmidt, Christian (1833-1906), an elder of the Mennonite Brethren in Russia, was born at Constantinograd in 1833. He was a cabinetmaker by trade, and lived in Tokmak in 1864. In the church he opposed the "Ueberfröhlichen," presented to the councillor Brun on Dec. 6, 1865, an important document, the Selbstbekenntnis (Confession of faith), which contains exact information on the Mennonite Brethren. In 1872 he was appointed traveling evangelist with Jakob Jantz, and published an account of the journey in a yearbook the two founded in 1865. In 1868 he moved to the Kuban (q.v.). He was ordained as elder in Friedensfeld (q.v.) on June 15, 1875. He died there in 1906. (ML IV.)

Schmidt, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr: see Schmid, Hans.

Schmidt (Schmied), Hans, an Anabaptist martyr of Uttenreuth, was beheaded in June 1531 at Baidersdorf, Bavaria, Germany. (TA Bayern, 369; Wappler, Thüringen, 37.)

Schmidt, Hans, von Rommelshausen (d. 1602), a Hutterite brother from Württemberg whose experiences on a mission in his native country in 1590 are graphically described in a very remarkable epistle. This epistle relates that he had been won for Anabaptism in 1581, and had left Württemberg and gone to Moravia, joining the Hutterites. Here he married. In 1590, he was sent to his home country to spread the Gospel, and after many months of successful work was caught by the authorities and now badly treated, being moved from prison to prison, each worse than the one before. In Schorndorf (q.v.) he met his father and his brothers who pleaded with him to return to their (official) church, but also gave bond for him to the authorities. The most interesting passage in the epistle is the discussion concerning the "sword": the bailiff (Vogt) of one of the castles where he was kept asked him whether, if Turks were to invade the country, he would not want to defend it by the sword. Thereupon Schmidt answered: "The Turk prides himself on being a Turk and he is a Turk; but the alleged Christians pride themselves on being Christians according to the flesh, but then they persecute the true Christians . . . they are Turks according to the Spirit" (Bosser, 656). These are almost the same words with which Michael Sattler (q.v.) answered his judges at his trial in 1527 (when the Turkish danger was imminent). Obviously Schmidt was familiar with the booklet in which Sattler's trial was described.

Schmidt was badly racked and tempted by all kinds of means; but he did not yield. Eventually, upon the intercession of his father he was released and expelled from the country without having pledged never to return. He had been kept in prison from the middle of August to Dec. 4, 1590. After his release he sent the epistle with all these details home to Moravia. In one codex this epistle covers not less than 24 leaves, in Beck's copy (now at Brno) it covers 54 handwritten pages, in print 13½ pages folio, allowing a deep insight into the life, thought, and technique of these missionaries—all at the end of the 16th century when many had assumed that Anabaptism was on its way out.

Having returned to Moravia, Schmidt was chosen preacher in 1591, and was confirmed in this office in 1596. He died in 1602 at the Stignitz Bruderhof near Moravian Kromau.

Schmidt, Johann, was ordained minister in 1894 and elder in 1896 in the Deutsch-Wymysle Mennonite Church (q.v.) near Warsaw, Poland, when his predecessor Johann Kliever (q.v.) joined the local Mennonite Brethren congregation. In 1907 he also joined the Mennonite Brethren leaving the Deutsch-Wymysle congregation without an elder. The observance of baptism and Lord's Supper in the remaining small congregation was supervised by the elder of the Deutsch-Kazun Mennonite Church. Johann Schmidt moved to Deutsch-Kazun in 1930, where he died on Feb. 26, 1936. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 719; see also Deutsch-Wymysle.)

Two songs by Matthias Schmidt have been preserved: "Merkt auf, ihr Völker, alle gleich in diesen letzten Zeiten," and "Wacht auf, ihr Streiter, Kämpfer, ihr Kinder Gottes rein." NEFF.

Schmidt, Nikolai (1815-74), primarily responsible for the founding of the Templer (q.v.) movement among the Mennonites of the Molotschna settlement, Russia, was born July 20, 1815. During his journeys in Germany he became acquainted with the educational institute Kirschenhardthof, Württemberg, under Christoph Paulus. Johannes Lange (q.v.) was sent to attend this school and became the first teacher of the Gnadenfeld (q.v.) Bruderschule (established in 1857), of which Nikolai and Johann Schmidt (q.v.) were board members. This school became the testing ground which led to the founding of the Mennonite Brethren and the Templer movements. Nikolai Schmidt was an outstanding leader of the movement, transplanting the ideas of the Templer movement from South Germany into the Mennonite environment of the Molotschna and in the establishment of the Tempelhof (q.v.) settlement at Kuban (q.v.). He went to Palestine to investigate settlement possibilities and died on the way to Palestine at Toganrog, on Sept. 14, 1874, while migrating with a group.

His son, Nikolai Schmidt II, born Sept. 29, 1839, as well as grandson, Nikolai Schmidt III, born April 13, 1876, also played a significant role in the movement. The latter was mayor of the Templer colony of Jerusalem after World War I and leader of the group during the trying years of World War II. He died in Australia, Jan. 10, 1953. C.K.

Schmidt, Peter, was chairman of the Molotschna Mennonite Agricultural Association and chairman of the Molotschna Mennonite School Council. He owned and lived on the estate Steinbach (q.v.), where he had his office. He also established a secondary school on this estate, taught by Peter Neufeld. Peter Schmidt was very influential in the cultural life of the Mennonites of the Molotschna settlement. He was a nephew of Klaas Wiens, the founder of the Steinbach estate. The exact dates of his life are not known, but the peak of his activities was c1850-69.

Another Peter Schmidt (1860-1910) of Steinbach (q.v.), an elder of the Steinbach congregation, was evidently a son of the above. He was a great benefactor to various Mennonite causes, including the Morija (q.v.) Deaconess Home. P. M. Friesen speaks highly of his consecrated Christian living. He died on May 30, 1910, at the age of fifty. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 162, 166 f., 645 ff., 659, 725.) C.K.

Schmiedeleut, one of the three Hutterite kinship groups (the other two being the Dariusleut, q.v., and the Lehrerleut, q.v.), so named because its founder, Preacher Michael Waldner, was a blacksmith (Schmied) in Russia. Michael Waldner was the first to re-establish communal living in Bruderhof form, which he did in 1859 in one end of the village of Hutterdorf in the Ukraine (see Dariusleut). The Waldner Bruderhof migrated to South Dakota in 1874 and settled the Bon Homme Colony near Yankton. This was the first Hutterite Bruderhof in America and is commonly, though wrongly, thought of as the mother Bruderhof of all Hutterites in America. The second kinship group, the Dariusleut, which was established in 1860 in the same Hutterdorf village in Russia, arrived in South Dakota later in 1874 and did not establish its first Bruderhof (Wolf Creek) until the next year, 1875. The Schmiedeleut Bruderhofs in the United States are now all in South Dakota, and those in Canada are all in Manitoba, and they are the only group having Bruderhofs in these two locations. Their leader or bishop is Peter Hofer, James Valley Colony, Starbuck, Man., who was chosen in 1951. Following is a list of the Schmiedeleut Bruderhofs as they existed in 1957. It should be noted that the Forest River Bruderhof, Fordville, N.D., was dissolved in 1955, because a considerable number of families joined the New Hutterites (Society of Brothers) and moved away. Schmitt, Hermann, a German Mennonite of the Deutschhof (q.v.) congregation, was sent out in November 1926 by the Dutch Mennonite Missions Association as a missionary on Java (q.v.), serving at Tajoe (q.v.) and Margoredjo (q.v.). During World War II the ship on which Schmitt and his brother-in-law Otto Stauffer (q.v.), also a missionary, were transported was torpedoed in the Indian Ocean on Jan. 18, 1942, and both perished. vdZ.

Schmitt Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, at Edgely in the Mennonite settlement of Vaughan and York townships in York Co., Ont., was located 15 miles north of Toronto and 12 miles west of the Markham settlement. The families came from Pennsylvania about 1800. Peter Musselman was the first minister. Christian Troyer was ordained after Musselman's death in 1830. Daniel Brundage became minister about 1845. The meetinghouse, the oldest Mennonite church in Ontario still standing, was erected in 1824. The membership, about 50, was strongest about 1875. Since then the Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church has been more active. After the division of 1889 there were few members for either party, and the congregation died out. The Brethren in Christ were active in Vaughan Township throughout the 19th century. J.C.F.

Schmucker: see Smucker.

Schmutz, a Mennonite family name, originating in Switzerland. In 1717 the name is listed for the first time in Anabaptist Registers of the Palatinate, South Germany, when a Christian Schmutz was living at Helmstadt (now Baden). Some members of the family probably emigrated to America at the end of the 18th century, and to England in the middle of the 19th century. It is now most numerous among the South German Mennonites. In 1755, according to the Naamlijst, Abraham and Christian Schmutz were preachers in the congregation called Hasselbach, Martinshof, Helmstedt, and Sennfeld. Christian Schmutz (q.v., 1799-1873), of Rappenu, Baden, called "Christel-Vetter," was an outstanding leader and preacher in the congregations of the Gemeindeverband (q.v.). U.H.

Friedrich Schmutz, Zweihundertvierzig Jahre Familiengeschichte [1692-1935]. Ein Stammbaum der Familien Schmutz (Leuterstal, 1936); ML IV.

Schmutz, Christian (1799-1873), an elder of the Mennonites in Baden (q.v.), Germany, was born Oct. 19, 1799, at Rappenu, Baden. An invalid from his youth, he visited a spa in Cannstatt in Württemberg at the age of twenty-two, and was deeply impressed by some Christian believers at the place. Upon the death of his father he took over the home farm. In 1858 he gave up farming in order to devote all his time and strength to the service of the brotherhood. At the age of thirty he was chosen preacher, and five years later elder. His work extended far beyond the borders of his brotherhood. In the early volumes of the Mennonitische Blätter, 1855 and 1856, he wrote three excellent articles on "Die Mennonitengemeinden im Grossherzogtum Baden," and in 1858 on the Mennonites of Switzerland. In 1860 he sharply opposed the proposed Menno-Stiftung (q.v.) and any human honoring of Menno, and at the same time opposed a trained ministry. Special mention should be made of his six open letters to all the ministers, in which he expressed his religious views without reservation. When the Gemeindeblatt der Mennoniten appeared in 1870, which was founded at his instigation, he was one of the most devoted collaborators. He wrote a series of valuable articles for it. In 1865 he published a catechism under the title Christliches Lehrbüchlein, which is used by Mennonites outside Baden and was adopted by the Swiss Mennonites. His manuscript became the basis for the Ministers' Manual of the Gemeindeverband (q.v.), Leitfaden zum Gebrauch bei gottesdienstlichen Handlungen (1876). He died Nov. 18, 1873. (Menn. Jugendwarte, 1920, 12 ff.; ML IV.) NEFF.

Schmutz, Christine, of Rappenau, Baden, Germany, published in 1880 a booklet called Samenkörner der Wahrheit, ausgestreut für wahrheitsliebende Herzen, which, redolent of the spirit of the Temple Church (q.v.), was expressly repudiated by the conference of elders of the Baden Mennonites. (Gbl., 1800, 23; ML IV.)

Schnabel, Georg, a Hessian Anabaptist preacher, previously a treasurer in Allendorf, a town on the Werra near Kassel, Germany, was seized with thirty other Anabaptists at a meeting in an abandoned church at Gemunden, and imprisoned with ten brethren at Wolkersdorf. From there he and three others who were regarded as second offenders were taken to Marburg.

Soon they were returned to the Wolkersdorf prison. Their confinement was rather mild; they were allowed some freedom of movement. Georg Schnabel confessed to the magistrate at Marburg that he had repeatedly left the prison and baptized about thirty persons. When Noviomagus (q.v.), a professor at the University of Marburg, and Fabricius (q.v.), the pastor of Allendorf, were sent to Wolkersdorf by Philip of Hesse in August 1538 to convert the prisoners, Georg Schnabel was already at home with his family.

But they found a copy of the booklet Schnabel had written, Verantwortung und Wiederlegung der Artikel, so jetzund im Land zu Hessen über die armen Davider, die man Wiedertäufer nennt, ausgegangen sind. It was written with the purpose of refuting the charges raised by the church inspection committee against the Anabaptists, and to strengthen his brethren in the faith. With an amazing knowledge of the Bible Schnabel presents Anabaptist teachings and with determination repudiates the charges of communal possession of property and of wives, as well as the rejection of government.

For two years all the untiring efforts of the landgrave to convert the Anabaptists were in vain. Finally Bucer (q.v.), the reformer of Strasbourg, who had been summoned by Philip, succeeded in a disputation held on Oct. 30 to Nov. 1, 1538, in persuading the imprisoned Anabaptists to recant. They signed the "Bekenntnis oder Antwort etlicher Fragestücke oder Artikeln der gefangenen Täufer und anderer im Land zu Hessen," which was drawn up by Peter Tasch (q.v.), and were received into the church. Schnebele (Schnebeli, Schnebly, Schnebel, Snavely), a Mennonite family name of Swiss origin, found especially in the Palatinate. In 1533 Bernhart Schnebli, of Affoltern, Swiss canton of Zürich, is named as an Anabaptist. In 1660 Jakob Schnebely, of Baldenheim in Alsace, signed the Dordrecht Confession in Ohnenheim (q.v.). In 1706 Hans Jakob Schnebely is named in Mannheim; in 1710 and later he corresponded with Dutch and Alsatian Mennonites in the cause of the Swiss refugees. As a preacher or elder he obviously held a position of trust. Other members of the family were living on the Rohrbach and at Gräfenau.

Jakob Schnebele (1727-76) came to Fischbach (q.v.) by way of the Mückenhäuserhof, near Ibersheim. Christian Schnebele (1739-1808), living either at Frankenstein or Diemerstein, was a preacher 1765-? and an elder 1781-1808, first in the Diemerstein congregation, and later in Sembach. Some descendants of Jakob went to Wartenberg, Mehlingen, Rohrbach, etc. Others emigrated to the United States in the 19th century. Among these was Jakob Schnebele, of Ernstweiler, a preacher who in 1852 led a group of Mennonites from Eichstock (q.v.) in Bavaria to Iowa. A Joseph Schnebele, of Hornbach, a preacher of the Zweibrücken congregation (q.v.) in 1766 gave information for the Dutch Naamlijst (q.v.) to Peter Weber (q.v.).

Another descendant of the Wartenberg-Rohrbach branch is Christian Schnebele (1888-), a son of Jakob and Elisabeth Kinsinger Schnebele. He married Emma Pohl, a daughter of Matthias Pohl (q.v.) of Sembach. Schnebele was educated for the ministry at St. Chrischona, near Basel, Switzerland, in 1906-9, and then served in home and city missions, especially at Worms; in 1924 he was appointed housefather of the "Bibelheim Thomashof" (q.v.) and at the same time served the Badischer Verband (q.v.) as traveling evangelist (Reiseprediger). Since 1925 he has been the editor of the Gemeindeblatt der Mennoniten (q.v.). His son Adolf Schnebele (1922-), a minister, is a Reiseprediger for the Verband. P.S.

Schneider, Adam, a young Hutterite, who was seized with Anderle Schlosser at Oettingen (q.v.) in April 1578, while they were on their way from Tirol to Moravia; they were severely tortured and subjected to many attempts to convert them. They, however, made a marvelous escape from prison and reached the brotherhood in Moravia. (Wolkan, Geschicht-Buch, 389-91; ML IV.)

Schneider, Bernhard, an Anabaptist martyr, "a young fellow" from Frisingen near Laubingen, baptized in Neckarweihingen, Württemberg, Germany, was imprisoned with other brethren at Passau (q.v.) and confessed on Sept. 18, 1535, that he had joined the Anabaptists two years before and then moved to Auspitz (q.v.), Moravia, and lived there until now. "They have no permanent place," but move from one place to another, "wherever God leads them, to places where they are permitted to work and stay." With the Münsterites they had nothing to do, nor were they opponents of government, "if it is with God." Only government that is contrary to God he would not obey, but would not rebel against it either, but leave vengeance to God. He is the author of the hymn, "O Herr Gott, mein Not tu ich dir klagen." He also wrote one stanza of the song "Mit freuden wolln wir singen." (See Philippite Brethren.) NEFF.

Schneider, Leonhard, an Anabaptist martyr of Kaufbeuren, Germany, was seized with Hans Staudach (q.v.), Anthoni Keim, and Blasy Beck (see Beckh, Blasius) en route to Moravia on Aug. 3, 1546. They were taken to Vienna and beheaded on Nov. 22, 1546. Their death is commemorated in two hymns written by Wolf Sailer (q.v.) and Hans Gurtzham (q.v.). NEFF.

Schneider, Michael, a Philippite Anabaptist and hymn writer, originally of Bruchsal (q.v.), Baden, where he joined the group of Philipp Plener (q.v.) in 1527. With Plener he went to Moravia and lived at the Bruderhof at Auspitz (q.v.). When, in 1535, the entire brotherhood of the Philippites broke up into several groups to return to Southwest Germany, Plener in a last act as bishop ordained Michael Schneider as leader (also called "bishop") of a group of about 60 souls who seem to have had Bruchsal as their destination. In August and September of 1535 this "Schneider group" was caught at Passau and imprisoned there 1535-40. We know something of these people through the Passauer Religionsakten (used by Wolkan) but unfortunately the records concerning Schneider are lost. Schneider's wife was among the prisoners, and all the prisoners deposed that Schneider had been their "bishop" or leader. He was also one of the prisoners, as related in the oldest part of the Ausbund (q.v.), which contains the hymns of these Passau Philip-pites. In the dungeons of the Passau castle 52 hymns were composed, eleven of which had Schneider as author, namely, Nos. (in modern editions) 82, 85, 87, 93, 95, 96, 97, 99, 101, and together with Hans Betz or Petz (a.v.) as coauthor, Nos. 102 and 103. Wackernagel (III and IV) also prints them.

In his Lieder der Wiedertäufer, Wolkan analyzed all these hymns in great detail and rated Schneider as "a true poet" and a composer of great depth of feeling and power of expression. In fact he rates Schneider as more profound than Betz. Schneider's main concern is discipleship, which becomes possible only by practicing Gelassenheit (q.v.), that is, surrender to God in the hour of testing. Even in his agony Schneider prays for his enemies (No. 85, stanza 3). Hymn No. 87 is one great praise of the power of love. He has a deep grasp of the meaning of martyrdom for the true disciple of Christ. Wolkan points out that Schneider avoids all dogmatic questions, touching only the Lord's Supper.

Nothing is known about Schneider's fate. Since no death penalty was practiced in Passau, he either died in prison with many others (e.g., Betz), or was finally freed. But no details are recorded. The Hutterite Chronicle omits his name. (Wolkan, Lieder; Wackernagel, Kirchenlied; see Philippite Brethren.) R.F.

His two sons were then imprisoned in the same place but escaped. Meanwhile the authorities sold their home for 7,000 guilders, and put the children out among strangers. (*Mart. Schniftenbergerhof near Alzey (q.v.) in Rhenish Hesse, Germany, is listed in the Dutch Naamlijst of 1794 (p. 44) as a Mennonite congregation with Christian Eicher as preacher (from 1786) and Jacob Gally as elder (1767). Gally (Galle) was also the elder of the Weierhof (q.v.) and Spiesheim (q.v.)-Wallertheim congregations. Of the Schniftenbergerhof congregation little is known. Probably meetings were held for some time at this farm, which was the center of a group of Mennonites and a more or less independent congregation, soon after 1794 merging with a neighboring church, either Weierhof or Oberflörsheim (q.v.).

Schoen, a Mennonite family found in the Zaan district, Dutch province of North Holland, from the 16th century. Willem Jansz Schoen, a baker at Wormerveer, was a preacher of the Wormerveer Frisian Mennonite congregation 1699-c1745. His three sons did not bear the family name of Schoen, but different names—Jan Willemsz Blaauw, Melis Willemsz La(a)keman, and Dirk Willemsz Breeuwer. Jan Willemsz Blaauw and Dirk Willemsz Breeuwer are the ancestors of the Blaauw and Breeuwer families, whose descendants are still found in many Mennonite congregations of North Holland. The Schoen family is also found at Zaandam. Here Simon Schoen was on friendly terms with Czar Peter of Russia, who lived at Zaandam for a time in 1697. There were many Schoens at Zaandam-West; some of them were deacons of the congregation and governesses of the Mennonite orphanage. In Zaandam is the famous dye factory of Pieter Schoen and Son Limited, which developed from a dye mill of the 17th century owned by Pieter Schoen, who was a Mennonite, as were his descendants. In other towns of the Zaan district, like Zaandam-Oost, Westzaan, and Koog, there were also some members of this family. Most of the Schoens were Mennonites, some belonged to the Reformed Church, and a few were Roman Catholics.

Schoenwiese Mennonite Church (GCM) of Manitoba, a member of the Canadian Mennonite Conference, consists of a group of congregations. When the Mennonite refugees from Russia came to Canada in 1923, Elder Johann Peter Klassen of Schönwiese in Russia gathered 22 new Mennonite settlements in Manitoba into one church, which was first called the Starbuck Mennonite Church, but changed to its present name in 1929. The Schoenwiese congregation has expanded into the following churches: Springstein 1939, Schoenfeld 1939, Steinbach 1942 (in part from other congregations), Niverville 1944, Glenlea 1945, and North Kildonan 1956.

The present (1958) Schoenwiese Mennonite Church consists of the following groups: First Mennonite Church of Winnipeg, 1,026 members; Oak Lake Mennonite Church 75, Petersfield Group 17, Steinbach Group 24, and scattered 135; the total membership is 1,277. The elder is Johann Hermann Enns, successor of Johann Peter Klassen.

Scholtens, Harm(en) (May 2, 1703-74), was a minister of the Groningen Old Flemish Mennonite congregation at Groningen, Netherlands. In 1738 he was appointed preacher, in 1755 elder (later called opziener). Like other elders of this denomination he paid an annual visit to all congregations in his district. In 1766, accompanied by other elders, he negotiated at Amsterdam concerning a merger of the Groningen Old Flemish group and the Zonists (q.v.), but this union did not come into being because most of the Old Flemish congregations opposed it. Scholtens did much in behalf of the oppressed Mennonites in West Prussia, Germany. Though co-operating with the (general) Dutch Committee of Foreign Needs at Amsterdam, the Old Flemish also organized a special relief action of their own, particularly for the (Old Flemish) congregations of Przechovka (q.v.) and Brenkenhoffsvalde (q.v.) in 1766. Scholtens was the soul of this action. He also acted as an intermediary between the Amsterdam Committee of Foreign Needs and the Swiss Mennonites who had settled near Groningen and Sappemeer.

Schominger, Wolf, also called Wolf Schreiner, a carpenter by trade, an Anabaptist martyr of Königsberg (q.v.) in Lower Franconia, Germany, beheaded in March 1527 with several others. His home was the center of the local Anabaptist congregation. In January 1527, when the preachers Eukarius Kellermann (brother-in-law of Schominger) and Kilian Volkamer, of Grosswalbur, again appeared in the region of Königsberg their meetings came to the attention of the authorities. In February 1527 seven Anabaptists were arrested—the miller of Aurach, Kaspar Spiegel, Beutelhans (q.v.), Hans Furster (the brother-in-law of Beutelhans), Wolf Schominger, and two others. Schon Gesangbüchlein, an old hymnal whose full title was Ein schon ge-/ sangbüchlein Geistlicher lieder / zusammen getragen, Auss dem Alten und / Newen Testament, Durch frome Christen / und liebhaber Gottes, welcher hie für / etliche getruckt seindt gewesen, aber / noch vil darzue gethan, wel- / che nie im truck auss- / gangen seindt. / (Ornament) // In welchen auch ein recht leben vnd funda- / ment des rechten Christli- / chen glaubens ge- / lehrt wirt. // Colossern. iii. // Lehrend vnd ermanendt euch selbst mit / gesungen und lobgesungen, und geist- / lichen Liedern in der gnad, und / singend dem Herren in ewe- / rem hertzen. This is apparently the hymnal of the German-speaking Anabaptists of the Lower Rhine area, although none of its editions give any indication of the place of printing. The first edition title page printed at the head of this article must have appeared after March 9, 1563, and before June 30, 1565, since it contains a hymn telling of the martyrdom of Jörg Friesen who was executed on March 9, 1563, at Cologne, but does not contain the hymn telling of the martyrdom of Matthias Servaes, executed on June 30, 1565, at Cologne, which appeared in the second edition. It contains, besides a preface of two pages, 123 hymns on 212 folios, and 3 folios of an index and conclusion. Five of its hymns appeared in the first edition (1564) of the second part of the Ausbund (q.v.), called Etliche schöne Christlich geseng. The fact that the title of the first edition carries the phrase "[hymns], some of which were printed before, but many more added to, which never have appeared in print," does not require that a previous edition of the entire book had appeared, but rather indicates only that "some were printed before," probably in small leaflets or pamphlets as the custom was. The second edition must have appeared between June 30, 1565, and Jan. 5, 1570, since it contains the Servaes hymn but not the hymn telling of the martyrdom of Arent von Essen, who was executed on Jan. 5, 1570. It contains 133 hymns on 234 folios, but the last four hymns of the first edition were replaced by others, so that actually the second edition has 15 new hymns. On folio 203a of the section reprinted from the first edition the following note appears before the added hymns: "Several new hymns, which previously were not in and now are added by pious Christians." The title is almost identical with that of the first edition. The second part of the Ausbund (1583 ed.) also contains five of the added hymns of this second edition. The third edition appeared between 1570 and 1583, since it contains the hymn on Arent von Essen, while the Ausbund of 1583, which contains a total of 22 hymns from it, clearly depends on it, according to Wackernagel. It contains 141 hymns on 243 folios, including six hymns by L.(eenaerd) K.(lock). The fact that Klock's first hymnal, called Vier en twintig schriftverlijcke Liedekens, was not published until 1589 does not require dating the third edition after that year. The title of this edition is as follows: Ein schon ge/sangbüchlein, darinn/begriffen werden vielerhandt/schöner Geistlicher Lieder auss/ dem Alten und Newen Testament,/ durch fromme Christen zu-sammen gezogen. // In welchem auch ein recht le-/ben und Fundament dess rechten/ Christlichen Glaubens ge-/lehrt wirdt. // Jetzo von neuen widerumb vbersehen,/ ahn vielen orton gebessert, und mit/etlichen neuen Liedern/vermehret etc./ Colossern 3./ Lehrendt und vermanendt euch selbst mit/gesungen und lobgesungen und Geist-/lichen Liedern in der gnadt, vnd/singendt dem Herren in ewe//rem Hertenzen.

This edition was in octavo format; the first and second editions were in identical smaller format.

The hymns contained in Ein schon gesangbüchlein are of both Swiss and Dutch origin, so that this hymnal represents a true merging of the two main streams of Anabaptist life and tradition. Rosella Duerksen comments further as follows:

"The influence of the German Volkslied in Anabaptist hymnody is perhaps nowhere more evident than in the gesangbüchlein. Here the imitation of lines and phrases from secular texts reaches its height, and the folk tune is borrowed without restraint. First lines of hymns which are copied outright from secular love songs are such as Ich stund an einem Morgen, or Ich sag ade wir zwey wir müssen scheyden, or Von deinetwegen bin ich hie. The language used is basically High German, coupled with heavy borrowings from the speech of the Low Countries. In subject matter the hymns are similar to those of the Ausbund, concerning themselves with stories of martyrdoms as well as with a wide range of doctrinal and devotional topics."

The only known copy of the first edition was located in 1956 in the Stadtbibliothek of Trier, Germany, by J. P. Klassen of Winnipeg. Microfilm copies are in his possession and in GCL. The second and third editions, copies of which were then in the Prussian State Library in Berlin, were used by Wolkan in his careful descriptive analysis of this hymnal in his Lieder (90-118). Wackernagel reprinted the title of the third edition together with an exhaustive bibliographical collation in his Kirchenlied (I, 484), using the Berlin copy. Wolkan showed that the preface (found in all three editions with minor typographical variations) was an almost word for word translation of the preface of the Dutch Anabaptist hymnal of 1562 called Veelderhande Liedekens, from which also at least 8 hymns were translated. Wolkan asserts (102) that the greater part of all the hymns in Ein schon gesang- büchlein are translations from the Dutch, and that only some 23 are German originals. He is certain that the collection was made somewhere in the region of Cologne near the Dutch border. If so, it was most probably printed in Cologne or near by. It is almost impossible to determine which of the two hymnals, the Swiss Geseng or the German Schon gesangbüchlein, was printed first. It is quite possible that both were printed in the same year and that neither borrowed from the other. Wolkan speculates that the German book may have gotten its Swiss hymns from a corrupted manuscript, since the text of the same hymns varies so substantially (though in minor points) in the two books that it is scarcely likely that one copied directly from the printed form of the other. Both could have translated their German versions of Dutch hymns directly from the Dutch Veelderhande Liedekens. The German book used many Dutch hymns, the Swiss book only five. These five hymns are, however, found in identical German form in the two books, with only slight editorial revisions in the Swiss book.

Schönfeld Mennonite Church was established in the Schönfeld settlement in the district of Alexandrovsk, province of Ekaterinoslav, Russia, in 1868. Smaller subsidiary churches of the settlement were located at Rosenhof (q.v.) and Blumenfeld (q.v.). All of these congregations remained subsidiaries of the Lichtenau-Petershagen Mennonite Church (q.v.) of the Molotschna settlement. The elder of this church officiated at baptismal services and the Lord's Supper. The elders were Jakob Töws and Bernhard Epp. During the Revolution, Johann Klassen of the Schönwiese Mennonite Church served the congregation as elder.

In 1883 the first church building was erected at Schönfeld. Prior to this the congregation had worshipped in an old home. Rosenhof and Blumenfeld also each had a church building. Some worship services were conducted in private homes. In 1905 the number of souls in the Schönfeld Mennonite Church was 585, of whom 276 were baptized. The other two congregations had a total of 178, of whom 90 were baptized.

The first minister was Peter Neufeld who was elected on Jan. 12, 1873, and died in 1898. Other ministers were Kornelius H. Epp (1845-1916) who was elected by the Rosenhof church, and Jacob Enns who served the Rosenhof church and was an itinerant minister. Enns received training at a Bible school in Berlin. Jakob L. Dyck (Dück) (1852-1922) was elected minister March 1, 1881. When he came to Schönfeld in 1888 he was elected the leading minister of the church, which position he held until the settlement was dissolved. Gerhard Töws (1861-1924) was elected minister in 1892. Johann Driediger (b. 1871), elected minister in 1909, now lives in Canada. Nikolai Thiessen and Johann Hübert, missionaries in Java, were sons of the Schönfeld Mennonite settlement. The Schönfeld church building was destroyed in 1920. C.K.

Schönfeld Mennonite Settlement was located in the district of Alexandrovsk, province of Ekaterinoslav, Russia. The nucleus of the settlement was the estate consisting of 14,000 acres which was purchased from D. M. Brazol (q.v.), July 20, 1868. This land was located north of the Molotschna settlement and east of the Chortitza settlement and differed from most of the other Mennonite settlements of Russia because it was primarily purchased by individuals and scattered over a large area interspersed by numerous other German settlements and Russians. Only a few of the villages resembled the traditional pattern. Most of the dwelling places were scattered on estates. A second purchase of land was made in 1869 from the nobleman Chonuk. As in the first case the settlers came from the Molotschna. Two families, Cornelius Epp and Peter Epp, coming directly from Prussia purchased the Hutterian Bruderhof Kovalicha. The Hutterites then migrated to America. This total settlement became known as Schönfeld.

In 1885 a number of settlers purchased an estate consisting of 1,458 acres from the owner Samoylenko. The settlement became known as Schönbrunn. As a result of further purchases the Rosenhof settlement consisting of the estates Rosenhof, Tiegenhof, Blumental, Solenaya, Hochfeld, Schöneberg, Bergtal, Oleyev, and Krukov, originated between 1855 and 1875. This settlement consisted of representatives from both the Molotschna and Chortitza settlements. Between the years 1875 and 1879 the villages Blumenheim and Kronberg and the estate Eichental were established by settlers coming from the Molotschna. A village, Silberfeld, near the station Pologi, had been previously established.

According to a table presented by Töws, the whole settlement consisted of 202 farms, 132,838 acres, and a population of 1,056. Among the railroad stations used by the settlers were: Gaichur, Mechetnaya, Obshaya, and Gulay Pole. The settlement had fourteen schools and one Zentralschule supported and administered by the Mennonites. Since the farms of the village were so scattered, most of the villages had more than one school. The three churches were located in Schönfeld, Blumenfeld, and Rosenhof (see Schönfeld Mennonite Church and Rosenhof Mennonite Church). The Mennonites obtained the right for self-administration of this scattered settlement known as the Schönfeld Volost (q.v.) (administration).

The Schönfeld settlement consisted primarily of farmers but soon a large network of industries developed. In Rosenhof Kornelius Epp and Abr. A. Sawatzky had brick factories. In Schönfeld there were a number of brick factories. Later flour mills originated in all areas. The Russian population in the surrounding territory made use of them. Schönfeld had a wagon factory and other factories, a foundry, and two sunflower seed presses. At the station Sofiyevka, Heinrich Neufeld had a factory for agricultural machinery. There were numerous business establishments in the villages. The annual fairs were attended by people from far and near.

In the realm of agriculture the Mennonites raised sheep, cattle, hogs, and horses. At the turn of the century hard winter wheat had generally been accepted. In matters of health the community was taken care of originally by the traditional "Knochenarzt," midwives, and chiropractors. Before World War I some trained physicians were available.

During World War I and the Revolution this settlement suffered similarly to the others. The settlement was occupied at one time by the German army, then again by the White army, and finally by the Red army. Before this happened the Mennonite settlement was dissolved. During the chaotic years of 1918-20 the bandits of the surrounding territory robbed the settlement and killed many inhabitants; those remaining fled to the other near-by settlements. After the establishment of the Soviet government some returned to their estates. Many of the homes were destroyed. The Schönfeld church was destroyed in 1920. The former inhabitants shared the fate of the Mennonites of other settlements. Some were exiled and others found their way to Canada and South America. C.K.

Schönfeld Mennonite Volost (administration) came into being with the new Schönfeld Mennonite settlement in the district of Alexandrovsk, province of Ekaterinoslav, Russia. Since this settlement was scattered, it was difficult to persuade the local government to grant the Mennonites the customary privilege of self-government. After much effort, particularly by Peter Harder, the first secretary, the government recognized the Schönfeld Volost in 1873. The following villages belonged to it: Schönfeld, Silberfeld, Blumenheim, Kronberg, Rosenhof, and Blumenfeld. Schönfeld was in the center of the settlement and some of the villages were about twenty miles away. The following served the settlement as Oberschulze (mayor): Abraham Driediger, Johann Cornies, Johann Dyck, and Heinrich Wiens. Secretaries were Peter Harder and David P. Dyck. In 1902 a new brick building was erected for the Schönfeld Volost. C.K.

Schönfeld Mennonite Zentralschule of the Schönfeld Mennonite settlement (q.v.) was established in 1907 with Hermann A. Rempel as teacher. The first year instruction was given in the Schönfeld elementary school. During this year a dwelling place for the teacher which served as a temporary school was built. A second teacher Jacob J. Dueck was employed. In the fall of 1909 an impressive Zentralschule building was completed and Abraham P. Töws was added as third teacher. Hermann Rempel was succeeded by Franz Ediger, and Töws by G. Schroeder. Later teachers were Aron Rempel, Heinrich Neufeld, Peter Sawatzky, Susanna Loewen, Helena Froese, Jakob Thiessen, and Jakob Neufeld. First the school was for boys only but later it became coeducational. Two additional residences for teachers were built. C.K.

Schönsee, a village in the Molotschna settlement, Taurida, South Russia, situated about 70 miles from the seaport of Berdyansk at the Sea of Azov, was one of the 18 oldest villages of the Molotschna, founded in 1804-6 by Mennonite settlers from Prussia. In 1812, the site having been found unsuitable, the village was transferred to another site some ten miles east. A typical Molotschna village of medium size, it contained 20 farms of about 160 acres each and a number of smaller farms of 40 acres each. At the end of the village were a number of houses whose inhabitants possessed no land but were craftsmen of different kinds (see Anwohner). The total land area was 4,200 acres, the population around 500 souls, who before World War I were almost exclusively Mennonites. The village contained a general store, a small factory manufacturing agricultural machinery and employing around 30 workers, a large flour mill, a blacksmith shop, and outside the village on a hill a large windmill of the Dutch type. But this type of mill, of which there were several in the Molotschna, was not used for pumping water as in Holland but for milling feed grain on a large scale. The school contained two classrooms and employed two teachers. At the eastern end of the village stood the new church completed a few years before World War I.

With the Russian revolution hard times began for the villagers, and a general decline followed. During the Civil War in 1919, Schönsee for several months was in the front line between the warring armies and suffered considerable damage. A number of the inhabitants were killed. During the 1930's a great number of people who had been prosperous were branded "kulaks" and banished to Siberia, mostly men. From the village of Schönsee alone this number reached 72.

Toward the end of World War II most of the remaining Mennonite inhabitants succeeded in escaping from Russia with the retreating German armies. But the greater part of these refugees were rounded up by the Russians in Poland and forcibly returned to Russia. As far as is known, they were not taken to their former homes but to Kazakhstan, a desolate province of central Asia. Only a very few inhabitants of Schönsee reached the Western Zone of Germany, from where in due time they emigrated to Canada or South America. The final fate of the village after the departure of the Mennonite population is unknown.

Schönsee (Polish, Sosnowka), a village in Poland, from 1772 until 1919 belonging to West Prussia, Germany, situated ten miles north of Culm (q.v.), about two miles from the right bank of the Vistula River, where Mennonites from the Netherlands settled as early as 1553 to reclaim and drain the swampy lands along the Vistula, being the first Mennonite settlement in the Culm region. The first land lease is lost, but a second one, of 1594, between the city of Culm, to which this territory belonged, and the farmers, still exists. In this and following leases only farming was allowed to the settlers; no handicrafts were permitted except weaving, tailoring, and shoemaking for private use. They were allowed to fish in the Vistula. The settlers, who lived at Schönsee and also in the surrounding villages and hamlets such as Jamerau, Dorposch, Lunau, and Schöneich, were explicitly granted the privilege of free exercise of their religion, including teaching in schools. The following Mennonite families are named in the land leases in 1695 and after: Unrau (Unruh), Siefert (Siebert), Hube(?), Block, Voth (Foth), Funk, Jans (Jantz), Buller, Köhn, Sperling, Stephan (Stevens, Steffens), Wilhelm (Willems), Boltz (Bolt), Stob (Stobbe), Tomasche (Thomsen), Meister, Decker, Penner, Brümmer(?), Mentz, Schümann (Schoman), Frantz, Abraham (Abrams), Pödker (Boetscher), Voutsche(?), Siedau(?), and from 1725 also Nickel, Bartel, Schröder, Nachtigal, Weitgraff (Weidegraf), Pancratz, Arndt (Arentsz), Eckert (Eggert), and Plener (Plenert). Besides these there are found in the list drawn up by Elder Hendrik Berents in 1719 the names of Schellenberg, Isaack, and Riggers (Richert). Since a number of these names are not Dutch-Frisian, other settlers must in the meantime have joined the original settlers.

As early as about 1570 there were two Mennonite congregations at Schönsee, one Flemish, whose meetinghouse was called "die kleine Schule" (small school), which sided with the Groningen Old Flemish (q.v.), and one Frisian (also called Waterlander), whose meetinghouse, built in 1618, was called "die grosse Schule" (large school). They are small and very plain buildings (pictures in Siedlungswerk taken in 1940-41).

Concerning the early history of the Mennonites of Schönsee there is not much information. Social and religious development seems to have been favorable in the 16th and 17th centuries. Sometimes they were struck by calamities like floods and crop failures, but their tenacity and energy, and aid from their benevolent landlords, the city magistrates of Culm, easily overcame their blows. Both congregations of Schönsee were small in membership; the Frisians, concerning whom there is no further information, formed the larger one; in 1719 the Flemish numbered 48 baptized members. This Old Flemish group then belonged to the same congregation as Przechovka (q.v., Wintersdorf) and Kono-path on the left bank of the Vistula in the territory of Schwetz, and Posterwolt on the right bank. Although Schönsee was a part of this congregation, it obviously had its own preachers by this time. In 1760 a separation was made for practical reasons. Schönsee then became independent and its preacher Laurens Sperling was appointed elder. Repeatedly the Flemish Mennonites in this area were visited by elders from the Netherlands; mentioned are Jan Siebes (Seebes), Gerrit Roose, and Stieve Sand(?) in 1676. About 1700 Alle Derks (q.v.), the noted elder of the Old Flemish congregation at Groningen, visited the Old Flemish congregations in Prussia, including Schönsee, and in 1719 and again in 1733 Elder Hendrik Berents (Hulshoff, q.v.) was in Schönsee to perform baptism and administer communion and also to exercise church discipline. Of his visit Hendrik Barents made a circumstantial report, mentioning the names of the members and their conditions.

In 1727 a few Mennonites of the Frisian (Waterlander) branch, who had been expelled from East Prussia, settled near Schönsee. Among them were Heinrich Nickel and Gabriel Frantz, both preachers. They corresponded with the Dutch Committee for Foreign Needs at Amsterdam and both their letters and copies of the answers to these letters are in the Amsterdam Mennonite archives. This correspondence affords a clear idea of the situation of the Mennonites in this area about 1730. Both congregations were then using the same meetinghouse and the preacher of the Frisians, in the letters always called Waterlanders, was Derk Wichert. About this time the Catholic bishop of Culm insisted on harsh measures against the Mennonites, which could be prevented only by paying heavy taxes; they lived in constant fear of expulsion. The estates were flooded by the Vistula, and there were many years of crop failure and even of famine. The Dutch Mennonites supported their coreligionists in these misfortunes.

In 1765 a number of Old Flemish Mennonites from Przechovka and Schönsee moved to Brenkenhoffswalde (q.v.) and Franztal in the Neumark; others emigrated to Deutsch-Kazun (q.v.) about 1780 and still others to Volhynia (q.v.) in the early 19th century. These emigrations appreciably decreased particularly the number of Flemish Mennonites in this area.

The Dutch Naamlijst from 1743 to 1802 also names the ministers in the Schönsee congregations. In the Old Flemish congregation the ministers were Laurens Sperling, elder 1760; Peter Pancratz, preacher 1760; Jacob Wedel, preacher; Peter Jantz, preacher 1773; the Naamlijst of 1780 names only Peter Pancratz; in 1786 Pancratz is missing; the preachers are Benjamin Wedel and Tobias Jantzen, both appointed in 1785. The list of ministers of the Frisian congregation is more complete; they were Peter Dirks before 1743-c58; Gabriel Frantz, Sievert Tjart, Jan Siebrandt before 1743-c50; Peter Nickel before 1743-c80; Cornelis Frantz, elder c1750-58; Andries Gertz, preacher c1750-62; Hendrik Cornelissen 1757-59; Peter Tjart 1757-62; Gertgen Knoop 1759-c81; David Bartel c1752-65; Cornelis Frantz, preacher 1763, elder 1776-c88; Heinrich Siebrandt 1786-?; Peter Baltzer 1771-c96; Jacob Gertz 1775-c98; Heinrich Tjart 1788-after 1802; Timotheus Boltz 1788-after 1802; Jacob Frantz, preacher 1791, elder 1794-after 1802.

On Oct. 12, 1849, the small Old Flemish congregation of Schönsee, then numbering 39 souls, merged with the Frisian congregation. The Flemish meetinghouse was abandoned; the old Frisian meetinghouse of 1618, somewhat remodeled, was used until 1945. The united Schönsee congregation numbered 364 baptized members in 1852, 320 in 1880, 273 in 1927, 179 in 1941. Johann Stobbe, preacher 1851, was elder 1875-1906, Johann Bartel, preacher 1898, elder 1906-45(?). The congregation had its own home for the aged.

In the spring of 1945 with the coming of the Russian armies the congregation of Schönsee was wiped out. vbZ.

Schönsee Mennonite Church, Molotschna, Taurida, South Russia, was until 1842 a part of the large Lichtenau congregation and from then until the beginning of the century a part of the Margenau congregation. In 1903 it became independent under its own elder, Heinrich Peters. The greater part of the inhabitants of the following villages belonged to the Schönsee congregation: Fürstenau, Fabrikewiese, Schönsee, Liebenau, Wernersdorf, about one quarter of Hamberg and Klippenfeld, and some of the large estates lying at some distance from the Molotschna in a southeasterly direction, altogether about 1500 souls. Almost without exception they were farmers whose forefathers had come from the Danzig district of Prussia at the beginning of the 19th century. Sunday school was introduced only after the revolution, when religious instruction was prohibited at the day schools. The congregation had a choir but there was no instrument to accompany the singing.

The first church building was erected in 1831 behind the orchards of the village of Schönsee, all of wood in the old Prussian church style. Later it was surrounded by mighty trees and, although simple and small, had a beauty of its own. In 1909 a new church was built at the eastern end of the village of much larger size and in a more modern style, one of the largest and most beautiful Mennonite churches in Russia.

Some of the more prominent ministers of the congregation were Elder Heinrich Peters (q.v.), who served his congregation with great devotion as minister from 1885 and as elder from 1903 until his death in 1920 during the great typhoid epidemic; Jacob Renpenning (1885-1922), owner of a large agricultural machinery factory in the village of Fabrikewiese, who was a good speaker and earnest Christian; and Bernhard Wiens 1903-30, who besides being an outstanding minister for 19 years, served the village of Schönsee as a very efficient schoolteacher. But the most important minister the congregation ever had was Alexander Ediger (q.v.), who was called to the ministry at an hour (1922) when the storms of the revolution and the civil war swept the country. He was a man of exceptional intellectual and spiritual power, whose influence extended far beyond the boundaries of the Molotschna. In 1931 Elder Ediger was imprisoned at Melitopol and later banished to Murmansk. Johann Görz, a young minister, continued to conduct services for a while in private homes until he also was banished. The church building was first turned into a granary and then into a communist club. A large stage was erected at the front with a curtain picturing the goddess of beauty. Between the windows on the walls life-sized pictures of Lenin, Stalin, and other leaders of the revolution were placed. During the German occupation the building again for a short time was used as a church. (Friesen, Brüderschaft.) H.G.

Schönsee Mennonite Church (GCM), located at the eastern edge of Tofield, Alberta, a member of the Canadian Conference of Mennonites, was organized on June 15, 1936, by Mennonite immigrants from Russia who began to arrive in 1924. The congregation has seven ordained ministers. David A. Heidebrecht has served the congregation as minister since 1929 and as elder since 1942. A new church was dedicated in 1937. In 1958 the leader was Johann Neufeld, and the assisting ministers were David Boese, Abraham Epp, Peter Regehr, Gerhard Franz, and Abraham Heidebrecht. The membership in 1958 was 189. D.A.H.

Schöntal Mennonite Brethren Church, established in the early days of the Slavgorod Mennonite settlement (q.v.), Siberia, served the following 10 villages: Schöntal, Rosenwald, Nikolaipol, Reinfeld, Alexeyfeld, Protasov, Gnadenfeld, Tiege, Grünfeld, and Berezovka. The first leading minister was Aron Reimer; he was ordained elder in 1920. When he went to Canada in 1925 he was succeeded by Abram Janz and later by Dietrich Görzen. Other ministers were Peter Neufeld, Jacob Wall, Heinrich Franz, David Thielmann, Wilhelm Federau, Cornelius Plett, Andreas Nachtigall, Johann Klassen, Heinrich Dück, Heinrich Funk, and Jakob Bergen. The congregation erected a church building in Schöntal in 1910. C.K.

Schönwiese, a former Mennonite village, which became a suburb of Alexandrovsk (Zaporozhe) on the Dniepr in 1911. After the destruction of Neukronsweide, Schönwiese was the center of the Kronsweide Mennonite Church, with a church (erected in 1862) and a school. The settlement was founded on the "beautiful meadow" on the Moskwa, a tributary of the Dniepr, in 1797, by seventeen families of stragglers in the great emigration from West Prussia in 1789. They were given such large advances by the Russian government that they were able to build small homes the first winter in Russia.

It was a very important center for all the German settlements in Russia. Geographically the place offered many advantages with Alexandrovsk, a railroad center, in the north and the wide navigable Dniepr in the west. The largest milling firms and factories for the manufacture of mowers in all Russia were located in Schönwiese, all with Mennonite owners.

From the first, the milling industry here did a thriving business. In the 1850's and 1860's a dozen German windmills stood in a close circle. Peter Bock became a widely noted builder of mills, and employed as many as fifty workers in his factory; he supplied the entire Ukraine with wind- and treadmills. The settlers of Schönwiese at first engaged in agriculture and sheep raising, but soon found industry more profitable. They sold most of their land, keeping only the Dniepr lowlands. During World War I, when liquidation threatened, they sold even this land, about 3,240 acres, to the town of Alexandrovsk. Schönwiese suffered severely during the war and the Revolution, especially because it was the seat of a number of very prosperous Mennonite firms: Lepp and Wallmann, A. Koop, Hermann Niebuhr, Hildebrandt and Priess, and J. Badowsky (Lutheran). During the Civil War the front passed over Schönwiese twenty-three times, and all industry was halted. Not until the Soviet government had restored order could work be resumed, but then the plants were nationalized.

Among the older leaders there were some striking personalities. One of these was the minister Andreas Vogt (1854-1914). Since the Lutherans and Roman Catholics of the town had had no pastor for decades, "Uncle" (Ohm) Vogt helped all with their spiritual problems. Kornelius Hübert (1835-97) was a teacher, chorister, and faithful counselor in all kinds of spiritual and material, legal and commercial matters. A pupil of Heinrich Franz (q.v.), he taught the village school for twenty years. (For later developments, see Zaporozhe.) D.H.E.

Schönwiese Mennonite Brethren Church was established in the early days of the Slavgorod Mennonite settlement (q.v.), Siberia. The first leading minister was Peter Bergen, who was succeeded in 1923 by Heinrich Janzen, who in turn was succeeded in 1926 by Heinrich H. Klassen. The last leading minister was Heinrich Matthies. Additional ministers were Heinrich Janzen, Abram Friesen, and Nikolai Franz. In 1911 a church building was erected in Schönwiese. Originally this congregation was a part of the Alexandrovka M.B. Church. C.K.

It was succeeded by the separate language editions, Monatsblätter aus Bethel College and Bethel College Monthly. The School and College Journal was an 8-page, 8½ x 11½, monthly periodical, published in both German and English, and printed by A. Wiebusch and Son Printing Co., St. Louis, until August 1896, when this work was transferred to Newton. The contents consisted of editorials, news of Bethel College, financial reports, and general cultural and religious articles. David Goerz edited the Journal. J.F.S.

Schoonhoven, a town in the Dutch province of South Holland (1947 pop. 4,869; 2 Mennonites), was formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation, which belonged to the moderate Flemish branch. Concerning this congregation, which was always a small one, there is only scant information. Of its origin nothing is known. Albert Jans(sen) was its preacher about 1608. In 1614 Leenaert Clock (q.v.) moved from Haarlem to Schoonhoven and lived here for some time, serving the congregation together with Jan Lammersz. In 1641 Esaias Janse van Nottelen, a Flemish preacher at Rotterdam, accepted a call of the Schoonhoven congregation, but already in 1649 it was without a preacher and in the following decades only occasionally preachers from Gouda, Rotterdam, Dordrecht, and Utrecht conducted services at Schoonhoven. The congregation died out some time before 1700. vdZ.

Schoorl, a village in the Dutch province of North Holland, in the neighborhood of which is found a Mennonite Brotherhood Home (Broederschapshuis), operated since July 1, 1932. A church was dedicated on July 16, 1951. This home is used during the summer for conferences and special meetings and also as a vacation center. From November 1950 until December 1956 a number of aged "displaced persons" from Eastern Europe were sheltered in the Van-de-Water House, a building not far from the Brotherhood Home. Since February 1958 the Van-de-Water House has also been sheltering a number of children (formerly at Oud-Wulven, q.v.), who are being educated here under the care of the Dutch Mennonite Bijzondere Noden foundation. In 1957 the membership (baptized and children) was 31. Services were held in Steinen i. Wiesental by visiting ministers since there was no resident minister.

Schornbaum, Karl (1875-1953), a Lutheran scholar of Bavaria, Germany, church historian and research specialist in Anabaptist history, was born in Thundorf, Lower Franconia, studied theology and philosophy at the universities of Erlangen, Greifswald, and Kiel, was vicar in Thalmosing 1897-99, instructor in catechism at Nürnberg 1899-1907, received his doctorate in philosophy at Erlangen in 1907, was pastor at Alfeld 1907-22, received his doctorate in theology at Erlangen in 1910, was dean at Roth near Nürnberg 1922-31, director of the state church archives in Nürnberg 1931-46, and retired in 1946. In 1932 he received the chair of Bavarian church history at Erlangen, and the title of honorary professor in 1945. He was the editor of the Zeitschrift für bayrische Kirchengeschichte and chairman of the Association for Bavarian Church History, and also of the Association for the History of Nürnberg. He wrote many books and articles on Franconian church history; e.g., Markgrafen Casimir und Georg von Brandenburg. A major contribution to Anabaptist history was his publication of the Täuferakten (q.v.) for Bavaria, Quellen zur Geschichte der Wiedertäufer (Bayern I, 1934, Bayern II, 1950.) He died in 1953. E.T.

Schorndorf, a city (pop. 12,268) in Württemberg, Germany, fifteen miles east of Stuttgart, in the fertile Rems Valley.

Joseph Beck records only one Anabaptist martyr for Schorndorf in 1527-31; the court records do not mention him. Nevertheless there are frequent references to Anabaptists in Schorndorf during that time. In 1528 Hans Glut of Schorndorf was tried on the rack, and said he had been baptized in 1527 at Hainebach near Esslingen. A court record of 1533 points out the spread of the Anabaptists in this region.

Under Duke Ulrich there were more Anabaptists in Schorndorf and the vicinity after 1535. Hans Volmar of Geradstetten had been in Moravia and was banished from the town in 1535; the same lot befell Katharina Schneck in 1536, Wendel Rumel of Hebsack in 1533, Michel Weber of Rohrbronn in 1533, Stephan Jetzlin and Endris Sigwart of Steinenberg, and in 1539 Jakob Hüll of Schorndorf. For a while the persecution apparently stopped. In 1545 a woman of Schorndorf fled to Stetten, an Anabaptist haven, likewise a cooper Hans Walch; at the same time Heinrich Walch, presumably a brother of Hans, and mayor of Schorndorf, was banished, because he had "been somewhat careless" (sich etwas übersehen).

After the interim the search for Anabaptists began anew under Duke Christoph. In 1545 the duke had been informed of Anabaptist disturbances in the vicinity. The trials of Stoffel Schuhmacher of Beutelsbach in 1555 and Jakob Wachter in 1557 show that there was ground for suspicion. On April 2, 1558, Sixt Weselin, the magistrate (Vogt) of Schorndorf, reported that Peter and Endris Stürmmer (Stürmmer?) of Rudersberg with his family, and Ulrich Lemblin's wife had emigrated to Moravia at the instigation of Paul Glock (q.v.) and Hans von Schrotsberg, leaving all their property. Three trials of this year—Lienhart Rauch, and Martin and Georg Weller of Manoldsheim—indicate the vigor of the Moravian emissaries. Not all of the converts were pleased with the Moravian life. In 1559 Sixt Weselin reported to the government that Michel Honacker and Hans Braun had fled to Moravia from Mittelschlechtbach with their families in 1558, but had now returned. They were examined in Stuttgart, had to recant before the mayor and the court, and were assigned a special pew in the church.

In 1560 Stephan Haug, called Jetzlin, who had twice joined the Anabaptists, was expelled from the village, and Hans Peter of Weiler from the countryside. In 1561 the Anabaptists were stirring in Necklinsberg. Apollonia Geiger, a widow, was under indoctrination in Stuttgart. In Schnait a property confiscated from Anabaptists was leased out. Stoffel Schuhmacher of Beutelsbach had backslidden and was tried in Stuttgart in 1562; in Leonberg he was examined on the rack and then expelled from the country. In Esslingen, an imperial city, the following Anabaptists of the Schorndorf region were tried before officials of Württemberg: Bastian Weber of Beutelsbach, Lienhard Sommer of Necklinsberg, Stephan Utzlin (Jetzlin), called Haug, of Steinenberg, Peter Lang of Schorndorf, Abraham Halbgewachsen and Hans Kugelin of Schnait, Ulrich Hauwer of Krähwinkel, and Jörg Bichler (Bühler) of Miedelsbach. Bastian was thought to be a Vorsteher on account of his determination, and Stephan Haug proved to be one. Peter Land and Halbgewachsen were put under oath not to return to Esslingen. The fate of the others is not known.

In 1563 the citizens of Rudersberg asked for the property of Peter Hasel and his wife, who had emigrated to Moravia in 1555. In 1564 Anna Krauter, young Hans Heutling's wife, of Schorndorf, and Bastian Schuhmacher's wife, of Hebsach, left their homes; in 1565 Claus Frey of Beutelsbach likewise, though he returned in 1569 and asked for a hearing. In 1570 the authorities expelled from the country Leonhart and Hans Sommerer of Necklinsberg, Caspar Dautel of Hossllinswart, Apollonia Trieber of Kleinheppach, Christian Seiferlin and Friedrich Bauer of Endersbach, Aquila Schöberlin of Schorndorf, Jous Gump and Marx Wellhaf of Strumpfelfach, Bastian Weber of Beutelsbach, Anna Weissgarber of Winterbach, Maria Schmid of Heppach, Marx and Barbara Schöberlin of Schorndorf, Andas Dilgen, and the daughter of Beutelsbach. Blasius Greiner of Walkersbach was required to recant in Schorndorf in 1569 before the entire congregation in church; the formula of recantation prescribed for him became the model. In 1573 the district (Amt) of Schorndorf was inspected for Anabaptists and special attention was paid them in the future. The Greiner family (q.v.) in the remote Walkersbach caused the authorities much trouble, likewise the family of Marx Schöberlin. In 1582 Simon Kress, an apostle from Moravia, was seized in Oberurbach. This community was closely watched until the Thirty Years' War; in 1633 there were still some Anabaptists there, besides "many disorderly people."

The confiscated Anabaptist property in the Schorndorf area was valued at 6,838 guilders and 31½ kreutzer in 1580-1613. Schorndorf was also the home of Johannes Walch (q.v.) of Nürtingen, deacon there 1578-82, who was dismissed as a Swiss Anabaptist. (TA Württemberg; ML IV.) G. Bos.

Schotanus, Christianus (1603-71), was a Reformed pastor and from 1639 a professor at the University of Franeker, Friesland, Netherlands, where he at first taught Greek and history and later also theology. His most outstanding book was De Geschiedenissen kerkelyck ende wereltlyck van Friesland oost ende west . . . tot op het jaer 1583 (Franeker, 1658), which, though antiquated in its first part, is still of importance for the history of the 16th century. Schotanus was a bitter antagonist of the Mennonites and attacked them in Van de Gronden der Mennisterij, ofte Waerschouwinghe over 't Bloed-tooneel der Doopsgezinde van Thieleman Jans van Bracht (Leeuwarden, 1671). This book, written by order of the Reformed Synod in Friesland, severely criticizes van Bracht's Martyrs' Mirror (q.v.), first edition of 1660. Schotanus' main theses are: the Waldenses have not preserved the Apostolic traditions; the Mennonites have their origin in the Münster (q.v.) revolt; the government should be on guard as to the Mennonites; because of ungodly revolutionary principles in the past, they should not be granted toleration. This book by Schotanus is very biased and has no historic value. vdZ.

Schotvanger, Jan Dirksz (d. 1737 at Amsterdam, Netherlands), was a preacher of the Old Frisian (Arke Noachs) congregation at Amsterdam in 1707-35. He was one of the lay preachers who led this church for a number of years, others being Cornelis Lely (q.v.), Cornelis Schellinger (q.v.), and Marten Schagen (q.v.). Though there is not much information concerning Schotvanger, it is known that he was pious, capable, and hard-working. Cornelis Lely delivered his funeral sermon. (Blaupot t. C., Holland II, 187.) vdZ.

Schouten, common Dutch family name. There was a Mennonite Schouten family in the Waterlander congregation of Amsterdam from c1580, where Lourens Jans Schouten was a deacon from 1612, as were some other members of this family. The Schoutens of Amsterdam were engaged in business and well-to-do. Maerten Schouten was a lay preacher at Knollendam (q.v.) 1754-c74. (*Inv. Arch. Amst. Schouwenburg, van, a prominent Dutch Mennonite family, originally of Harlingen in Friesland, where they were owners of brickyards and tileworks from the early 18th century or before. Some of its members were deacons at Harlingen and later at Zaandam, where a branch of the Schouwenburgs lived from the 19th century. A side branch is the Menalda van Schouwenburg family. vdZ.

Schowalter: see also Showalter.

Schowalter, Christian (1828/9-1907), was born in Assenheim, Palatinate, Germany, of Swiss ancestry, on Nov. 11, 1828 (1829?). In 1845-46 he attended a Bible school at Beuggen and then for three years the normal school at Schiers, Switzerland, from which he was graduated in 1849. After teaching for one year at Deutschhof, Bavaria, he emigrated to Ohio. After three years of teaching in Ohio he was called to the parochial school of the Zion Mennonite Church at Donnellson, Iowa, and served as teacher here, which position he filled for thirty-six years, 1853-89, with an interruption of two years. Here he married Rosina Heffner (Haffner) on Oct. 25, 1855.

In 1858 a movement arose for greater unity among Mennonite churches. Schowalter, then a teacher, was one of the promoters of this vision. In 1860 he was chosen as secretary of a meeting held at West Point, Iowa, to outline steps for such a unification. He became a member of the committee that drew up the "Plan of Union" which was the beginning of the General Conference Mennonite Church (q.v.). He was a member of the committee that prepared the handbook for ministers, and served as the president of the Foreign Mission Board 1896-1902.

When the question of higher education for Mennonite youth came up in Conference circles Schowalter mapped out a course of instruction and principles on which a school could be conducted. His plans met with favor and on Jan. 2, 1868, he was induced to become principal of the Wadsworth School, Ohio, and was the first man ever to head a Mennonite institution of higher learning in America. He held this position nearly two years and at the end of his principalship visited Germany with his family.

In 1861 Schowalter was chosen by lot to succeed the pastor of the Zion Mennonite Church (q.v.) and was ordained to the ministry by David Ruth in 1862. He introduced the Sunday school in his church as well as a young people's society. He wrote a German catechism for the General Conference in 1871 which was accepted in 1881. In 1907 he retired from the ministry because of failing health, and died April 13, 1907. C.K.

Schowalter Foundation, Inc., a Mennonite philanthropic organization, was founded in 1954. Its chairman in 1957 was O. O. Miller, Akron, Pa., and its president and general manager H. J. Andres, Newton, Kan. Its six trustees represent the G.C.M., M.C., and C.G.C. Mennonite branches, the three groups named in the will of J. A. Schowalter (1879-1953), which bequeathed most of his assets to the Foundation, the income from which is to be used for relief work, training of ministers and missionaries, and for the promotion of peace. The total appraised value of the estate was more than $1,157,000. Schowalter immigrated to America from Germany in 1883 and soon settled in Harvey County, Kan., where he lived the rest of his life. He acquired his fortune through wheat farming, land investments, and oil. He was active in the G.C. Mennonite Church as a layman and contributed liberally to missions, relief, and church institutions. He served two terms in the Kansas state legislature (1934-36 and 1936-38). M.G.

Schräffl, Georg, an Anabaptist martyr of Rungen in Tirol, Austria, was executed with his servant at Michelsburg (q.v.) in the summer of 1531. They had been seized by Christoph Ochs, the judge of Michelsburg, with a number of "simple-minded folk," who were released. But Schräffl and his servant were sentenced to death as backsliders. Schrag (Schrock, Shrock, Schrack, Schragg), a Mennonite family name of Swiss origin found in the Palatinate after 1664. From Germany members of the family migrated to Galicia in 1773, and from there to the Russian province of Volhynia. In 1874 members of the Schrag family left Russia in the migration of the settlement to America and located in Kansas and South Dakota, where they are generally members of the General Conference Mennonite Church. In 1937, three were in the G.C.M. ministry. Martin Schrag of the faculty of Messiah College, Menno Schrag, editor of the Mennonite Weekly Review, and John Schrag, on the faculty of Grace Bible Institute, are representatives of the Volhynia branch of the family.

Other members of the Schrag family emigrated directly from Germany and Switzerland to America.

As early as 1766 a Johannes Schrag landed in Philadelphia. Casper Schrock, born in Switzerland c1745, came to America as a young man and settled in Somerset County, Pa. His son Peter (1795-1846) was an Amish Mennonite minister in Wayne County, Ohio. Many of his descendants live in Ohio and Indiana. Among the early members of the East Zorra (q.v.) Amish Mennonite Church, organized c1837 in Ontario, were Daniel Schragg, John Schrag, and Joseph Schrag. Daniel Schrag (1813-91) was born in Bavaria, lived in Pennsylvania, and settled in Ontario, where he became a minister of the East Zorra Church in 1849. Descendants of the Ontario Schrags live in New York and Ontario.

The genealogy of the Tobias Schrock (Schrag) family shows many of his descendants living in Amish communities in Illinois, Iowa, and Kansas. He was born in Holmes County, Ohio, in 1823. Obituaries in Mennonite periodicals show the Mennonite (MC) and Amish branches of the family to be most numerous represented in Indiana, followed by Ohio, Kansas, and Illinois. In these two branches of the church 32 Schrock (Shrock) ministers were serving in 1937. Among the better-known members of the family was Andrew A. Schrock (1863-1949), for many years the bishop of the Metamora Mennonite Church (q.v.), at Metamora, Ill., and Tobe Schrock (1897-), bishop of the Bowne Mennonite Church (q.v.) at Elmdale, Mich. Schrijver, a Dutch Mennonite family of Flemish descent. To this family belongs Gillis (q.v.) Schrijver, a Mennonite elder in Flanders, who played a part in the Flemish-Frisian quarrels at Harlingen in 1666-67. In the early 17th century a branch of this family was living in Utrecht; from here the family spread over a number of North Holland towns. Cornelis and Coenraad Schrijver were Mennonite merchants at Amsterdam in the 18th century. Pieter Schrijver (q.v.) was a Mennonite minister. A Tobias Schrijver, a Mennonite, managed a lace factory at Kampen from 1760. About 1650 a Mennonite Schrijver (Schryfer) family was living at Goch, Germany. (Blaupt t. Schrijver, Pieter Arends (b. Nov. 11, 1665, at Hoorn, d. April 11, 1742, at Haarlem), was a preacher of the Waterlander congregation at Hoorn 1691-1706 and of the united Flemish, Frisian, and High German congregation on the Klein Heiligland at Haarlem 1706 (elder 1710) until his death. He was known for his conservative views and his attachment to the old Mennonite confessions. A volume of his sermons, Evangelische Genade-Leere betoogd in predicationen, appeared after his death (Amsterdam, 1746). He married Maria Maatschoen, who died in 1727; in the same year two of his sons died, aged 23 and 27. By trade he was a dyer. It is very curious that this conservative man was among the first Mennonites to wear a fashionable wig with powdered curls (see his portrait). vDZ.

Schrock, Andrew A. (1863-1949), a Mennonite (MC) bishop, was born in Alsace, France, on Oct. 28, 1863, and came to the Metamora community from Alsace at the age of six. On Jan. 12, 1888, he married Barbara Bachman; eight children were born to this union. On July 8, 1894, he was ordained as a minister and on April 24, 1898, as bishop. He served the Metamora congregation faithfully and was also used widely in other congregations in the Western A.M. Conference. He was moderator of this Conference on six different occasions.

Andrew A. Schrock was a kindly man with an absorbing interest in the welfare of the church and his responsibility for preserving the faith. He was able to adapt himself to the times in such a way that the congregations under his oversight were able to make the necessary transitions without undue friction. Bishop Schrock was singularly humble and sincere, and a faithful and worthy servant of the church during a very difficult period. He died April 7, 1949. T.R.S.

Schröder (Schroeder, Schroeter), a family name originally found among Mennonites in Danzig and West Prussia. The name was recorded as early as 1605 and appeared in the congregations of Tiegengagen, Fürstenwerder, Orloff, Tragheimerweide, Montau-Gruppe, Schönsee, Danzig, Königsberg, and Elbing. From here the name was transplanted to the Ukraine (see B. H. Unruh and H. H. Schröder). Peter Schroeder, of the Crimea, was a Mennonite representative in the Duma in St. Petersburg. "Franz and Schroeder" was an agricultural machinery factory of Halbstadt, Molotschna, and Heinrich Schroeder, of Halbstadt, was a manufacturer of motors. Johann Schroeder (q.v.) was the second elder of the Michalin Mennonite Church (q.v.), Poland, and the first elder of the Gnadenberg Mennonite Church (q.v.), Kansas. P. R. Schroeder (q.v.) was a leading G.C.M. minister. Elizabeth A. Schroeter, of Reedley, Cal., wrote a fictionalized account of the Mennonite migration from the Ukraine to America, entitled From Here to the Pinnacles (New York, 1956). The name is found in Canada, the United States, and South America. C.K.

Schroeder, Johann (1815-99), the second elder of the Gnadenberg Mennonite Church of Michalin, Polish Russia, was born in Michalin in May 1815, a son of Johann and Rebecca Isaac Schröder. He was baptized in 1833, and elected minister of the congregation in 1848, and ordained elder Sept. 17, 1852. (The Christlicher Bundesbote states that he was elected minister 1843 and elder the following year.) He married Helena Nickel on May 25, 1847, and with the entire Michalin congregation he and his family came to America in 1874, settling east of Newton, Kan., where he continued as elder of the congregation, which was renamed the Gnadenberg (q.v.) Mennonite Church (GCM), established in 1875 near Newton. Five children lived to maturity. Elder Schroeder died April 19, 1899. J.F.S.

Schroeder, Peter R. (1888-1941), was born Aug. 22, 1888, at Mountain Lake, Minn., where he attended the elementary school, German school, and high school. He graduated from Bethel College in 1912 and took some additional work at the University of Chicago, at the School of Theology at Winona Lake, and the University of South Dakota. On Sept. 1, 1910, he married Susie T. Nickel of Mountain Lake. In June 1912 Schroeder became the assistant pastor of the Berne (Ind.) Mennonite Church, although he and his wife had planned to go to India as missionaries. Four daughters were born to them: Celeste, Vernell, Louise, and Esther Ruth. Schroeder was ordained in 1914 by S. F. Sprunger. During his ministry at Berne the church grew in membership from 776 to 1042, as well as growing in other areas. In 1928-30 he served as president of Freeman Junior College, at Freeman, S.D. In 1930 he resigned and became the pastor of the Salem Mennonite Church at Freeman, but continued as Bible teacher of the college until 1936.

In 1933 Schroeder was elected president of the General Conference Mennonite Church. This office he held for two terms, a total of 12 years. In 1936 he attended the third Mennonite World Conference in the Netherlands. In 1940 he became pastor of the Bethel Mennonite Church of Mountain Lake. He died on April 16, 1941, at the age of 52.

P. R. Schroeder had excellent leadership qualities and influenced many young people to go into the ministry and mission work. His emphasis was on a warm Bible-centered concept of the Gospel and Christianity. He was active in evangelistic work and Bible lectures in many states and provinces of North America. C.K.

Schrot, Bernhard, an Anabaptist who was imprisoned in the Oberhaus, a castle in Passau (q.v.), Germany, in 1535. With 14 brethren he was questioned on Sept. 16, 1535, by the judges of Wegscheid, and confessed that he stemmed from Württemberg. Concerning his faith he confessed that he had been baptized five years previously by Andreas von Weiss, who had been executed at Neuenburg on the Danube; concerning the Münsterites he knew nothing; nor were they his brethren, for they shed blood, something that his group did not do; he had no news of them either by word of mouth or writing; it had never occurred to him to join the Turks; he intended to stay by his faith. Schuere (Schure, Scheure), Denys (Dionys) van der (also Verschuren), a Dutch Mennonite preacher and elder, d. 1673 at Haarlem, who served the Waterlander congregation of Amsterdam 1639-71 and Haarlem 1671-73. During his Amsterdam period he conducted at the same time a printing office and bookshop. Among his editions are Bibles and Schabaele's Vereenighing van de Principale Artikelen des Geloofs. His descendants were also printers and booksellers at Amsterdam. Van der Schuere descended from a Mennonite family which had emigrated from Flanders.

In 1640, after Joost Hendriksz (q.v.) had attacked the Waterlanders and accused them of holding unbiblical views concerning the satisfactory death of Christ, Denys van der Schuere and Jacob Cornelisz van Dale (q.v.), his co-preacher in the Amsterdam Waterlander congregation, published Korte Vertooninghe van de onware beschuldigingen . . . Schuester, Casper, a Hutterite martyr, who suffered death by beheading at Michelsburg in the Puster Valley (q.v.) with Martin (q.v.) of Vilgraten in 1538. His death is sung in the hymn (Ausbund, No. 33, where he is called Kaspar von Schöneck), "Merkt auf und nehmt zu Herzen, wie Gott will suchen heim." The Martyrs' Mirror names both martyrs twice; once as Vilgard and Caspar of Schoeneck who died in 1528 (Mart. Mir. D 19, E 429), and again as Martin of Vilgraten and Caspar Schumacher who died in 1538 (Mart. Mir. D 43 f., E 449). The Hutterite chronicle calls them Casper Schuester and Martin aus Vilgräden. Under the name of Kaspar Schumacher the Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (Scottsdale, 1914, p. 86) gives a beautiful hymn, "Erzürn dich nicht, o frommer Christ!" (See Casper of Schöneck, ME I, 522, which

Schu(e)ster, Lorenz (Laurence Schumacher), a Hutterite martyr, who was executed at Sterzing, Tirol (now Italy), in 1532, together with Lamprecht Gruber (q.v.) and four other brethren. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, 105 f.; Zieglschmid, Chronik, 102 f.; Mart. Mir. D 33, E 440.)

Loren(t)z Schu(e)ster was also the name of two other Hutterian Brethren—a deacon at Schäckowitz (q.v.), chosen in 1538, and (perhaps the same?) a deacon at Urschitz (q.v.), near Dämberschitz, who died in 1561. (Zieglschmid, Chronik, 185, 407; ML IV.)

Schuhknecht, Christoph, an Anabaptist martyr, the son of Andreas Zimmermann, who had previously been executed as a martyr, was put to death with Valentin Luckner and two other companions at Michelsburg (q.v.) in the Puster Valley (q.v.) of Tirol, after Oct. 20, 1552 (1553?). They had been caught by Christoph Ochs, the judge of Michelsburg, at a meeting of some twenty Anabaptists in a forest, at which Hans Amon had preached. NEFF.

Schuhmacher, Fridli, a shoemaker of Zollikon (q.v.) near Zürich, Switzerland, who was baptized on Jan. 22, 1525, by Johannes Brötli (q.v.) at the village fountain of Hirslanden. His wife was baptized a few days later by Blaurock (q.v.). In February 1525 Brötli addressed two letters to Fridli, who was apparently one of the leaders of the first Anabaptist congregation of Zollikon. Arrested soon after, Fridli recanted, but when released he continued his activity. In July 1525, he was again in prison. The last information on him is dated Aug. 9, 1525, when he confessed before the judges that he had been baptized, which was "not against God," and that he would stand by it. (TA Zürich.) voZ.

Schuilng, a Dutch Mennonite family, whose descendants are still found in the province of Friesland; they have usually been engaged in farming. Roelof Roelofs Schuilng (b. June 1783 at Kalkwijk, d. July 12, 1871, at Oudebildtziyl) was a son of Roelof Schuilng, a (Reformed) koffskipper and later a farmer at Kalkwijk (q.v.) near Sappemeer in the province of Groningen. Young Roelof Roelofs was baptized in his infancy in the Reformed Church, but joined the Mennonite Church, the church of his mother Elsbet Schuilng, who was a descendant of the Swiss Mennonite Meihuizen (q.v.) family. With independent study and the assistance of a friendly Mennonite pastor (whose name is not given) he became a Mennonite preacher, serving 1812-17 at Oudebildtziyl, 1817-18 at Hindeloopen, and 1818-57 at Oudebildtziyl again, at the same time serving the congregation at Hallum. In 1857 he retired. Though he had little formal education, his good intellect and his untiring devotion made him a man of great influence in Friesland, particularly in the Friesche Doopsgezinde Sociëteit (Mennonite Conference of Friesland), of which he was a trustee for many years. He married Klaaske Thyssen Rienks, of Hallum, of a well-known Frisian Mennonite family.

One of their sons was Klaas Roelofs Schuiling (b. May 9, 1831, at Oudebildtziyl, d. June 11, 1907, at Veenwouden), who after studying at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary served as pastor of the Oldeboorn Oude Huis congregation from 1857. In 1887, when on the instigation of Schuiling a merger was effected between the Oude Huis and the Nieuwe Huis congregations, Schuiling became the pastor of the united congregation, serving until 1889, when he moved to Veenwouden, serving here until 1897, in which year he retired. For many years Klaas R. Schuiling was a trustee of the A.D.S. (Dutch General Mennonite Conference) and a curator of its seminary. He was also on the executive board of the conference of Friesland and a trustee of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association. Many of the Schuiling family have served the church as deacons.

Schulteboat is the Low German name of a meeting of the Mennonite farmers of a village in Russia, Manitoba, Mexico, and Paraguay, under the leadership of the Schulze (q.v.). The meeting included originally only the owners of farms but was later opened to other male members of the village. All questions pertaining to the economic, social, and cultural life of the village were acted upon at these meetings. Only religious matters were left in the hands of the ecclesiastical leaders. J. H. Janzen (q.v.) wrote a Low German play under the title Schulteboat which describes the activities of such a meeting.

Schultz, Peter, was born March 2, 1853, in Gnadenheim, South Russia, the seventh child of Heinrich and Helena Fast Schultz. He came to America in 1874, settling at Mountain Lake, Minn. On Jan. 6, 1878, he married Anna Klassen. Thirteen children were born to them, of whom one son and two daughters died in infancy. Four sons were ministers: G. P. Schultz (deceased), Chicago; H. P. Schultz, Saskatchewan (deceased); D. P. Schultz, South Dakota and Oregon; and Jacob P. Schultz, Saskatchewan (deceased). Schultz was a member of the Brudertal (EMB) Mennonite Church of Mountain Lake until 1903, when he moved to Langham, Sask., where he became a charter member of the Brudertal Church at that place. He was a minister of the Langham Brudertal Church from 1903, and elder from 1909 until 1930.

Peter Schultz's contribution to his community and conference was one of personal work, sound Biblical preaching, and loving church leadership. He was one of the ministers associated with the founding of the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Conference. His occupation was farming; with this he combined the work of the ministry. He died April 13, 1930, at Langham and was buried in the Brudertal cemetery.

Schultze, Daniel Severin (1645-1712), a German Lutheran theologian. He had no pastoral charge, but made a name for himself through his polemics against the Catholics and other non-Lutherans. Of especial interest to Mennonites is his pamphlet against Jakob Denner (q.v.): Wohlgemeinte Warnung für die Gemeinschaft des Gottesdienstes der Mennonisten, zur Ehre Gottes, zur Erbauung der Glaubens-genossen, und zur Besserung der Mennonisten dargestellt (Hamburg, 1706).

At the beginning of his booklet the author speaks of two kinds of Mennonites who meet for worship in Altona (q.v.), near Hamburg; in the smaller meeting a dyer by the name of Jakob Denner preached every Sunday and holiday, and some Lutheran citizens of Hamburg faithfully attended his sermons in order to learn from him the way of life. Denner, Schultze reported, had published eighteen of his sermons under the title, Eenige christelijke uitbreidingen over schriftuurlijke Texten. One of these booklets was sent to him with the request that he admonish his coreligionists not to neglect their own beautiful services; this is what he wished to do after carefully examining the book.

The booklet is an expression of the annoyance of the learned Lutheran clergy at the successful preaching of the simple Mennonite dyer, before whom they were fundamentally helpless.

Schulz (Schultz, Schult), a family name found in Danzig (1674), Tiegenghagen, Ladekopp, Königsberg, and Montau-Gruppe, whence the name was transplanted to Mennonite settlements in Russia and America. The name is likely derived from the office of Schulze (mayor). Among the members of the Schultz family representatives prominent in Mennonite (GCM) church work have been: David Schulz, of Altona, elder of the Bergthal church in Manitoba; J. J. Schulz, manager of the Concordia Hospital at Winnipeg, Man.; Peter Schulz, a minister at Steinbach, Man.; Peter Schulz (q.v.), E.M.B. elder at Langham, Sask.; and Jacob S. Schultz, a former dean of Bluffton College. In the E.M.B.

Church George P. Schultz (1880-1957) was long a leader in the Church and pastor in Chicago; his brother David P. Schultz was pastor at Marion, S.D. A son of George P., Arnold C. Schultz, is now professor of Old Testament at Northern Baptist Theological Seminary in Chicago; he was formerly at Bluffton College. (Reimer, Familiennamen, 117.) C.K.

Schulze is the German title for a village mayor in a Mennonite settlement in Prussia, Russia, Manitoba, Mexico, and Paraguay. The Schulze calls meetings (see Schulteboat) and is the responsible civic leader of a village (q.v.) and was in turn responsible to the Oberschulze (q.v.) of the Mennonite settlement. (See also Government of Mennonites in Russia.) C.K.

Schumacher (Schuhmacher, Schomacher, Schomecher, Shoemaker), a Mennonite family name. Among the early Swiss Anabaptists there are found the names of Fridli (q.v.), Gabriel, Annli, Felix, Caspar (q.v.), Hans, and Verena Schumacher. A Mennonite Schumacher family of Swiss descent, originally from Safenwil, Aargau, was in the 17th and 18th centuries found in Alsace, the Palatinate, and later in America. In Hamburg, Germany, there was a Mennonite Schomacher family in the 17th and 18th centuries, some of whose members were deacons; Johann Janssen Schomacher and his brother Paul were well-to-do owners of Greenland whaling vessels 1654-96. Another (not related) Schomecker Mennonite family was living at Niederdollendorf near Bonn in 1650, whose members shortly after moved to Kriegsheim (q.v.) in the Palatinate.

Among the first Mennonite-Quaker settlers in Germantown, Pa., was Jacob Schuhmacher, of Kriegsheim, who emigrated in 1683, as a servant of J. D. Pastorius (q.v.). He was of Mennonite descent, but had joined the Quakers, like his relatives (?) Peter and Isaac Schumacher, arriving in Philadelphia in 1685, and the children of Georg Schuhmacher, arriving there in 1686. Some of their descendants later became Mennonites. In America they changed the name to Shoemaker (q.v.). vdz.

Schumacher, Hans, of Wynstägen (erroneously called Wünstern by van Bragt), Safenwyl, in the Swiss canton of Aargau, an Anabaptist martyr who was executed in Bern on June 3, 1539. After his execution his family and relatives fled to the canton of Basel. Kaspar Schuhmacher of Safenwyl, who was an Anabaptist preacher in Basel early in the 17th century, no doubt belonged to this family.

Schuster, Peter, an ironmonger of Leoben, Styria, Austria, in whose cross-examination records is found the note: "Peter Schuster has become an Anabaptist. To be investigated." On April 21, 1529, Ferdinand (from Speyer) sent to his chamberlain Veit Zollner the property of the two Anabaptists Franz Intzinger (q.v.) and Peter Schuster. (See Leoben.)

Schütt, Jelle Jansz, mayor, and leader of the Mennonite congregation at Friedrichstadt on the Eider (q.v.), Germany, b. in Ameland in Holland, Nov. 11, 1802, d. Jan. 18, 1895, rendered outstanding service to the congregation in fifty years of untiring devotion and work. On Jan. 3, 1886, he celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his service. In the Hamburg-Altona congregation the name Schütt is also found among the outstanding leaders. NEFF.

Schütz, Johann, an Anabaptist martyr, the author of the song "O Heer, ick magh wel klagen": see Jan Schut.

Schützenecker, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr, a scissors grinder by trade, was seized at Steyr (q.v.) in Upper Austria in June 1527 with other members of an Anabaptist congregation. They refused to make the required recantation and said that the learned priests were themselves in error, they (the Brethren) would adhere to the doctrine taught them by Hans Hut (q.v.) from God's Word, as long as they were not shown something better from the teaching of Christ.

The report of the council of Steyr to the government at Vienna was followed by the order of King Ferdinand of Sept. 10, 1527, that "the imprisoned Anabaptists should be dealt with according to the law and the penalty." Those who recanted should be pardoned; "They must swear an oath that they will desist from the erroneous, seductive, heretical articles and doctrines that they have learned and received from Brother Hans Hut or his aides and related persons, will avoid them and take care not to go to any secret meeting and corner preaching, but will adhere henceforth all their life to the holy Christian church. Furthermore they shall on three successive holidays, when people are going to church, walk around the church in black clothing, bare head, and uncovered face, holding a lighted wax candle in the right hand. Then while the Mass is being sung they shall kneel before the high altar and beseech Almighty God for mercy, for correction of their fall into error and the sin which they have committed, and after the ceremony, with the permission of the priest, return to their homes. The mourning clothing shall be worn for four months. On the holiday or Sunday after the third Sunday each one shall confess to the priest or his assistant and receive the sacrament of the altar. In their homes the penitents shall have no company, avoid all meetings, . . . nor accept any office, bear no weapons nor have them carried after them for an entire year from the first day of the penance. Finally, they shall not change their place of residence for a year if they are living in Steyr or Burgfried, nor sell their home, nor dispose of them in any other way, nor leave Burgfried at all without the knowledge and consent of the government, and they shall also to the best of their ability repay the costs accumulating to His Majesty and to the city of Steyr in their case."

Now began the trial against the Anabaptists who persisted in their faith. Künigl (q.v.), who was appointed as prosecutor by the king, made the charge that they have involved themselves in seductive, heretical, Hutian and Zwinglian doctrine and sect, have practiced the same and still believe them, that they have banded themselves together, attended corner preaching in and out of the city, have also received rebaptism, which they call the sign and covenant of the Lord, which was previously never heard of in the Christian church, disparage infant baptism and the sacrament of the altar, still believe it, and will not let themselves be directed back to the right way: he therefore demands their punishment. The accused Anabaptists replied with a written Verantwortung. It said in effect: It had never been their intention to act contrary to the mandates of His Imperial Majesty, contrary to brotherly love and Christian order. They were well aware of the divine command: Give to Caesar that which is Caesar's, and also of the verse, Be subject to all human authority for the Lord's sake. In this obedience they would persevere to the end with body and possessions.

It was true that they had met several times in order to instruct one another in brotherly love in the Word of God, but not with the intent of fomenting evil or sedition. Furthermore they offered to abstain from such meetings hereafter. But the doctrine which they teach is not new, but the teaching of Christ (Mark 16; Matt. 28; I Cor. 2, 8, and 10; John 3:4 and 5; Rom. 6; I Cor. 15; Luke 12); they knew of no other baptism than the one which they taught. Concerning the sacrament of the altar there was nothing in Scripture, but the Lord's Supper, as He instituted it, they regarded very highly. But from the words of its institution, as described by the holy evangelists and Paul, it could be clearly understood that the body of Christ is not in the form of the bread, nor did they believe that it was. For Christ said: If anyone will say to you, Lo here is Christ, or lo he is there, believe him not (Mark 13). God, who made the world and all that is therein, does not live in temples made with hands, nor is He cared for with human hands as one who has need of anything. He Himself gives life and breath to all!—Künigl replied with violence and demanded the death penalty. But only a part of the jury voted for the death sentence, most of them favoring more lenient measures, another two months' period of indoctrination, and finally expulsion from the country. King Ferdinand heard this report with annoyance. He vigorously demanded their death, and the authorities complied. On Monday, March 30, 1528, the six captured Anabaptists (Hans Schützenecker, Sigmund Peutler, Mathäus Pürchinger, Hans Muhr, Hans Penzenauer, and Leonhard Alexberger) were executed with the sword and their bodies burned. Schützenecker's wife was drowned. In May Hans Heher (q.v.) and later five other Anabaptists seized in the country suffered the same fate as the six named. NEFF.

Schützinger (Schitzinger), Simon (Sigmund), an early Anabaptist, born in Rattenberg (q.v.) in Tirol (according to Widmoser), a co-worker of Jakob Hutter (q.v.) and his assistant in Tirol in the late 1520's. We know of him only through the Chronicle and one letter by Peter Riedemann (q.v.); no writings by Schützinger are known. Twice Hutter and Schützinger made the trip from Tirol to Moravia together to help the beginning communities there to become established on sound Christian principles. At that time there was one Bruderhof in Austerlitz, entrusted to another Tirolean brother, Jörg Zauring (q.v.), populated in the main by Tirolean newcomers; in 1531 it was moved to Auspitz. At that time three groups of Anabaptists lived communally in Moravia: the Gabrielites in Rossitz, and the Philippites and the Tiroleans in two groups in Auspitz. For a while they lived in friendly co-operation and unity. Then, in 1531, after an unpleasant affair involving Zauring's wife it was decided that not Zauring but Schützinger should become the shepherd or "bishop" of the group, in fact the leader of all three groups.

Then, in 1533, Jakob Hutter came to Moravia for the third time, this time to stay. Now a lamentable conflict arose which seriously injured brotherly unity and peace. Hutter felt called by God to become the very shepherd of all brethren who lived in community of goods, but Schützinger showed no intentions to yield the office. Philipp Plener (q.v.) suggested that both should become coleaders as he and Blasy Kuhn (q.v.) were among the Philippites; Gabriel Ascherham (q.v.) opposed this solution; Schützinger felt badly about even the suggestion of sharing in the leadership. The congregations were confused and not able to decide (according to the description of Caspar Braitmichel, the writer of the Chronicle, and most likely an eyewitness). Then a situation arose reminiscent of the story of Sapphira in Acts 5, involving the wife of Jörg Fasser (q.v.). Hutter now proposed spontaneously to see whether or not such a breach of trust might not also have happened among the elders of the community, and a search was undertaken in Schützinger's house. Here they found money hidden under the roof, and Schützinger readily admitted that he had known of this reservation of private money without mentioning it to the brotherhood. Then on Oct. 5, 1533, the congregation convened and excommunicated Schützinger, their former leader. Eight days later Hutter was made bishop of the entire group; but the conflict with the Gabrielites and Philippites continued and led eventually to a complete break in fellowship. Unfortunately, Braitmichel does not say anything about the later fate of Schützinger, who simply disappears from the pages of the Chronicle. It is likely that he returned to his native Tirol. Schuurmans, Hermanus Jz (1867-1942), was a Dutch Mennonite pastor serving at Giethoorn 1894-1910, Den Horn 1910-12, and Sneek 1912-33. He is the author of a volume of novelistic sketches of the Giethoorn people, entitled Van de Oude Garde (Amsterdam, 1907) and of a few sermons. vbZ.

Schuurmans, N. D. (d. 1908 at Haarlem), was a missionary of the Dutch Mennonite Missions Association (q.v.). Being an orphan, he was trained in the Oranjeappel (q.v.) orphanage to be a blacksmith; but he desired to devote his life to Christian missions, and was accepted by the Dutch Mennonite board as a future missionary. After studying in the mission house in Rotterdam, he undertook a journey to visit all the Mennonite congregations in the Netherlands, married C. S. Portugies, and on March 18 (1863) entered the service of the mission. He went to Java to support Pieter Jansz (q.v.) in his work. In August 1863 he took up his work in Japara. His especial work was with the schools. On March 27, 1875, he sent a warm letter of thanks to the Sembach "Groschenverein" with a description of his work. He also wrote a letter to America. He thus maintained close contact with his brethren. But in a few years his wife and child became ill and his own health broke down; in 1878 he had to give up his work. On the journey home he suffered a serious shipwreck, in which he lost all his goods. At home he again devoted himself with zeal to the cause of missions. His account, Overzicht van het Zendingsveld in Nederlandsch Indië, has historical value. NEFF, vbZ.

This work, which attacks the Mennonites, tries to refute a number of quotations from the Protocol of the Emden disputation, the books of Twisck, Claes Claesz, François de Knuyt, and other Mennonite authors. Schuyring's refutation, approved by the Reformed classis of Zevenwolden and dedicated to the governors of the Frisian district of Opsterland, is picaresque and not very convincing. Schwebel, Johannes (1490-1540), the reformer of Zweibrücken, a town in the Palatinate, Germany, served on the Ebernburg from June to October 1522, was then pastor in Landstuhl, the residential town of Franz von Sickingen, and then in Zweibrücken from April 1523 until his death. In 1532 he felt himself compelled to take up strenuous battle with Anabaptist views. He became involved in a dispute with Georg Pistor (q.v.), his colleague in Ernstweiler, who was favorably inclined toward the Anabaptists, in consequence of which Pistor had to leave Zweibrücken. But the Anabaptist movement was not wiped out. Several years later a Christian Schuhmacher and a certain Nader were forced to recant their Anabaptist views. Schwebel was also used in other places in the suppression of the Anabaptists. Schweiger (Silentes, i.e., Silent Anabaptists) were a group of unknown number and origin who apparently observed an absolute rule of silence. Several authors reported on this group, the earliest of whom was Sebastian Franck in his Chronica of 1531 (folio 446). It may be that all subsequent writers mentioning the group relied on Franck. At any rate the next reference to them occurs in the correspondence between Caspar Schwenckfeld (q.v.) and Sibilla Eisler concerning her maid who was apparently an Anabaptist and who refused to greet people or thank them. Sibilla asked Schwenckfeld's advice on the matter. Schwenckfeld pointed out that the maid's attitude was due to a faulty exegesis of Luke 10:4 ("Greet no one on the way"), but was uncertain of the relationship between the "Schweiger" and the Anabaptists. However, he called them Anabaptists and claimed that they rejected all external oral Christian teaching, and despised the Holy Scriptures and edifying books. He located them as a group in Allgäu, a region south of Ulm toward the Bavarian Alps.

The Silentes are also mentioned in Gabriel Prateolus' De vitis, sectis et dogmatibus omnium haereticorum (Cologne, 1569). (See Nicoladoni.) The Schweiger are No. 15 in George Eder's list of 1573, and Erhard's list of 1589.

At the time when Franck was in Strasbourg writing his Chronica the Anabaptists had the practice of not greeting people on the street who were not a part of their fellowship. Bucer accused Marpeck of not speaking to him on the street, but wanting to discuss matters pertaining to the Christian faith behind closed doors in the council chambers. It may be that as a result of this practice some began to dub the Anabaptists "Schweiger," although it is also possible that a sect called "Schweiger" actually existed. If so, and if Schwenckfeld's description of them is accurate, it is clear that they did not belong to Anabaptism proper, for Anabaptism always placed a high value on preaching and the oral reading of the Word of God. Schwenckfeld, Kaspar: see Supplement.

Schwenckfelder Church, a body in Pennsylvania taking its name from the Silesian nobleman, lay evangelist, and reformer, Caspar Schwenckfeld von Ossig (1489-1561). Within the first two decades of the 16th-century Reformation there were Christians in Europe known as Lutherans, Zwinglians, Anabaptists, and Schwenckfelders, the followers of Caspar Schwenckfeld. Here and there in Silesia whole congregations and their pastors supported the teaching of the last named. Later on this was also true in isolated cities and areas of South Germany. Schwenckfeld never permitted his followers to form a body under his name. Nor would he countenance the establishment of another ecclesiastical division. His followers were spoken of as brethren or brotherhoods; he himself came to speak of them as Confessors of the Glory of Christ. There never was an organization of them in Europe, where thousands adhered to them, from the Prussian shores of the Baltic, in parts of Poland, Silesia and Glatz, through South Germany to Lake Constance and to Strasbourg.

The persecutions they suffered even unto death for two hundred years were extremely bitter. But all this did not prevent peasants and artisans, merchants and professionals, statesmen and nobles, both Catholic and Protestant from following after them. However, by the end of the Thirty Years' War they had apparently disappeared from South Germany. Thereafter we find them only in Lower Silesia and in an area west of the cities of Liegnitz and Goldberg in the villages of Harpersdorf, Langneundorf, Armenruh, Lauterseifen, Hohenau, and Laubgrund. Here they were addressed by letter before 1670 by Philipp Jakob Spener (q.v.), and the Quaker Roger Longworth in 1675 visited their physician Martin John Jr. (1624-1707) in Laubgrund, who was the first to notice that wax is a product of the body of the honeybee. They were given to diligent and intensive study of the Scriptures. From the time of Schwenckfeld himself they pursued the study of languages and mathematics; he had from 1523 on, the service and support of the erudite Valentine Crautwald, lector at Saint Thomas in Liegnitz, as his linguist. The Schwenckfelders have throughout their history been noted for their interest in education and learning, with extensive literary activity.

In Silesia the Anabaptists and Schwenckfelders were close c1570, for the latter often had Anabaptist writings.

When it was found that they were not to be won for the established churches either by persecution or by persuasion it was reported to the Austrian authorities that in the Lower Silesian villages there were these unchurched heretical people. The eminent schoolman and 19th-century Schwenckfeld research scholar, A. F. H. Schneider (1806-90) of Berlin, believed that about 1719-20 they had at least 1,250 members. Emperor Charles VI authorized the creation of an especial Jesuit mission to convert them to the Roman Catholic faith. Such a mission, composed of Johan Milan for Harpersdorf and Carolus Regent for Langneundorf, made its appearance in December 1719. Although the Schwenckfelders sent able representatives to the Austrian court in Vienna, who presented seventeen petitions pleading for toleration, by 1724 it was clear that their only hope for preservation was to flee from their homes and country. But where were they to go? Through the kindness of Count Zinzendorf (q.v.) they found temporary asylum on his estates in and around Herrnhut and Berthelsdorf in Saxony. They fled by night, a few families at a time, leaving cattle in the stall and their farms abandoned. About 500 men, women, and children fled in 1725-36. However, only a brief respite was given them. By 1730 there were signs that they must move again. In 1731 one of their young men reached Philadelphia; in 1733, when they were given a year's time to dispose of their property, 14 more came to Philadelphia; on Sept. 22, 1734, the main body, 171 souls, arrived in Philadelphia; in 1736 eight more came, and a final 14 in 1737. The number of those who came to Pennsylvania in that period did not exceed 212. Melchior Dorn, the last survivor of those who remained in Europe, died in Harpersdorf in 1826.

The Mennonites of the Netherlands had come to the assistance of the Schwenckfelders during their sojourn in Saxony. When they set out for Pennsylvania Hinrich van der Smissen, a Mennonite minister in Hamburg, was host to them; he entertained the larger body of 1734 for ten days in Altona and fitted out three sailing vessels in which he had them transported to Amsterdam. Cornelis van Putten, the Mennonite pastor, showed them great kindness, and the Mennonite van Buysant family in Haarlem munificently entertained them and in addition paid for their passage on the "Saint Andrew," besides an additional fund of 224 Rixthalers for their poor. They sailed from Rotterdam on June 19, 1734.

On Sept. 23, 1734, the day after the arrival of the larger body in Philadelphia, the Schwenckfelder group gave their promise of loyalty to the Crown of England, sealing it with a handclasp. The following day was designated as a day of thanksgiving for their deliverance and safe arrival in Pennsylvania. Each succeeding year they and their descendants have held a service of remembrance on September 24, calling it their "Gedächtnstag."

The Schwenckfelders settled in southeastern Pennsylvania on lands lying today in the counties of Philadelphia, Montgomery, Berks, and Lehigh. Their first minister in Pennsylvania was Georg Weiss (1687-1740), whom they chose before their arrival. Through the first 55 years of their life here their worship services were conducted in their homes; their first meetinghouse was built in 1789. To avoid total disintegration they finally, in 1782, organized themselves into the Society of Schwenckfelders, and under that name they functioned until 1909, when they were incorporated as the Schwenckfelder Church. Since then the five congregations have been individually incorporated. At the end of 1953 their total church membership was 2,540.

The Schwenckfelder Board of Missions was organized in 1895, their Board of Publication in 1898, succeeding the Publishing Committee appointed in 1884; under the combined auspices of the Schwenckfelder Church and the Hartford Theological Seminary it has published the Corpus Schwenckfeldianorum, a complete scholarly edition of the writings of Caspar Schwenckfeld. Volumes I to XV were issued in 1907-39. The Board of Charities has a fund resting back upon the 224 Rixthalers of 1734, now exceeding $12,000.

The General Conference is the official body of the Schwenckfelder Church. All its officers are laymen. Under its direction a committee began operations in 1885 which led to the creation of the Schwenckfelder Library, incorporated in 1946, at Pennsburg, Pa. Similarly also the General Conference in 1891 purchased the property of the Perkiomen Seminary, since 1916 known as Perkiomen School, originally founded in 1874-75. This is a college preparatory school for boys, enrolling 200 each year. The polity of the Schwenckfelders is congregational. For them the kingdom of God is a spiritual one revealed in Jesus Christ. The Scriptures are the record of the voice of the Word of God. The Word of God is that which transcends whatever is written or printed whether on parchment or paper. The Christian must be free and unfettered by human creeds and human authority. The spirit must have free course to follow the light of truth as it advances. Government essential to maintain an orderly society has no right to interfere with or influence religious convictions.

The Schwenckfeldian, published monthly since 1903, is the official organ, published at Philadelphia. Of literature mention may be made of Howard W. Kriebel, The Schwenckfelders in Pennsylvania (Lancaster, 1904); Elmer Schultz Gerhard, A Vindication of Caspar Schwenckfeld von Ossig: An Elucidation of His Doctrine and the Vicissitudes of His Followers, translated from the German and edited (Allentown, 1942); Formula for the Government and Discipline of the Schwenckfelder Church (1948), Beliefs and Teachings of the Schwenckfelder Church (Norristown, 1956). Schwer(d)tlér (i.e., bearers of swords), a name given to the faction of the Anabaptists at Nikolsburg, Moravia, led by Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.) and Hans Spittelmayer (q.v.), which defended the use of the sword in a war of defense, though not in self-defense or for the protection of one's own property. They also defended the payment of war taxes. The faction of the Anabaptists led by Jacob Widemann (q.v.) and Philipp Jäger (q.v.), which stood for complete nonresistance and carried the staff in place of the sword, were called Stäbler. The definite break between the two groups occurred at the debates held on these questions at Nikolsburg (q.v.) in 1526, at which Hans Hut (q.v.) took the side "against the sword," while Hubmaier defended the sword. The "Schwertler" party died out by 1529, while the Stäbler developed into the Hutterites. The Hutterite Chronik (Zieglschmid, 86) states that the Schwertler "now (=1542?) are called Sabbather and have the Münsterite spirit. By this spirit Lord Leonard Liechtensteiner (q.v.) . . . expelled Jacob Widemann and Philipp Jäger together with their other brethren." H.S.B.

Schwetzer Niederung (Lowlands near Schwetz), a district (starostei) on the Vistula in West Prussia, until 1772 belonging to Poland. Dutch colonists reclaimed this swampy area in the 16th and 17th centuries. In the Schwetzer Niederung were found the villages of Deutsch-Westfalen, Brattwin, Schöna, Kleinsee (Jeziorka, q.v.), Neunhuben, Wintersdorf, Christfelde, and Kossowo. Wintersdorf (Przechovka, q.v.) was the first Mennonite settlement (c1540). About 1650 there was a considerable number of Mennonites in all these villages, and some villages were completely Mennonite. Until the early 18th century the Mennonites enjoyed many privileges such as the freedom to organize their own schools, and exemption from military taxes and quartering soldiers. By their able land-draining and their skillful farming the Schwetzer Niederung became very prosperous, but repeated floods, exploitation by the rulers and officials, and restrictive economic regulations caused the Mennonites to move away from 1765 to 1850 (to Brenkenhoffswalde and Deutsch-Wymysle); by 1850 all the Mennonites had left this area. vDZ.

Schwindern (Swinderen), Hans van (von), a Dutch immigrant to Schildlitz, a suburb of Danzig, West Prussia, where he was a preacher of the Flemish Mennonite congregation from c1565. Of his life and activity nothing is known but the fact that he sided with the elder Quiryn van der Meulen (q.v.). Both van der Meulen and van Schwindern were banned in 1586. Schwisser, Michael, of Saytarn (?) near Speyer, Germany, was imprisoned in the Upper House at Passau (q.v.) with a number of his brethren on Sept. 16, 1535. At his trial on September 16 he confessed that he had been baptized by Hans Schwaigern near Heilbronn, and had been an Anabaptist for 1½ years. Schwisser was among those who remained steadfast. Science Ridge Mennonite Church (MC), located two miles north of Sterling, Whiteside Co., Ill., is a member of the Illinois Conference. The first Mennonites to arrive in this area (1852) were Benjamin Stauffer and wife from Lancaster, Pa. In 1865 a group of 55 came from Franklin County, Pa. The church was organized in 1858. At first the preaching was all in German, and services were held only every two weeks. Sunday school was not attempted until 1882. The greatest spiritual awakening came with the John S. Coffman revivals in 1889, when at one time 45 were added to the church. A. C. Good (ordained preacher in 1906, bishop in 1934) served as pastor 1906-52. In 1957 the membership was 208, with J. Frederick Erb as pastor and bishop. A.C.G.

Scott, Clifford Isaiah, was born in Emporia, Kan., Oct. 19, 1871, the son of Isaiah and Harriet Sinks Scott. He married Olive Shelley on Nov. 10, 1896. He served as pastor of various churches in the Indiana and Ohio Conference, and also in the Nebraska Conference of the United Missionary Church. In 1906-8 he was district superintendent of the Ohio District of the Indiana and Ohio Conference; 1914-33 district superintendent of the Nebraska Conference. He was a delegate to the Quadrennial General Conference five times, and chairman once. He died in 1933. J.A.Hu.

Scott Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church, located 12 miles north and 7 miles west of Scott City, Scott Co., Kan., began in 1943, and was organized in 1945, at which time a house of worship was built. In 1957 it had 93 members, with Ervin Nightengale and Albert Dirks as the ministers in charge. A.Dr.

Scott County (Missouri) Old Order Amish. An Amish settlement consisting of about 35 members at the most lived in Scott County about 1924-36. The original settlers, the families of Dan P. Bontrager, Sam S. Miller, Christ M. Bontrager, Joe Schrock, John S. Miller, and Sam Mast, came to Scott County from Butler County about fifty miles west, having moved there from Reno County, Kan. M. E. Bontrager served as bishop and Christ M. Bontrager as minister. D. Roy Nisley was ordained in 1929. The congregation was discontinued in 1934. All of the families moved to Indiana, Michigan, and Buchanan County, Iowa, the last family leaving in 1936. J.M.B.

Scottdale, situated on the southern boundary between Westmoreland and Fayette counties, Pa., was incorporated on Feb. 7, 1874. It was laid out on the farms of Jacob S. and Peter S. Loucks, both grandsons of the Mennonite pioneer settler, Peter Loucks, who moved to this vicinity from Berks County, Pa., in 1800. The population is about 6,500, but with the surrounding community there are about 10,000 inhabitants. It is the home of the Mennonite Publishing House (since 1908) and of its predecessor, the Gospel Witness Company, founded in 1905. The Scottdale Mennonite Church, built in 1893 and rebuilt in 1939, is located in the city. There is another church in Kingview, about a mile east in Fayette County, and a place of worship at North Scottdale in East Huntingdon Township, about a mile to the north. These churches are the successors of two earlier places of worship—at Pennsville, Fayette County, and Stonerville (Alverton), Westmoreland County. J.L.H.

Scottdale (Pa.) Mennonite Church (MC) is an outgrowth of the Mennonite settlement in the Jacobs Creek Valley of Fayette and Westmoreland counties, Pa., which began in 1789. A log meetinghouse was erected at Pennsville, in Fayette County, some time before 1800, and another at Stonerville (now Alverton), in Westmoreland County, about 1800. The settlement grew during the first fifty years, reaching a membership of 200 or more in 1840. The next fifty years was a period of decline for various reasons, such as shift of population as people moved west, use of the German language after it was outmoded, failure to use progressive methods of Christian work such as the Sunday school, and lack of adequate resident leadership, until the membership dropped to 16 in 1892. The first step toward revival was the ordination of Aaron Loucks to the ministry on Sept. 18, 1892. A new meetinghouse was built on the corner of Market and Grove streets in Scottdale and dedicated on Dec. 3, 1893. It superseded the use of the other two buildings in about ten years. It was replaced by a larger building on the same site in 1939. By 1905 the congregation numbered 50 members. Through the influx of people drawn into the community by the publishing interests established in Scottdale in 1905 and an active missionary program the congregation grew to a membership of 273 in 1954.

In 1906 a mission Sunday school was opened at East Scottdale and in 1934 a similar effort was begun in North Scottdale. In 1952 a new church, called the Kingview Mennonite Church, was built in East Scottdale. The congregation was organized in January 1955 with 50 charter members, a number transferring from the home congregation; in 1957 the membership was 59. The school building at North Scottdale was purchased in 1954. In 1958 the building was remodeled and a congregation of some 55 organized. J.L.H.

Seagoing Cowboys, a term applied to the men in CPS Reserve, a unit in Civilian Public Service (q.v.), also known as the UNRRA (q.v.) Reserve Unit. These men served as attendants with livestock shipments going to Europe. The first men assigned to this duty sailed on a cattle boat Feb. 12, 1946. Of the 366 CPS men in the program, 167 were listed as Mennonite and Brethren in Christ. Most of the ships left from Newport News, Va., most of them carried horses instead of cattle, and their destination was generally Greece, Yugoslavia, or Poland. Some of the men made three or more trips each. Ben Bushong of the Brethren Service Commission, who was responsible for selecting attendants for the UNRRA livestock ships, eventually chose many Mennonite young men and farmers who had not been in CPS or who had been demobilized to serve on these boats. The total number of Mennonites accompanying the UNRRA livestock shipments was very likely over 300. These trips gave most of these men their first experience with ocean travel, their first contacts with Europe, and their first opportunities to engage directly in foreign relief service. The total effect of these experiences on the life of the churches remains to be evaluated. (M. Gingerich, Service for Peace, Akron, 1949, pp. 187-89.) M.G.

Second Mennonite Church (GCM), of Philadelphia, Pa., was established in 1894 when the First Mennonite Church of Philadelphia started a mission on Janney Street. In 1897 a private home at 3007 North Sixth Street was rented for worship services. On April 4, 1899, the present church was dedicated at the corner of Franklin Street and Indiana Avenue and on May 5, 1899, the congregation was officially organized with 36 members and with Silas M. Grubb as pastor. Until 1912 the congregation was supported by the First Mennonite Church. In 1915 the congregation had a membership of 190.

The congregation was served by S. M. Grubb from 1899 until 1938, from 1938-41 by Erland Walther, from 1942-43 by Edwin M. Crawford, from 1943-49 by Walter J. Dick. In 1958 Curtis Lehman was pastor; the membership was 85. C.K.

Second Mennonite Church (GCM), Springs, Pa., was established c1925, when a group of excommunicated members of the Springs Mennonite Church (MC) formed a new fellowship, which c1944 joined the Eastern District Conference (GCM). Edward Miller, a minister of the Springs M.C. congregation but living at Inwood, W. Va., some 100 miles distant, was called as supply preacher c1928, serving once a month, but soon only for two communion services per year. In 1958 the membership was 18. They used the Brethren meetinghouse in Salisbury, some 6 miles north of Springs. H.S.B.

Secondary Education, the level of education between the elementary school (usually ages 6-14 in North America, and 6-10 or 14 in Europe) and (in North America) the college or (in Europe) the university.

This article treats only the regular secondary school, not specialized schools such as Bible schools (q.v.).

No Mennonite secondary schools were ever established in Holland, France, or Switzerland. In Germany one Mennonite secondary boys' school was established at Weierhof (q.v.) in the Palatinate (see Realanstalt am Donnersberg) in 1867, which developed into an excellent institution under private Mennonite management and with a Mennonite principal and part Mennonite faculty, but with only a small number of Mennonite students. The Weierhof Mennonite pastor customarily taught religion in the school. It was taken over by the Nazi regime in 1941, and then used by the French and American armies 1945-57. The school was finally reconstituted in 1959. The Russian Mennonites, however, developed a strong secondary school program, which had a total of at least 23 schools in the Ukraine at its height in 1910, seventeen for boys, five for girls, and one coeducational, with an enrollment range per school of 70-200 pupils, and three to six teachers, usually with a three-year program, although several schools had four years. These were called Zentral-schulen (q.v.) since they were thought of as central schools for a district.

The first secondary school in Russia was established in 1822 at Ohrloff in the Molotschna colony by the School Association led by Johann Cornies (q.v.). It was planned as a school to prepare teachers, although it taught only content subjects, no educational methods or theory subjects. This school became the pattern for others to follow. Three outstanding Russian secondary school pioneer educators were the first two principals of the Ohrloff school, Tobias Voth (q.v.) 1822-29 and Heinrich Heese (q.v.) 1829-42, and Heinrich Franz (q.v.), principal of the Chortitza secondary school 1846-58. In the first 50 years only two additional schools were established, Halbstadt in the Molotschna (1835) and the Chortitza school in the Old Colony (1842). Growth was slow until the early part of the 20th century. The only new boys' schools until 1905 were Gnadenfeld in the Molotschna (1874) and Neu-Schönsee in the Zagradovka settlement (1895). The first girls' secondary schools were at Halbstadt in the Molotschna (1874) and Chortitza (1895). By 1910 some 200 Russian Mennonite youth were attending Russian schools and colleges, in addition to the 2,000 attending the Mennonite secondary schools. Zentralschulen were also established in the Crimea, and in the Orenburg, Ufa, and Slavgorod daughter settlements from 1908 on and even after the Revolution.

At first the secondary curriculum was determined by the Mennonite administration of each school, although it was commonly patterned after the first two schools, Ohrloff and Chortitza. After the new military service law of 1874 permitted graduates of an approved secondary school to reduce the period of military service from six to three years, the Mennonites planned a new curriculum to qualify their schools for approval, which was granted by the Russian Department of Education in 1876. Besides the common general subjects, this curriculum included for every year Bible study and church history (including Mennonite history and faith) and both German and Russian languages and choral singing. This curriculum called for a six-year program, but later the four-year program was restored, which continued until 1920.

A regular two-year teacher-training course (Normal School) was added to the Halbstadt Zentral-schule in 1878. In 1890 a similar program was adopted at the Chortitza Zentralschule. These two schools trained most of the Mennonite elementary teachers until 1917. Plans to create a separate 3-4 year normal school could not be carried out until 1917. It was perfected in 1921 as the "Molotschnaer Mennonitisches Lehrerseminar."

Girls were not refused admission to the Zentral-schulen until 1870, although but few actually enrolled. The first effective girls' secondary school was established at Halbstadt in 1874, which finally developed into an 8-year Gymnasium. The first regular coeducational school was established in 1908 at Davlekanovo in the Ufa settlement.

The graduates of the Mennonite Zentralschule were not eligible for admission to the Russian state higher schools. The Halbstadt Kommerzschule (8-year program) established in 1908, patterned after the German Realgymnasium, was equal to the Russian Commercial or Realschule, hence its graduates could now enter the state schools, but not the universities, which required graduation from a classical Gymnasium. No Mennonite secondary school in Russia ever attained this standard. The Kommerzschule also offered training for entrance into business activities. Students coming from the Zentral-schule were admitted to the fifth year of the Kommerzschule.

In addition to the "official" secondary schools under the management of colony-appointed boards, a number of private secondary schools were in operation, usually financed and promoted by wealthy estate owners.

All Mennonite education in Russia was under the supervision of the Mennonite ministers until 1843. This was the standard ruling of the Russian government for all foreign immigrant groups in Russia, especially the Germans. This worked satisfactorily for the Lutherans and Catholics, whose ministers were trained and salaried, but not for the Mennonites, whose ministers were untrained and self-supporting. In 1843 the government placed the Mennonite schools under the Agricultural Association (q.v.), which also was not logical, since education was only a secondary responsibility for it. After the death of Cornies (1848) the situation deteriorated until boards of education were organized to operate the schools (in the Molotschna and Chortitza colonies in 1869). From 1881 to 1905 the Russianization pressures of the government handicapped the schools, threatening their independence and Mennonite character. In 1905, the year of proclamation of new liberties in Russia (Manifesto of Czar Nicholas), the Mennonite school program took on new life, and several new secondary schools were established. A Mennonite Teachers' Association (q.v.) was soon formed which gradually took over many of the functions of the boards of education, which had been forced almost out of action. Due to the drafting of many teachers in 1914-17 (World War I) the schools suffered. The return of the teachers in 1917 repaired the damage, and in spite of many troubles five new Zentralschulen were established in 1917-20. One of these schools was still operating in 1931. But the program of the new Soviet Communist state, which soon led to the nationalization of all schools, created increasing difficulties for the Mennonite schools. Religious instruction was forbidden, although continued for a brief time under the guise of Mennonite history. By 1928 the government had succeeded in setting up and bringing into operation its own program of education. From now on the Mennonite teachers were forced out as rapidly as Russian communist teachers could be supplied. Under Stalin all teachers had to sign an atheist questionnaire. Most Mennonites refused to sign and lost their jobs. This was the final end of Mennonite secondary education, at least in the Ukraine. It is not clear when the secondary schools in the Ural region and in Siberia were closed.

Under the German occupation of the Ukraine in the fall of 1941 the German schools and churches were to be reoriented and religious instruction allowed. The Chortitza Zentralschule was reopened and celebrated its 100th anniversary in 1942. The dominant Nazi ideology soon began to interfere with real freedom, but before other Zentralschulen were reopened the Germans evacuated the Ukraine in 1943, taking the German population with them.

United States. The first Mennonite secondary school in the United States was the school at Wadsworth, Ohio, operated by a board of the General Conference Mennonite Church, 1868-78. Although its purpose was the training of ministers, it was actually largely a secondary school to which a program of Biblical and theological courses was added. (Mention should be made of Freeland Seminary founded in 1848 at Collegeville, Pa., by Abraham Hunsicker, at that time a preacher in the GCM Church, which ultimately became Ursinus College. Henry Hunsicker, son of Abraham, was principal 1848-65. Both Abraham and Henry were expelled from the Mennonite Church in 1851, after which they were nonsectarian.)

Meanwhile the new Mennonite immigrants from Russia, with their tradition of education provided by the church, finding no high schools in their new settlements in Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota, and the Dakotas, established a series of German preparatory schools (q.v.), the first of which was founded at Goessel, Kan., in 1879, which finally developed into Halstead Seminary, established in 1883 at Halstead, moved in 1893 to what became the Bethel College campus in North Newton, and continued there as Bethel College Academy. Other schools were established at Mountain Lake, Minn. (1886); Buhler, Kan. (1889); Beatrice, Neb. (1890); Hillsboro, Kan. (1897); Whitewater, Kan. (1900); Henderson, Neb. (1902); and nine others in 1906-38. These schools gradually all died out. (See Preparatory Schools.) Bethel College Academy was discontinued in 1927 with a brief revival during World War II (1944-46).

In addition to the Bethel College Academy, a series of Mennonite secondary schools called academies, all of which have developed into colleges, were established 1894-1917 as follows: Elkhart Institute (MC) 1894 (to Goshen in 1903), now Goshen College; Central Mennonite College (GCM) at Bluffton, 1900, now Bluffton College; Hesston Academy (MC) at Hesston, Kan., 1909, now Hesston College; Freeman Academy (GCM), Freeman, S.D., 1903, now Freeman Junior College; Eastern Mennonite School at Harrisonburg, Va., 1917, now Eastern Mennonite College; and Tabor Academy (1908), now Tabor College. At Hesston, Harrisonburg, and Freeman the academies have continued as high-school departments alongside of the colleges. At Goshen, Bluffton, and Tabor they were discontinued.

Two Mennonite secondary schools developed in Western Canada about the same time, which have continued and have not grown into colleges—Mennonite Collegiate Institute at Gretna, Man. (1889), and Rosthern German-English Academy at Rosthern, Sask. (1908).

A new day came for Mennonite secondary education in the United States after 1940, partly as a result of the pressure of World War II. A series of Mennonite high schools were established in the Mennonite Church (MC) as follows: Lancaster (Pa.) Mennonite School 1942, Bethel Springs School (Culp, Ark.) 1944, Johnstown (Pa.) Mennonite School 1944, Iowa Mennonite School (Kalona) 1945, Belleville (Pa.) Mennonite School 1945, Rockway Mennonite School (Kitchener, Ont.) 1945, Western Mennonite School (Salem, Ore.) 1945, Christopher Dock Mennonite School (Lansdale, Pa.) 1954, Bethany Christian High School (Goshen, Ind.) 1954, and one planned to open at Kidron, Ohio, in 1959. These are mostly conference-owned and -operated schools.

Two similar schools have been established by private groups in the General Conference Mennonite Church: Oklahoma Bible Academy (Meno) 1917 and Berean Academy (Elbing, Kan.) 1946. Central Kansas Bible Academy (Hutchinson), est. 1948, is inter-Mennonite (GCM, KMB, MB), as are Meade Bible Academy (Kan.) 1945 (EMB and GCM), Immanuel Academy (Reedley, Cal.) 1944 (MB and KMB), and Lustre Bible Academy (Mont.) 1947 (GCM, EMB, MB). One Mennonite Brethren secondary school has been operating since 1902, the Corn (Okla.) Bible Academy.

In 1956 the total enrollment of the 17 Mennonite secondary schools in the United States (including Hesston and EMC) was 22,300, of which 21,650 were in the 10 MC schools.

In 1958 Canadian Mennonites were operating 11 high schools, 5 MB, 4 GCM, 1 MC, and 1 inter-Mennonite. Two of the GCM schools, Gretna and Rosthern, were of the old type, but all the rest were new type, founded since World War II, and all but Rockway and Steinbach (Man.) by the newer Russian Mennonite immigrants of 1922-27. These include the MB Collegiate Institute in Winnipeg, Man. (1945), Mennonite Educational Institute at Clearbrook (formerly Abbotsford), B.C. (1944, with one GCM congregation participating), Alberta Mennonite High School, Coaldale, Alberta (1946), Sharon Mennonite Educational Institute, Yarrow, B.C., and Eden Christian College, Niagara-on-the-Lake, Ont., and two GCM schools: the United Mennonite Educational Institute at Leamington, Ont. (1944), and Mennonite Educational Institute, Winnipeg (1958).

Steinbach (Man.) Bible Academy was founded in 1946 (closed and then restarted in 1953) as an independent inter-Mennonite private school supported chiefly by EMB, Kleine Gemeinde (now EM), and Immanuel Mennonite members. The total attendance at the eleven schools in Canada in 1958 was c1900. Two earlier high schools in the Fraser Valley, B.C., at Yarrow (1945-49) and Greendale-Sardis (1948-59), were of short duration. The Mennonite Educational Institute operated at Altona, Man., 1908-26, when its building burned down.

All the Mennonite high schools in the United States and Canada today maintain a strong emphasis on their Christian character, and most of them also emphasize their Mennonite character and their particular denominational loyalty. All are supported by private donations and tuition fees. Most of them also maintain high academic standards equal to the public high schools or better, and a number of them are accredited by the states or provinces in which they are located. The six Canadian schools operated by the newer immigrant groups also emphasize German language teaching.

The Mennonite foreign missions in the Far East and Africa generally have established secondary schools in their areas as soon as feasible. Dhamtari (India) Christian Academy (MC), for instance, was established in 1913. In the Latin-American countries, because of the relatively high level of education, this was not done.

The new Mennonite settlements established 1930 and later by refugees from Russia in Paraguay have produced three 4-year secondary schools, the Filadelfia Zentralschule in Colonia Fernheim, Chaco, the Zentralschule in the central village in the Friesland Colony in East Paraguay, and the Neuland Zentralschule in the Chaco. The Filadelfia school has added a two-year teachers' institute.

In Brazil a Zentralschule was established in Witmarsum in the Krauel Colony (c1938), but in World War II all private schools in Brazil were nationalized and the use of the German language in schools was suppressed. In 1954 a Mennonite Zentralschule was established near Curitiba.

Secret Societies, commonly called lodges, are oath-bound fraternities with more or less secret grips, signs, ritual, and the like, the most significant perhaps being the Freemasons. Persons unite with secret societies for the fellowship they provide, for the sense of security they afford, sometimes for financial benefits, and for the religious ritual they offer. It is often also a matter of prestige to be a member of a lodge. One of the oldest lodges is the Ancient Order of Free and Accepted Masons, a fraternity which probably had its beginnings in the trade guilds of the Middle Ages but which claims to have been originated by King Solomon in ancient Israel. Until the 19th century no Mennonite would have wanted to join a lodge nor would he have been accepted into lodge membership. But in the last hundred years, as Mennonites have become somewhat more culturally assimilated, there has been a tendency in the less strict congregations to tolerate lodge membership on the part of members.

The official position of the various Mennonite groups has remained one of opposition to lodge membership, however. There are five reasons for this opposition. For one thing Mennonites in all lands have always been opposed to the oath, and secret societies are oath-bound. Christ said, "But I say unto you, Swear not at all" (Matt. 5:34). In his excellent exposition of this prohibition of the oath (q.v.) Christian Neff shows that Christ intended His words to be taken at their face value, for lesser oaths involving the temple or its altar are wrong precisely for the reason that they ultimately involve a real oath taken in the name of God. Matt. 23:16-22. It would therefore be impossible for a Christian who rejects the oath to unite with an oath-bound organization. But more than that, the oaths sworn by various lodges are particularly offensive by their severe sanctions, so that even some Christian denominations which do not oppose a simple legal oath nevertheless object to the oaths sworn by the Masons; this is true of the Orthodox Presbyterian Church, for example.

A second reason for the Mennonite objection to membership in secret societies is the desire to be free and open witnesses for Christ and His Gospel. Christ Himself said that He had taught nothing in secret. His teaching and program were open to all. He had no secrets. John 18:20. Mennonites, seeking to follow their Lord in this respect, do not believe that it is right for a Christian to have a part in organized secrecy.

The Mennonites as a brotherhood type of church seek to avoid any inconsistent use of titles. They feel that the church should consist of believers who are spiritually on one level. Historically they called each other brother and sister. It is therefore impossible for them to reconcile the teaching of Jesus (Matt. 23:8-10) against employing such common titles as Rabbi, Father, or Teacher, or such near-blasphemous titles as Worshipful Grand Master, as are used in secret societies. The hierarchy of the lodge is for Mennonites irreconcilable with New Testament Christianity.

A fourth objection which is sometimes raised against lodges is their supposedly sub-Christian ethics. A lodge member, for example, may swear not knowingly to have carnal relations with the wife, sister, or daughter of a fellow lodge member. Why not, ask some Christians, simply become a Christian and live a holy Christian life? It is of course recognized that many lodge members would not stoop to immorality of any kind.

The most serious objection to membership in such secret societies as the Masons is their offering salvation to those who keep the rules of the lodge. All members expect to go to the "Grand Lodge Above" fully prepared to meet the "Supreme Architect of the Universe." This position is held whether or no the member believes in Christ. But Christians hold fast to the clear word of Christ that He is the only Door, that no man can come to the Father but by Him. John 10:1-18; 14:6. The apostolic message was that only through Christ could men be saved. Acts 4:12.

The Mennonite position on secret societies is set forth in the various constitutional and disciplinary standards of the several groups. In the Mennonite Church (MC) all district conference disciplines forbid lodge membership. The Rules and Discipline of the Lancaster Conference (MC) of Oct. 7, 1881, for instance, indicate in section 20 that membership in secret societies is "strictly forbidden." Article XIII of the "Christian Fundamentals" adopted by Mennonite General Conference (MC), Aug. 24-26, 1921, declares that secret orders are "antagonistic to the tenor and spirit of the Gospel." In its "Declaration of Commitment in Respect to Christian Separation and Nonconformity to the World," adopted by the General Conference (MC) on Aug. 26, 1955, it is stated: "We also reaffirm our age-long opposition to secret and oath-bound fraternities and lodges, holding that the principle of organized secrecy is wrong in itself, that the swearing of oaths is prohibited the Christian by the plain word of our Lord, that the hierarchical titles of the lodge are unbecoming to humble followers of Christ, that Christians ought not to be unequally yoked with non-Christians, and that in many cases lodges erroneously offer salvation to their members on other grounds than the shed blood of Jesus Christ. Lodge membership is therefore a test of membership in the Mennonite Church."

The current constitution of the General Conference Mennonite Church (1953) declares that the General Conference "believes that membership in oath-bound secret societies . . . is contrary to such apostolic admonitions as: 'Be not unequally yoked with unbelievers (II Cor. 6:14-15).'" The earlier constitution (1896) contained a long article against secret societies, declaring that "no congregation which tolerates among its members those belonging to secret societies shall be admitted into Conference." The G.C.M. General Conference long had a "Lodge Committee," whose assignment was to produce literature and promote teaching against "the lodge." Among the resolutions reported by this committee and adopted by the Conference was the following (1899): "Resolved that the General Conference takes a positive stand against every kind of secret society, and that the conference considers it as necessary in order to maintain this position, that the member churches declare at the Conference, if and with what success they have laboured at cleansing their churches from members of secret societies and the Conference herewith announces that if it is found that some churches still tolerate secret society members to remain unmolested in the church, that such churches shall no longer be considered as members in the Conference." However, in spite of the vigorous position historically taken by the G.C.M.

Church, the autonomy of the local congregation and social pressures have resulted in some lodge membership in certain areas, especially east of the Kansas-Nebraska line.

The Mennonite Brethren Church also has maintained a strong position on secret societies. Its Confession of Faith contains the following declaration: "Concerning the joining of lodges or secret societies we believe and confess that there is no scriptural basis which would permit Christians to join with lodges and secret societies in view of the many unchristian practices of these organizations such as horrible oaths which members must take and because the name of our blessed Lord and Saviour is omitted or rather excluded from them." In former years all baptismal candidates were required to promise that they would not join a secret society. In many churches this practice is still continued.

The constitution of the Evangelical Mennonite Church (Kleine Gemeinde) states (1956) that church members "should not belong to a worldly or secret lodge." Other smaller Mennonite bodies have similar positions. There is no evidence of a position against secret societies by European Mennonites. However, except for the Masonic Lodge, there are few such societies in Europe. Occasionally more liberal Mennonites in Holland and North Germany have joined the Masons. J.C.W.

Sedlmaier, Hans, a peasant of Oberhaim in the Landshut (q.v.) area of Bavaria, Germany, was won for the Anabaptist movement by Augustin Würtzlburger (q.v.) and was baptized with his wife and two sons, Paul and Wilbold, and his daughter Katerina. Soon afterward, in 1528, he was arrested and taken to Landshut, where he was tried on the rack. Sedlmaier confessed that Würtzlburger had been with him twice in Oberhaim, and had baptized him; he did not consider this a second baptism, since his baptism as an infant was not a true baptism. He had partaken of the sacrament at Easter, but only as the bread of thanksgiving. But he refused to confess that Würtzlburger had been rebaptized "even if they would tear him to pieces." He ended his confession by saying that he would die for his faith. He was presumably beheaded, for not long afterward the Landshut council reported to Augsburg that an Anabaptist had been thus executed.

Seemann, Enoch, Jr. (1694-1744), the son of Enoch Seemann, Sr., (q.v.), was also a painter, specializing in still life. Some of his father's pictures have been erroneously ascribed to him; the subjects of the portraits were no longer living at Enoch's time. He became a well-known portraitist in London, where he painted several members of the royal family. A self-portrait hangs in the Dresden Art Gallery; it is reproduced in Mennonite Life for July 1949. He died in London in 1744. F.H.

Seemann, Enoch, Sr. (1661-?), the son of Isaac Seemann (q.v.), surpassed his father in artistic ability; he learned painting in the studio of his brother Isaac, then made extensive journeys, returned to Elbing in 1680, and was received into the Mennonite congregation there at the age of nineteen. In 1683 he moved to Danzig and on December 5 of that year married Susanna Ordonn. On the basis of his work he was made a "free master," and was permitted (outside the guild) to paint only portraits and could not keep apprentices. He served as "City Painter" (Stadtmaier) 1683-98. At first all went well. But soon the elder of the congregation, Georg Hansen (q.v.), forbade him to paint portraits, suggesting that he paint landscapes instead. Seemann replied that the signs on the shops were then also wrong and should be removed. When after a time these signs were not removed, and the guild of landscape painters made trouble for him, he again began to paint portraits, thereby drawing the renewed censure of the elder, who placed him under the ban in 1697. Seemann published Offenbahrung und Bestrafung des Gergen Hansens Thorheit (Stolzenberg, 1697), in which the story is given. About 1698 he went to Warsaw and served at the royal court until 1704, then went to London, where he died (date unknown). Seven children were born to him; four were named in publications, but only two are recorded in the church books of the Danzig congregations. (ME I, 167, 171; ML IV.) F.H.

Seemann, Isaac, the descendant of a Flemish Mennonite family, a good portrait painter, several of whose works were reproduced in copper etchings. He was a preacher (Vermahner) of the Elbing-Ellerwald Mennonite congregation in West Prussia, moved to Danzig in 1683, went to London about 1700, and died there in 1730 at the age of ninety. His son Enoch Seemann, Sr. (q.v.), was also an able painter. (ML IV.) F.H.

Sega (Saga, Saag, von der Sach), Francesco della, a Hutterite martyr, was born in 1528 or 1532 at Rovigo in the Venetian Republic. He went to Padua to study civil law in the 1540's and lived there the life of a typical young student. Stricken with illness brought on by excesses and chided by a pious craftsman, he turned to the Scriptures, determined to model his life after Christ's. His conversion was complete: he even abandoned law for the tailor's craft, subjecting himself to the ridicule of family and friends. He evidently went directly over to the evangelical movement then current in northern Italy and was probably baptized by some leader of the movement, which around that time was coming under the influence of anti-Trinitarianism. Unfortunately we do not know when or by whom he was baptized, but since he was later accepted into the Hutterite communion without having to undergo adult baptism, he must have been baptized in Italy.

Della Sega's activities during the early 1550's are obscure. Around 1557 he visited Vienna and then traveled with a Hungarian friend in Hungary and Slovakia. He learned of the Hutterites from a Moravian servant, and, enlisting the latter as a guide, visited several Hutterite communities. Much impressed by them he requested and was granted admission to membership, perhaps first in Slovakia, but later in Moravia. There he married a woman from the Grisons and settled down to his humble craft.

In 1559, receiving the news of his father's death, he traveled to Italy to see about the inheritance, and other trips followed, on which he carried word of the Hutterites to friends. Because of this activity it has been assumed that he was a minister (Beck, 212), but he later told the Inquisition, "I have not baptized anyone because I am neither priest nor minister. I am a simple tailor." Perhaps he was accorded special position as an emissary, without full ordination.

In 1562 on one of these expeditions to Italy in the company of Nicola Buccella of Padua and Antonio Rizzetto of Vicenza (q.v.) he was preparing to lead some twenty new recruits from the Cittadella community to Moravia when an unfortunate incident occurred. A man who claimed to have been defrauded by Buccella's brother complained to the authorities at Capodistria. Captain Lando, in charge there, arrested della Sega, Rizzetto, and Buccella (Aug. 27, 1562), but allowed the other members of the party to go on their way. Upon examining their documents the officer realized that he had stumbled upon a case of heresy, and at once communicated with the Inquisition at Venice, sending the prisoners there for further examination. They were imprisoned at San Giovanni in Bragora, where Giulio Gherlandi (q.v.), who had fallen into the hands of the authorities the preceding year, was being held. The fellow believers quickly made contact and were able to speak to each other in the weeks that ensued.

Della Sega was questioned Sept. 26, 1562, about his personal history and beliefs. Pressed concerning the latter, he agreed to prepare a statement. His confession, dated Oct. 20, 1562, is the source of much of the above information. The principal points of his faith were these: salvation is by faith, not works; baptism should be reserved for believers; confession should be to God, not to priests; one should seek to obey God's commandments. There is no sign of the anti-Trinitarianism to which he was almost certainly exposed earlier in Italy. There followed a series of examinations conducted by the famed Spanish Jesuit theologian Salmeron, among others. Throughout these interviews della Sega continued to stress his devotion to the Scriptures.

Early in 1563 della Sega directed a letter to Leonhard Sailer (q.v.) (Lanzenstiel) and Peter Scherer (Walpot, q.v.) as well as to the whole community in Moravia (letter in the Hutterite Codices of 1563). This epistle, about whose means of delivery we are left to speculate, is of exceptional interest, breathing as it does a pure faith and love: "I would not let the occasion pass while I am yet in this tabernacle of desiring for you the grace of the salvation of the omnipotent God. I have loved you all sincerely; but I love you even more now that I have been deprived of your presence, which deprivation is a great tribulation to me. And when the end comes, I will love you with the love that I have through Christ Himself, because you are members of His body, yea, bone of His bone, flesh of His flesh. And you have loved me sincerely; through you I have received of God innumerable benefits for which I have not repaid you, and thus I remain your debtor. But I desire to bear this my humiliation with patience, for love of you; yea, I would, through love of you, bear being rejected and cast out and finally led to the execution." He continues with exhortations directed to the pastors and to the community as a whole, as well as to his fellow Italians who had joined the group. "I say to you, my dear ones, especially love and fear the Lord and see to it that you never forsake the brotherhood and church but keep always before your eyes Christ's parable of the vine. . . . Think what grace you have received from God through being led from the deepest shadows to His marvelous light, and love one another with a pure heart, with all sincerity and fullness of heart, without pretense." The letter ends with greetings to his friends, to his wife, and to his mother-in-law Florentina.

A decree of the Venetian Council of Ten, issued April 7, 1564, providing for the expulsion of heretics (Cantu, III, 139), raised in della Sega the hope that it might apply to him. He wrote the court July 18, 1564, asking release from his imprisonment. His arguments were ignored. In November the Inquisitor Fra Adriano prepared a report on his case in which he listed the chief heresies of della Sega and Rizzetto: their rejection of the Roman Church, of infant baptism, and of confession to priests; and their union with the Hutterites. An interrogation of Dec. 12, 1564, showed della Sega still firm in his faith despite the abjuration one week earlier of his companion Buccella.

It must have been around this time that della Sega addressed a letter to his mother and brothers in Italy. This undelivered letter, characterized by Benrath as "one of the most moving documents to come out of the whole Anabaptist movement," reproaches his brethren for ignoring his efforts to bring them to see the light. "May God pardon you and summon you to repentance. I pray you for the last time to consider why you have come into the world, and calling yourselves Christians, to do what Christ teaches. . . . I exhort you still to desire His grace and to observe His commandments. I pray it of you with all my heart, now that I am about to die. In place of my last testament, since I have no money to leave, that which I have and know for divine grace I manifest to you, and anew with great sorrow of heart and with tears in my eyes, I plead with you to seek God while He is to be found. . . . And do not put off your conversion, because we do not know what tomorrow will bring. Think that if God is merciful, His wrath is great toward the rebellious. . . . Now, if this letter should not please you, I know nought else to say. God will not save you by force. It remains to me, in this case, to ask you only to pass this letter to some other who may have the desire to do good and live a Christian life."

Sentence was passed on della Sega and Rizzetto Feb. 8, 1565. Della Sega wavered momentarily when the executioner came for him. He appeared undecided in the presence of Salmeron, Feb. 20. The Court reproved him for his indecision on Feb. 22, but in the end he remained true to his faith. On the night of Monday, Feb. 26, 1565, in the accustomed manner, he was cast into the depths of the sea. "But the sea will give up its dead at the Judgment Day of God."

Seid, Katharina, an "obstinate Anabaptist," the wife of Andreas Klaiber (q.v.), was arrested in Strasbourg, Alsace, and tried on Nov. 23, 1534. Her confession of faith gives some insight into early Anabaptism. She said she had been baptized in her home two years previously by a man who had come from over the Rhine; his name she did not know. Years previously Matthias Zell (q.v.) had preached that others, more genuine than they, would come. Therefore she prayed that God would give her true understanding. Then the brethren called Anabaptists had come, who had rightly explained the Scriptures and had first showed her the truth; by the grace of God she hoped to remain steadfast in it. She knew of no preacher of the established church who could give better instruction and doctrine. Baptism by water was not essential to her, but the knowledge of Christ; this she had, and by God's grace she would maintain it. When she was urged to desist from such error and be taught by the Reformed preachers, she replied that she was too simple for them, since she was not educated. But she was sure of her faith. She would let each depend on his own faith, since each was responsible for himself.

There had indeed been learned men among the Anabaptists, but the people had not been able to learn from them. "They departed from us, but we do not depart." She trusted God, who had led her from bondage to salvation, to help her understand His truth.

Then the sentence of expulsion was read to her. She responded that she had spoken nothing but what Christ her Lord had commanded her, and she asked for the sake of the Lord to be allowed to stay; she visited only the sick who had need of her, and if she could serve anyone she would gladly do it. When asked who belonged to her sect she said she knew no Anabaptists and could say nothing about it; she would not betray them. She went nowhere and knew only Melchior Hofmann (q.v.), who was in prison here, "of whom my lords say that he is an Anabaptist"; she had been fined a pound four years previously for lodging him and his wife and child; his wife did not want to stay in Strasbourg. Katharina was probably expelled. NEFF.

Seigne (Sennergemeinde) Mennonite Church, Alsace, France, now extinct, had its place of worship on a farm called by that name on the left bank of the Doubs River opposite the village of Vaufrey, near the French border east of Montbéliard, in the county of Montjoie. The Mennonite community here must have been started very early by Swiss refugees from the canton of Bern, probably in the latter 17th century. The area was isolated and rugged and furnished a quiet retreat. The first definite data about the group date from 1750, when it had close relations to the congregations at Montbéliard and in the Swiss canton of Neuchâtel (Chaux de Fond). At times it is difficult to distinguish Montbéliard and Seigne, especially before the meetinghouse was built at the former place (1833). Thereafter Seigne was completely independent, with its meetings in the homes of the members. In 1888 there were 76 baptized members. Due to emigration to America and removal to the Montbéliard (q.v.) and Courgenay (q.v.) congregations, Seigne declined. About 1918 the congregation dissolved, and the few remaining members joined or moved to Montbéliard. The Courgenay congregation was built up largely from Seigne. In 1903 Elder Pierre Ramseyer, who had been ordained in 1896 at Seigne, moved to Courgenay. Elders at Seigne from 1830 on were Peter Rich (d. 1849), Hans Rich (d. 1877), Jean Staehli (ord. 1859, d. 1865), Jean Ramseyer (ord. 1866, moved to Alsace 1897, d. 1920), Pierre Ramseyer (ord. 1896, moved to Switzerland 1903). Seiler, Friedrich (1642-1708), a Reformed pastor in Basel, author of Wiedertäufer-Geheimnisse (Basel, 1680). The book is listed in the Calvary catalog, Verzeichnis seltsamer und wertvoller Bücher (Berlin, 1870, 59), with the title Anabaptista larvatus, das ist Verstellter Wieder-Täufer. Entdeckt beydes In einem historischen Entwurff aller uns bekandter Wieder-Täufferen Vrsprungs. Wie auch Einer dogmatischen Widerlegung aller derselben Irrthumen, seltzamer Meynungen, vnd hin und wieder erweckter Unruhen (Basel, 1680) (copy in GCL). The first part, 182 pp. plus 22 pp. of preface and introduction and 25 pp. of contents, indices, etc., contains an "Anabaptist History" in 12 chapters, of which the last five chapters treat of the Swiss Anabaptists, including those of Zürich, Bern, Basel, and Schaffhausen-St. Gall, based largely upon secondary sources, especially Bullinger and Ottius. A complete three-page list of sources used is given. The second part, the "Dogmatic Part," devoted to a description and refutation of the Anabaptist "errors," occupies 510 pp., plus 30 pp. of contents and indices. The topics covered are: God and the Trinity, Creation of Man, Preservation and Government of all Things, Adam's Fall, Original Sin, Free Will, Redemption, Election, Scripture, Saving Faith, Justification, Incarnation, The Church, Ministers, The Ban or Church Discipline, Baptism, Communion, State, Oath, and Future Life. Much more time is spent on the exposition and defense of the author's position as a Reformed theologian than on a statement of the Anabaptist position. And although the author freely used the Franckenthal and Emden debate protocols, he drew the Quakers, Schwenckfelders, Weigelians, and other radicals into the orbit of his discussion alongside the Anabaptists and Mennonites. Selden (Kan.) Amish Mennonite Church, now extinct, was a member of the Western A.M. Conference (MC). Selden is in northwest Kansas in Sheridan County, but the settlement is sometimes known as the Decatur County congregation because many of its members lived in that county, which adjoins Sheridan. The first settlers came from Illinois before 1887, when the congregation was organized. The meetinghouse was built in 1888-89. A. B. Kolb after a western trip wrote in November 1891 concerning Selden, "There are some 12 or 15 families here. I think they are nearly all Amish." The highest membership, about 100, was reached in 1897. By 1905 it had dropped to 20. Ammon E. Stoltzfus served as minister 1897-1910. The drought was the chief factor in its becoming extinct. It was last listed in the 1918 Year-Book, with 22 members and C. C. Steckley as minister. The cemetery at the site of the former church still exists. G.G.Y., M.G.

Seli, an Anabaptist martyr, who is reported by van Braght to have been burned at the stake at Amsterdam in 1542. Van Braght calls her the wife of Jacob van Wormer (q.v.). It seems, however, that van Braght is in error; no martyr by this name is found in the official records. Seli is probably identical with Cecilia Jheronimusd (q.v.), wife of Jacob Claesz van Landsmeer, who was burned at the stake at Amsterdam on Nov. 9, 1549, together with her husband. vdZ.

Seligental, a former name of the Adelsheim (q.v.) Mennonite congregation.

Selowitz, a village in Moravia in which the Hutterian Brethren built a Bruderhof, which they abandoned in 1583 to move to near-by Nusslau (q.v.), where the landowners promised them greater liberty in cultivating wine and hops. In Selowitz they occupied what is now house No. 37. (Zieglschmid, Chronik.)

Sembach, a village in the Palatinate (q.v.), Germany, not far from Kaiserslautern, since the end of the 17th century the seat of a Mennonite congregation, with a membership in 1957 of some 250 baptized members; most of the families live in the villages and on the farms around Sembach: Wartenberg-Rohrbach, Mehlingen-Neukirchen, Enkenbach, Neuheimsbach, Langmeil, Potzbach, Schmitterhof, Otterberg, Münchhof, Randeckerhof, and Pfimmerhof (q.v.). The original families of the congregation—Krehbiel, Eymann, Eichelberger, Würtz, Schnebele, Beutler, Latschar, Kinzinger, Höfli—immigrated from the Emmental (q.v.), Switzerland, in 1660-1710.

Religious services were held in private homes in Sembach, Wartenberg, Fischbach, and Diemerstein until 1777, when the church was built. The first preacher was Ulrich Trüssel, of Sumiswald, who was imprisoned in Bern in 1710 and came to the Palatinate in 1711. He was succeeded in 1760 by Johannes Krehbiel, of Wartenberg, who saw the erection of the church, dedicated in 1778 by Jakob Galle, Erbesbüdesheim; substantial financial assistance was given by the Mennonites of Crefeld and the Netherlands. Among the more prominent elders and lay preachers were Heinrich Würtz, Johannes Eymann, and Peter Eymann (q.v.).

In 1832 Johannes Risser (q.v.), of Friedelsheim, became the pastor, and under his ministry the congregation experienced inward and outward strengthening. In 1842 a parsonage was built, in 1853 the church was substantially enlarged, and in 1859 a constitution was adopted. The church records begun by Risser in 1832 and kept until his death in 1864 contain much that is of interest and value for the history of the South German Mennonites, besides the record of baptisms, births, marriages, and deaths in the congregation. The congregation continued to develop along the lines established by Risser under the succeeding preachers, Johannes van der Smissen (q.v.) 1869-79 and Samuel Blickensdörfer 1879-99. Services were held every Sunday, and communion twice a year. Baptism was administered on the first Sunday in September. In 1892 the congregation was incorporated. Among the chairmen (Vorsteher) of the congregation Jakob Krehbiel was outstanding and left a series of valuable diaries.

In 1900-29 Matthias Pohl (q.v.) was the preacher in Sembach; he was noted far beyond his congregation as a speaker and writer. He vigorously countered many a symptom of decline in the congregation. In 1904 the congregation joined the Vereinigung der Mennonitengemeinden im Deutschen Reich. The congregation declined in membership through marriage with persons of other creeds. Consciousness of membership in a brotherhood seems to be disappearing in many Mennonite families. In 1887 the baptized membership numbered about 400, in 1940 only about 110.

Hugo Scheffler, a native of West Prussia, served as minister of the Sembach congregation 1929-35. In 1935 Gerhard Hein, of Russia, took charge of this congregation with that at Altleiningen (q.v.) as a subsidiary, serving until October 1958. World War II left Sembach relatively undamaged. In 1948 an influx of about 100 Mennonite refugees from West Prussia strengthened it. In 1948, with the aid of the American Mennonites they rebuilt a dilapidated barn connected with the parsonage into a hall for the youth of the congregation, which was dedicated on Dec. 19, 1948. Seminaries, Mennonite Theological. The first Mennonite theological seminary was the Amsterdam Mennonite Theological Seminary (q.v.) organized in 1735. Before this time the Dutch Mennonite ministers who secured theological training did so either at the Remonstrant Theological Seminary, or by private instruction from Mennonite ministers in service. The idea of establishing a seminary had been proposed as early as 1675, but met sufficient opposition to block it until 1735, when the Amsterdam Lamist and Toren congregation established it on its own authority and with its own support. When the congregation could no longer carry the seminary alone, the General Mennonite Conference (ADS) was organized in 1811, its main purpose being to take over the seminary. The seminary has never had a full faculty, limiting its instruction to dogmatics, ethics, practical theology, and Mennonite history. The remaining subjects were taken by the students at the University of Amsterdam (theological faculty established in 1876) or its predecessor the Athanaeum. The full Mennonite professors (formerly two, at the moment only one) are also professors on the university theological faculty. This seminary is on the graduate level, comparable to other European theological schools.

The Mennonites of Germany and of Russia considered establishing theological schools in the second half of the 19th century, but did not finally reach this goal. Such German or Russian ministers as secured training have attended either the Protestant theological schools at the state universities, or Bible schools of lower academic rank, such as St. Chrischona (Basel), Switzerland, or the Baptist Theological Seminary at Hamburg, Germany.

The first attempt at a school for ministerial training in North America was in the General Conference Mennonite Church, which operated a training school for ministers at Wadsworth, Ohio, 1868-78, called "Christliche Bildungsanstalt der Mennoniten-Gemeinschaft." It was not on the graduate level, and even though it had a department of theology, it was essentially a secondary school with a Bible department and a majority of course offerings in secular fields. The first graduate theological seminary was established at Bluffton College in 1914, when the institution's name was set as Bluffton College and Theological Seminary, operated by a board of trustees representing five Mennonite branches, although not all five were officially represented by their own appointed trustees. Actually the major part of the student body and faculty were from the General Conference Mennonite Church. The Mennonite Seminary was an integral part of Bluffton College until 1921, when it became a separate and independent institution under a separate corporation with trustees representing six Mennonite branches, again not serving as official representatives in most cases, and actually as predominantly a school serving the General Conference Mennonite Church. The organized school was now given the name Witmarsum Theological Seminary (q.v.), and under this name it operated until 1931 as a standard graduate seminary offering the B.D. degree. It also had a department called the Theological College offering a combined four-year college and theology curriculum based upon high school and leading to the Th.B. degree.

The Goshen College Biblical Seminary (q.v.) at Goshen, Ind., a school of the Mennonite (MC) Church (until 1946 called Bible School), began in 1933 to offer a two-year theological course based on two years of college and leading to the Th.B. degree. In 1942 the theological course was enlarged to three years with the same degree; this course was discontinued in 1956. In 1946 the standard three-year graduate seminary course based upon college graduation and leading to the B.D. degree was added. The GCBS is an autonomous division of Goshen College, with its own dean and academic faculty and student body, but integrated into Goshen College with a common president and financial administration. A separate set of buildings was erected for it in 1959 at the south edge of the Goshen College campus.

The next theological seminary was the Mennonite Biblical Seminary (q.v.), which was opened in Chicago in 1945 as a new institution chartered by the General Conference of the General Conference Mennonite Church, but to be considered in a sense as a reorganized Witmarsum Theological Seminary, which transferred its assets in endowment, property, and library to the new school. However, during its stay in Chicago 1945-58, the MBS was not a full seminary; even though it had its own headquarters, library, and residence halls at 4614 Woodlawn Ave., it was affiliated with the Bethany Biblical Seminary of the Church of the Brethren in such a way that the students were enrolled in Bethany Biblical Seminary and secured their degrees from it. The several members of the MBS faculty taught their courses as members of the Bethany faculty. This arrangement paralleled that of the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary. The MBS also operated a college level department called the Mennonite Bible School, with a very small enrollment. In 1958 the MBS moved to a new campus at Elkhart, Ind., where it began operations as a full seminary with a complete faculty and curriculum, offering its own degrees. This move was made in connection with affiliation with the Goshen College Biblical Seminary under a plan of co-operation called the Associated Mennonite Biblical Seminaries, which is described below.

The Associated Mennonite Biblical Seminaries is the name given to a group of seminaries which have agreed to an affiliation calling for a close co-operation in the academic program while maintaining full independence of government and financing. The plan calls for a Joint Co-ordinating Committee representing the boards of control and a Joint Administrative Committee representing the schools. There is also a Joint Library composed of all collections of the associated schools. A certain number of joint courses will be offered, permitting students to take up to one third of the B.D. curriculum in such courses, in addition to the privilege of cross-registration in all associated schools. However, each school grants its own degrees. Two seminaries have entered the plan to begin with, the Mennonite Biblical Seminary at Elkhart and the Goshen College Biblical Seminary at Goshen. It is hoped that other conferences will join the plan in the course of time so that the Associated Seminaries will become a center for Mennonite ministerial training in North America. The headquarters of the associated institutions is the Elkhart campus of the MBS. The Institute for Mennonite Studies, operated jointly by the Associated Seminaries, and located on the Elkhart campus, is also a part of the program. The total program went into effect in September 1958.

The first graduate theological seminary in the Mennonite Brethren Church was opened at Fresno, Cal., in 1955 as the Mennonite Brethren Biblical Seminary, offering the standard three-year graduate theological program leading to the B.D. degree. The Bible School at Tabor College was at that time discontinued, which had been offering the Th.B. and B.R.E. degrees for a two-year program of Biblical study based upon two years of college. The Mennonite Brethren Bible College (q.v.) at Winnipeg, Man., established in 1944, offers a similar four-year Th.B. and B.R.E. program. The Canadian Mennonite Bible College of the General Conference Mennonite Church, also at Winnipeg, founded in 1947, also offers a similar four-year B.C.E. curriculum.

Eastern Mennonite College (MC) at Harrisonburg, Va., has offered a Th.B. degree through its Bible School since 1938, first as a two-year theology course based on two years of college, increased in 1946 to a three-year course and in 1948 to a combined six-year course, of which two years are in graduate theology.

Grace Bible Institute at Omaha, Neb., founded in 1943 as an inter-Mennonite school, though largely G.C.M. and E.M.B., has from the beginning offered the equivalent of seminary training on a college level, a four-year course with two years of theology, but gives only B.A. and B.R.E. degrees.

In 1950 the Indonesian Mennonite Church established a theological school at Pati, which was of secondary school grade, with teachers from Holland. In 1955 Pati was merged with the theological school of the Reformed Church of East Java in Malang under a combined Reformed and Mennonite board and with teachers from both groups.

In 1955 the Mennonite Biblical Seminary at Montevideo, Uruguay, was established under an inter-Mennonite South American board of trustees, but sponsored and supported by the mission boards of the MC and GCM groups in North America. It is not a graduate theological seminary, but offers a three-year course based upon high school. It is designed to offer theological training in the Spanish and German languages for Mennonites from all over South America, especially Paraguay, Argentina, Uruguay, and Brazil who plan to enter mission work or serve as pastors in Mennonite congregations in these countries.

Sendbrieff von einem Liebhaber Gottes Worts, the last written genuinely Anabaptist document in existence, a true martyr epistle in the great style of the beginnings, written in 1715 by an unknown Swiss brother in the darkness of prison in Bern, Switzerland. It is contained in a booklet of 40 pages, entitled Ein Send-Brieff samt einem schönen Gebütt und geistlichen Lied. Worbey noch etliche andere Christliche Gebütt, in vielen Anligen und Nöthen zu gebrauchen. Wie auch etliche geistliche Lieder. Gedruckt im Jahr, Da wahre Busz vonnöthen war, probably printed by the Mechel (q.v.) publishing house in Basel c1720 (title page reproduced in Friedmann, Piety, plate III). In Europe this booklet is extremely rare and not mentioned in literature. H. S. Bender found several copies in Mennonite homes of Swiss background in Pennsylvania and Ohio, now in GCL. It appears in a Sammelband (several writings bound together as one) of 100 pages, the rest consisting of prayers and hymns of typical pietistic character.

The "Sendbrieff" is addressed to "the fellow members of the household of faith" and contains a strong and moving call to steadfastness and loyalty in the face of trial and danger of life; it closes with an admonition to the true "fear of God." This term is most characteristic, as it used to be the watchword of 16th-century Anabaptism, together with the word "obedience," replaced in the later pietistic trend by the term "godliness." The book also contains six songs, one by the author, two by Leenaerdt Klock (Clock, q.v.), one taken from the Ausbund (q.v.), and two of unknown origin.

Thus the unknown editor of this book combined under one cover two very different moods, belonging to two different historic times: discipleship on the one hand (strongly defended by the imprisoned brother) and a sweet godliness on the other hand by which the spirit of the entire publication becomes changed. As such the book seems to have been a real success, one of the few genuine Swiss Anabaptist devotional books ever printed. (Compare Ernst-hafte Christenpflicht.)

Seneca County (Ohio) Mennonite (MC) Church (now extinct), founded by Troxel families from Frederick County, Md., and Stark County, Ohio, by Hunsicker families from Montgomery County, Pa., and by other land-hungry immigrants from eastern states and even from Germany c1825-40, who erected a hewn log meetinghouse at an early date on the farm of George Muckley 2½ miles east of Bloomville. Shortly before his death in 1842, Muckley deeded the acre on which the church and cemetery stood to "Henry Troxel, Jacob Rothgabe and Isaac Boren (Rohrer) and the Manomenist Congregation of Bloom Township." Early members of the congregation bore the names Troxel, Legron, Brandt, Detweiler, Newcomer, Bachman, Rothgabe, Allderffer, Muckley, Bowman (pronounced Bau-man), Kroft (Kraft?), Zutavern, Behm, and Lehman. Bishops (nonresident) were Henry Stemen (q.v.) followed by John M. Brenneman, the latter serving until the Wisler (q.v.) controversy arose in 1871; ministers, David Martin and Isaac Rohrer. Even before Martin died and Rohrer followed his brother Abraham Rohrer, of Medina County, into the Wisler branch, the congregation declined. Denied Sunday-school privileges the young people united with the German Reformed or the Methodist Church. The last services were held in 1879 about the time that Isaac Rohrer and his wife moved to the Wisler congregation in Mahoning County, Ohio. The church building was sold and razed in 1888. Many of the later burials in the cemetery were exhumed and reinterred in the Woodlawn cemetery west of Bloomville. A few of the remaining members returned to the older Wisler congregations in western Wayne, Medina, and Mahoning counties. Unlike other extinct Mennonite congregations in Ohio, Seneca County supplied few if any accessions to Mennonite congregations in Indiana. J.S.U.

Sensenig (Sensenich, Senseny, Senseney), a Swiss name found especially among the Mennonites of Lancaster County, Pa. The ancestor of many members of the family was immigrant Jacob Sensenig, who married Maria Krey. Jacob's children married into the Wenger, Witwer, and Martin families. The Sensenig family is distinguished by an unusual number of physicians. One line had a doctor in every generation for five generations. In the Midwest the best-known member of the family was Aaron Stauffer Sensenich (1849-1919), a physician of Wakarusa, Ind., whose son Roscoe L. Sensenich served as president of the American Medical Association. Arthur S. Sensenich's widowed mother took for her second husband Christian Good, a Brethren in Christ minister. The only members of the family to serve as Mennonite ministers in North America were in the Stauffer (q.v.) and Wisler (q.v.) branches of the church. Daniel S. Sensenig is a missionary (MC) in Ethiopia. J.C.W.

Sent, Jan, a Dutch Mennonite, author or composer of the hymnal usually called Jan Cents Liedboek. There have been at least two editions, 1628 and 1679. The official title reads Nieu (q.v.) Sangh Boec. It is doubtful that Jan Cents was a member of the Senten (Centen, q.v.) family of Amsterdam. voZ.

Sepp, a Dutch Mennonite family, whose ancestor (1) Christian Sepp was born about 1700 at Goslar, Germany, where his father was the assistant rector of the Latin school. Christian Sepp was a merchant, first at Flamburg, then at Amsterdam. Here he founded a bookshop and printing office, which for nearly one hundred years was leading in the Netherlands. It is not clear whether this Christian Sepp joined the Mennonite Church. He died in 1775 at Amsterdam. His son was (2) Jan Christiaan Sepp (1739-1811), whose first wife was Sara Focking (1745-73) and who was a renowned map engraver and bookseller in Amsterdam. He was well known for his fine collection of butterflies and insects, and edited a number of famous books on flowers (Flora Batava), insects, and birds. In collaboration with Cornelis Nozeman, a Remonstrant minister of Rotterdam, he published Nederlandsche Vogelen in five volumes; after the death of Nozeman and Sepp this work was continued by Martinus Houttuyn. Sepp himself made some of the beautiful pictures in this book. Besides these and other books (Beschouwingen der Wonderen Gods) he also managed the publication of some Mennonite hymnals. Sepp was a man of great influence in Amsterdam; he was one of the founders of the association "Felix Meritis," which promoted public lectures on scientific themes, many of these lectures having been held by Sepp himself. In 1781 he was chosen as preacher of the Danzig Old Flemish (Bij de Kruijkes) congregation of Amsterdam; in 1787, when this congregation merged with the Zonist (q.v.) church, he became a Zonist minister until he retired in 1801.

Among his sons were: (3) Christian Sepp (1773-1835), who was superintendent of the police at Amsterdam, a pious man, who translated and published some works by Jung-Stilling into Dutch; (4) Jan Sepp (1778-1853), like his father the manager of the bookshop and printing office at Amsterdam, and (5) Hendrik Albert Sepp (1807-31), who was a lay minister at Knollendam 1830-31. (6) Cornelis Sepp (1810-68), the son of Jan Sepp (4), continued the printing and publishing business of his father and his grandfather. Another son of Jan Sepp (4) was (7) Christiaan (q.v.) (1820-90), a Mennonite minister and church historian. (8) Jan Sepp, a son of Cornelis (6) (b. 1847 at Amsterdam, d. 1905 at Beverwijk), studied at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary and served as minister at Witmarsum-Pingjum 1871-73 and Beverwijk 1873-1905. He published Gedachten des Bijbels (1876), Gedachtenis aan Doopbediening en eersten Avondmaalsgang (Beverwijk, 1889), and some sermons; his paper, "De nieuwe gezangbundels der Amsterdamsche gemeente," is found in Doopsgezinde Bijdragen of 1872. He and H. Boetje (q.v.) composed a new hymnal for the Dutch Mennonite congregations, usually called Leidsche Bundel (q.v.).

(9) Alidus Anne Sepp (b. 1881 at Beverwijk), a son of Jan Sepp (8), was at first an office clerk; after studying theology at the University and the Mennonite Seminary of Amsterdam he served as minister in the following Mennonite congregations: Witmarsum-Pingjum 1914-18, Edam 1918-26, Veenwouden 1926-30, Westzaan 1930-34, and Zaandam-Oost 1934-

44. He published Achter de Maaiers (Hillegom, n.d.), a few Biblical plays, and a set of catechetical booklets. In 1932-42 he was secretary of the A.D.S. Because of Nazi sympathies during World War II he took residence in Germany and never returned to Holland. vdZ.

Sepp, Christiaan, b. April 3, 1820, at Amsterdam, d. May 10, 1890, at Wijk aan Zee, a son of Jan Sepp and Christina Bakker, was a Dutch Mennonite minister and an outstanding church historian of the Netherlands. He was married in 1848 to C. E. A. Spin of Amsterdam. Sepp studied theology at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary in 1837-43, and served as minister at Westzaan-Zuid 1843-48, Zaan-dam-Oost 1848-54, and Leiden 1872-79, then retiring and moving to Amsterdam. Sepp was a beloved preacher and a loyal pastor; he was one of the leading Dutch ministers of the 19th century. During his service at Leiden he also took charge of the Mennonites living at The Hague and promoted the founding of the Hague congregation in 1881. He was a trustee of the A.D.S. and a curator of its seminary. He opposed radical liberalism, and was a friend of Pietism, always maintaining Biblical supernaturalism against the theological trend of monism and antisupernaturalism. "His Christianity was mild and Biblical," says Binnerts.

Sepp was also a man of learning. As early as 1837, at the age of 17, he started his many translations of German theological works into Dutch. His study in Latin on the doctrines of St. Paul was awarded a gold medal by the University of Utrecht in 1843. Other books published by Sepp were: Herinneringen uit het leven van een hulpprediker (Amsterdam, 1846), Johan Albrecht Bengel, een waardig discipel van dem Heer (Amsterdam, 1848), De leer des Nieuwen Testaments over de Heilige schrift en de Ouden Verbonds (Amsterdam, 1849), Proeve eener Pragmatische geschiedenis der theologie in Nederland 1787-1858 (Haarlem, 1860, repr. Amsterdam, 1860; Leiden, 1868), Johannes Stinstra en zijn tijd (Amsterdam, 2 vv., 1865, 1866), Geschiedkundige Nasporingen, 3 vv. (Leiden, resp. 1872, 1873, 1875), Het Godgeleerd Onderwijs in Nederland in de 16de en 17de eeuw, 2 vv. (Leiden, 1873-74), Drie Evangeliedienaren uit den tijd der Hervorming (Leiden, 1879), Polemische en irenische theologie (Leiden, 1881, repr. Leiden, 1882), Bibliographische Mededeelingen (1883), Kerkhistorische Studiën (Leiden, 1885), Bibliotheek van Nederlandsche Kerkgeschiedschrijvers (1886), Verboden Lectuur (1889), Uit het predikantenleven van vroeger tijden (Leiden, 1890); after his death his Het staatstoezicht op de godsdienstige literatuur in de Noordelijke Nederlanden was published by L. Knappert and J. Sepp.

Besides these books Sepp published many articles, particularly in Godgeleerde Bijdragen, a periodical of which he was the editor; a devotional book De Zeven Kruiswoorden, voor vrienden van Jezus verklaard (Amsterdam, 1856); a few sermons, two funeral sermons, one in memory of Matthijs Siegenbeek (q.v.) (Leiden, 1855), and one to commemorate Daniel Tieboel Siegenbeek (q.v.) (n.p., n.d.-Leiden, 1866). For the Association of Dutch Literature, of which Sepp was a member, he wrote obituary biographical notices for K. Sybrandi (1873), Samuel Muller (1876), and others.

Apart from his book on Stinstra, Sepp did not publish much about Mennonite history; he was, however, well informed in it. A few papers on Mennonite history are found in his Geschiedkundige Nasporingen. His article "Menno Simons in de eerste jaren zijner Evangeliebediening 1536-39" is found in his book Uit het Predikantenleven.

Sepp was a member of a number of learned associations. In 1875 the University of Leiden awarded him an honorary degree in theology. The biographical notice for Sepp published in the records of the "Maatschappij voor Nederlandsche Letterkunde" was written by Samuel Cramer. vdZ.

Serarius, Petrus (Pierre Serrurier), a Mennonite of French descent, who according to tradition was born in Flanders in 1636, and to another more probable tradition, at London, England, in 1600, and who died at Amsterdam in 1665. He was a businessman and lived at first in London and then (before 1659) at Cologne, Germany, where he was a member and probably a deacon of the Mennonite congregation; later he lived at Amsterdam. Whether he joined a Mennonite congregation in Amsterdam or not is not certain. In his youth he had belonged to the Reformed Church. During his Amsterdam period he called himself "a preacher of God in His general church." Meisma called him "a Mennonite Collegiant." In Amsterdam he was an adherent of Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.), whom he defended against Jan Jansz Swichtenheuvel (q.v.). More and more he came to the opinion that of all churches on earth none could be considered the true church of God; but he considered the Mennonite Church, as founded by men of good will, to be nearest to the true church. The present churches, he says, have the devil as their founder. This idea Serarius may have borrowed from Christian Entfelder (q.v.), whose book Von den manigfaltigen im glauben zerspaltungen dise jar entstanden he translated into Dutch. On the ground of his astronomical observations he expected the coming of Christ in the near future, and gathered around him a group of chiliasts including some Mennonites.

Serarius published a large number of books both in Latin and in Dutch, some of them having been reprinted as late as the 18th century. The most important are: De Vertredinge des Heyligen Stadts (Amsterdam, 1659), Naerder Bericht wegens die groote conjunctie (Amsterdam, 1662), and Een Blijde Boodschap aen Jerusalem (Amsterdam, 1665). vdZ.

Sermons. Preaching has always been the center of Anabaptist-Mennonite public worship, hence the presence of the pulpit in the center of the Mennonite meetinghouse and the total absence of the altar. Very soon after the founding of the Anabaptist movement in 1525 the congregations chose individuals as leaders who were then ordained. The major office, called shepherd (Hirt) in the Schleithem Confession of 1527, was that of preacher; one or more were in every congregation. From among a plurality of preachers one was chosen to be elder (q.v.; or bishop, q.v.), who was responsible for general oversight, administration of the ordinances and discipline, and provision of ministers. However, elders were also, and still are, chiefly preachers. The Schleithem Confession defines the office of shepherd as follows: "This office shall be to read, to admonish and teach, to warn, to discipline, to ban in the church, lead out in prayer for the advancement of all the brethren and sisters, to lift up the bread when it is to be broken, and in all things to care for the body of Christ, in order that it may be built up and developed, and the mouth of the slanderer be stopped."

The character of the preaching was indicated by the early titles used for this office: "Minister of the Word" or "of the Book" (Diener zum Wort, q.v.) was intended to emphasize the function of the preacher to proclaim the message of the Bible. The Amish later preferred to use "Minister of the Book" (Diener zum Buch) for the same concept. The most common term, however, in Holland, North Germany, and Prussia was "teacher" (leeraar, Lehrer), or "admonisher" (vermaner, Vermahner). Both of these terms emphasize the function of the preacher to bring to the congregation the message of the Bible as something to be accepted and followed. The term "preacher" (preeker, prediker, predikant, Prediger) is neutral so far as indicating the character of his message, and was probably borrowed from Protestantism.

The early Anabaptist sermons were without doubt conceived as simple forthright declarations of a hortatory and devotional character, except when used for evangelistic purposes. They were certainly not expected to be rhetorical orations prepared and finished according to the practice of learned men. It was assumed that any member of the church could admonish the congregation out of his general knowledge of the Scriptures, his experience in life, and the help of the Holy Spirit. Sermons were not written and read but given ex tempore. The tradition from the early times took two directions however. On the one hand the tradition of completely ex tempore preaching persisted in some groups of the Swiss-South German type, with the strict understanding that no written text, not even outlines or notes, should be used at preaching time. On the other hand, the tradition of writing and reading sermons developed in the Prussian-Russian line, climaxing finally in the strict requirement that one should not even write his own sermons but only recopy and read the sermons of the past, with ultimately some minor modifications allowed; to preach ex tempore was condemned as pride. This was once the tradition among all the Mennonites in Manitoba and is still the case among all groups of Old Colony Mennonites. It is clear that few if any sermons of the ex tempore type would be preserved. Exceptions are noted for a few 19th-century preachers of this type who did write down sermons which have been preserved (or were they written to be memorized and not read perhaps?). In West Prussia and some descendant groups the concept of preacher hardened into the idea that the preacher's office was only to preach from the pulpit and not to do any pastoral work. A similar idea developed among the Mennonites of Eastern Pennsylvania and elsewhere, with the plural ministry, namely, that the preachers were to do nothing but preach, leaving the pastoral work to the bishop and deacons.

The publication of sermons, as distinct from tracts and treatises, though common among other Protestant groups from the early days of the Reformation, was almost unknown among the Anabaptists. One anonymous sermon by a South German Anabaptist was identified by Ludwig Keller in Eitelhans Langemantel's Exposition of the Lord's Prayer published at Augsburg in 1527. No published sermons by Swiss Brethren or their direct descendants to the present day are known, in Switzerland, France, or Austria, although a few sermons by South German Mennonites of the 19th century have appeared. The writing out of sermons (which precedes their printing) was not done by the lay-preachers of these areas, nor did the Anabaptists and their descendants of the first two hundred years have much interest in printed, theological sermons in any case. It was only later, largely after they had begun to read Lutheran and Reformed books of sermons, particularly under the influence of Pietism in the 18th century, and especially after they had begun to use trained ministers, that Mennonites had a real place for printed sermons. Here they followed pietistic influences. Popular sermon writers were Bogatzky, Hollaz, Hübner, and Funck.

The Dutch were the first among the Mennonites to publish sermons, and the most prolific. Beginning with Pieter Pietersz (1624) and Joost Hendricksz (1647), an almost endless stream of printed sermon collections appeared. The Amsterdam Catalogus lists to 1919 almost 400 titles in Dutch, of which almost 200 were printed before 1800. This includes single sermons as well as collections. The first printed sermons by a German preacher were also in Dutch, those of Willem Wynantz of Hamburg-Altona (1660). The first printed sermon in German was by Peter Verhelle of the same place (1702). The Hamburg Dompelaar Jacob Denner's tremendous sermon collection (1730, 1718 pages) was not only the largest but probably most influential collection of Mennonite sermons ever printed. Most numerous of the sermon authors were the preachers of Hamburg-Altona, Crefeld, and Danzig. Mennonite sermons printed in Russia appeared mostly in yearbooks and periodicals after the close of the 19th century.

Why were sermons printed? To be read from the pulpits by other preachers? Hardly. To be used as models? Probably. To be read in family worship? Certainly this was the case in later times. The two volumes of West Prussian sermons Predigten aus Mennoniten-Gemeinden 1891-99 (1906) and Predigten vorgetragen in den Mennoniten Gemeinden Westpreussens 1906-09 (1909), were expressly printed for this purpose according to the title page, "Zum Gebrauch für Hausgottesdienst." Perhaps such books were also to be used as private devotional books. The reprints of Wynantsz, Deknatel, and Denner in the 19th century in America no doubt had this as their primary purpose. In 1773 Pennsylvania Mennonites were using "many other books which our old preachers published and left behind for us, as Joost Hendricks, Willem Wynands, Jacob Denner, and many others" (MQR III, 1929, 231). The translation of Wynantsz in 1830 was made by the Amishman David Zug, and all three American editions of this book were for the Amish. Festival sermons had historical value, such as funeral, ordination, beginning of service (Antrittspredigt), retirement (Abschiedspredigt). Baptismal sermons may have been printed as souvenirs for the families involved.

Apart from reprints of European sermon collections (1830, 1835, 1852, 1860, 1871) and the curious sermons of the sleeping-preacher Noah Troyer, printed after his death (1879, 1880), the only original American Mennonite printed sermons before 1900 were: the sermon on "Christianity and War" (1863) by John M. Brenneman (MC) and a collection of New Year's sermons (1885) by the noted S. F. Sprunger (GCM) of Berne, Ind. Sprunger also published a unique international Mennonite sermon collection in 1891, Festklänge, with selections from preachers of the United States, Russia, Switzerland, and Germany. The 20th century in North America has produced a representative series of sermon books: J. E. Hartzler (1908), J. A. Huffman (1915), G. P. Schultz (1924), A. H. Unruh (1935), J. H. Janzen (1942, 1945), Wm. G. Detweiler (1943, 1949, 1951, 1952), George R. Brunk (1953), and a collection of Mennonite Brethren sermons. The radio, with its weekly sermon hour, has led to the printing of many Mennonite sermons in recent years.

H. S. Bender and N. D. Springer published in MQR XXVII (1953), 143-57, under the title "An Annotated Bibliography of Published Mennonite Sermons," an extensive list of separately printed Mennonite sermons, whether in collections or as single sermons. Full titles are given, with bibliographical data and locations in BeCL, GCL, AML, and Hamburg Mennonite Library. Sermons printed as parts of conference proceedings, church bulletins, periodicals, biographical volumes, etc., are not reported. The list is in three parts, (1) Europe, aside from Holland, (2) North America, (3) Holland, of which only the first two parts have appeared.

The only known published discussion of the history of Mennonite preaching outside of Holland is that by H. G. Mannhardt in Mennonitische Blätter XXXVIII (1891), 18 f., 22 f., 28 f., 37 f. (1891), entitled "Geschichte der Predigt in den deutschen Mennoniten-Gemeinden." Roy Umble's doctoral dissertation, Mennonite Preaching, 1864-1944 (Northwestern University, Evanston, Ill., 1949), is a study of the preaching of eleven leading American Mennonite (MC) ministers of that period. It has not been published. But see his article, "Characteristics of Mennonite Preaching," MQR XXVII (1953) 137-42. H.S.B.

Sermons, Hutterite. The existence of a large number of written sermons of Hutterite origin, mostly of the 17th century, was completely unknown until the publication of the Klein-Geschichtsbuch der Hutterischen Brüder in 1947. Even since the printing of excerpts in the Klein-Geschichtsbuch, no publication offers any reference or information concerning this material. When around 1800 Johannes Waldner (q.v.), then bishop of the Hutterites in Vishenka, Ukraine, decided to provide his brotherhood with another "Chronicle," summarizing the contents of the old (called "big") Chronicle and continuing it up to his own day, he felt that some of the sermons found at Vishenka should also be included to give posterity an adequate picture of the spiritual life of the brotherhood in its best time, the era of Andreas Ehrenpreis (q.v.). Thus shorter and longer excerpts of not less than 26 such sermons are given in the text of the Klein-Geschichtsbuch (pp. 204-14, and 218-21), all of them deriving from 1652-59. Most of these texts originated at a Bruderhof at Kesselsdorf (q.v.) in Slovakia, where apparently a kind of seminary for preachers existed. Even though Waldner does not mention names, at least six Hutterites are known who composed these sermons: H. F. Küentsche (q.v.), who was the major contributor, Caspar Eglau (q.v.), Mathias Binder, Johannes Milder, Tobias Bertsch, and Benjamin Poley. But there were also other sermon writers, above all Ehrenpreis himself.

In 1954 the present writer visited a number of Hutterite colonies in Canada and the Northwest of the United States, and was shown the originals from which these sermon excerpts had been taken. Between 300 and 600 original sermon booklets exist, dating from the early 17th century to 1665 (not one later), modest notebooks written in pencil or poor ink, which have been reverently preserved by the brotherhood through the centuries.

In the 18th century Johannes Waldner and several co-workers decided to revive the time-honored custom of reading sermons during the worship hour, and thus they began collecting the contents of most of these booklets in carefully written sermon books, many of them of considerable size. The oldest of these volumes, still extant, is of 1786; then follows one of 1789 (the Mathias Müller book), and so on up to 1804 and slightly later. All this material, old and new, was brought to America. When a brother is elected preacher it is his first duty to make for himself as complete a copy as possible of the entire sermon material. Each of the hundred odd Bruderhofs today has a collection of 30-60 carefully handwritten and well-bound books of sermons for all occasions. None has ever been printed, and it is the pride of each preacher to keep adding new sermon books to his bookshelves, written in excellent penmanship. All the long winter days are filled with this work. The selection changes slightly depending on whether he belongs to the Dariusleut (q.v.), Schmiedeleut (q.v.), or Lehrerleut (q.v.); some of them have more, some less. All are written and read in High German, even though the Hutterites speak a sort of Tirolean-Bavarian German dialect among themselves. Why are only old sermons read among the Hutterites today? The brethren would answer that these sermons are so perfect that no one could improve upon them. More likely is the assumption that the tradition-minded Hutterites are simply continuing a custom which was widely accepted in all churches during the 17th and 18th centuries.

The oldest exegetical books of the Hutterites, as far as is known, date back to the later part of the 16th century: 1566 and 1579 (both codices in Budapest), 1593 (in Esztergom), 1598 (in Brno), and 1599 (Bratislava). Although these codices were known to European scholars they were never recognized as the prototype of the later (not known) Hutterite sermon books. There are about 15 codices in European libraries, containing such exegeses ("Erklärungen") of different books of the Old and New Testaments (including the Book of Revelation, see Olivi), which are rather similar to the "Lehren" (homiletic instructions) as practiced by the brethren at least since 1629 if not earlier. After that time the datable production increased tremendously up to 1665 and then suddenly stopped. Innumerable undated sermons which to all appearance belong to the same period—that of Ehrenpreis—are also extant. A rigid series of pericopes for the entire church year, including holidays, provided the texts for most of these sermons. To these must be added sermons for other church events, such as baptisms, weddings, or funerals, for which also standard texts were and still are being used. The sermon production then worked around this program, interpreting the texts from many angles, but always in a conservative Biblical way, rarely indulging in the fashion of budding Pietism (q.v.). Thus the sermons lack emotional elements and are distinctly more hortatory than edificatory. The style and ideas of these sermons would deserve a detailed analysis, but in the absence of this no final appreciation can be offered.

Hutterite sermons are basically of two types: Lehren and Vorreden. The Lehr is usually an exegetical sermon interpreting a certain chapter of the Scriptures verse by verse, often very long-windedly, and (at least today) rarely read in its totality. In former times, to be sure, sermons lasted two hours or more. This Lehr always occupies the second part of the worship program; the first part is filled (besides prayer and hymns) by a Vorred. This is a general expository sermon centered around a special verse. Also the traditional ceremonies of the church, such as baptism, have this dual type of homiletics.

The information as to the number of existing written sermons varies greatly: the late bishop Elias Walter (q.v.) of the Dariusleut counted 196 Lehren and 25 Psalm interpretations (a total of 221) besides 55 general Vorreden and 25 Vorreden for holidays, making a grand total of 301 sermons. The Lehrerleut, however, claim 250 Vorreden and 350 Lehren, while another preacher claimed 180 Vorreden and 230 Lehren (totaling 410). One of the preachers added the information that some of these sermons are said to have been copied from the Jacob Denner (q.v.) sermon collection (German editions since 1730), which most likely explains the difference in the counting of the existing written sermons.

The prevailing church tradition concerning sermons includes the following. Christmas being celebrated for three days requires three Lehren; New Year's Day needs one Lehr, and Epiphany (January 6), another. Palm Sunday, the usual day of the baptismal ceremony with its elaborate, prescribed ritual (see Taufreden), requires one Lehr. On Good Friday another Lehr is read, while Easter, celebrated for three days, requires four Lehren (Sunday morning and afternoon; the Easter Sunday morning sermon deals with the Lamb of Exodus 12 as its traditional theme); Easter Monday is the day for the Lord's Supper with a lengthy sermon, usually lasting two hours; Tuesday is celebrated as resurrection day. Ascension Day requires one sermon, while Pentecost, celebrated for three days, has three Lehren. The Day of Annunciation (Mariae Verkündigung) is celebrated by the Schmiedeleut only, who use one Lehr for the morning worship; in the afternoon everyday work is resumed. There are also sermons for weddings (Eph. 5), funerals, election of ministers, confirmation of ministers, election of bishops, a total of at least 21 standard sermon assignments.

At this place no complete list of the Bible chapters and verses used can be offered. A scrutiny of the datable sermons shows, however, that of the Old Testament most-used books were Isaiah (predominant), Ecclesiasticus (their favorite Old Testament book), Jeremiah, Psalms, Proverbs, and Tobit. In the New Testament preference is given to the Gospels, Acts, Romans, Corinthians, Ephesians, John, Peter, James, and Hebrews.

The entire worship of the Hutterites, as it developed during the Ehrenpreis era, is strongly ritualized and formalized. When the preacher reads the Scripture text of his sermon, the congregation rises; the reading itself is done in chanting fashion. Since the daily prayer hour comes after a long day of hard work, it should not be surprising that now and then a member of the congregation falls asleep. Actually some of the sermons which Johannes Waldner collected in the Klein-Geschichtsbuch contained a complaint about "the sleepy audience" (206), and quote the admonition "that one should not sleep even if the sermon should last for two hours" (207). The reading of the sermon (at least today) sounds often more as a ritual than as a living instruction or exhortation; certain passages are most likely no longer fully understood. Due to the uncompromising Biblicalism of all sermons they call their reading "sharp preaching" in contrast to the "soft preaching" in other churches (cf. Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 577). The brethren are very fond of this "sharp" preaching, that is, of the outspokenness of the instruction concerning the meaning of the Scriptural text and its application in everyday life, realizing that it is this Biblical radicalism which distinguishes their piety and life from all their surroundings. Hence they like their worship period, with its sermons, prayers, and singing (q.v.), both on workdays (daily at 6 p.m.) and on Sundays. Needless to say that perfect attendance by all is taken for granted.

The minister, wearing a black frock coat almost down to the knees, enters the meeting room (usually, but not always, the schoolroom) first, then follow slowly the elders and those who have any office, taking their seats next to the preacher, facing the congregation. Next the congregation enters, men right (from the view of the preacher), women left, children in front, again boys separated from girls. At the conclusion of the worship, the exit takes place in the reverse, children first, and the minister last, who then locks the house. In 1957 the average Sunday service lasted 1½ hours, the Lord's Supper service lasted 2½ to 3 hours, and the ordination of a minister sometimes up to 4 hours.

The facts here described in no way exhaust the meaning and character of the Hutterite devotional life. Closer study of this subject would be needed, foremost by analyzing the sermon texts proper and comparing them with earlier and later texts from elsewhere. Therefore the material given above should not be taken as the final word. R.F.

Servaes, Matthias, an Anabaptist martyr: see Matthias Servaes.

Servaes Vuegen (Voegen), a Sacramentist (q.v.) of Maastricht, Dutch province of Limburg, who about the fall of 1534 became a member of the Maastricht Anabaptist congregation, having been baptized by Jan Smeitgen (q.v.). Arrested with many other members, he renounced his faith and was beheaded at Maastricht on Feb. 6, 1535. His confession before the officials is very remarkable; he says that he was baptized by Jan Smeitgen (q.v.) during a meeting of the congregation in a private home; before baptism was administered Smeitgen had preached on Mark 16:16, teaching that faith should precede the ceremony of baptism. He also confessed that they were interested in the events at Münster (q.v.) and that those of Münster "had chosen a king." voZ.

Servetus, Michael (1511-53), a native of Spain, was much exercised over the problem of the conversion of the Jews and the Moors. The great obstacle appeared to him to be the requirement of belief in the doctrine of the Trinity. Great was his relief to discover that the technical language of that doctrine is not to be found in the New Testament. At the same time he learned from the Occamist theologians how many logical contradictions the doctrine entails. He concluded that the formulation of the essentials of the doctrine at the council of Nicaea constituted the fall in the history of the Church. His own view affirmed one God, operative through His Word, which is coeternal with Himself and His agent in creation. This Word was united with the man Jesus, born of a virgin, to become the Son of God, who thus had a beginning in time and was not coeternal with God. The term "Christ" was applied to the Word, whether before or after the incarnation. This doctrinal position was set forth by Servetus in his De Trinitatis Erroribus printed at Hagenow near Strasbourg, and thus on Protestant soil, in 1531 (English translation by E. Morse Wilbur, Harvard Theological Studies XVI, 1932). The work, issued before the censors were alerted, received a wide dissemination and exerted a marked influence upon the anti-Trinitarians (q.v.).

By reason of this book Servetus was safe neither in Protestant nor in Catholic territory. He took refuge under pseudonymity and lived as Michel de Villeneuve in France, where for several years he supported himself as an editor. Everything he did gave offense. An edition of the Bible had notes which said that the prophets of the Old Testament were referring to events of their own times and were not predicting the future. An edition of Ptolemy's geography contained a passage denying that Palestine was a land flowing with milk and honey. Servetus then studied medicine in Paris and became the discoverer of the pulmonary circulation of the blood. For twelve years he practiced as a physician at Vienne near Lyons.

In 1553 he brought out clandestinely his great work, the Restitutio Christianismi, which repeated the views of the De Trinitatis Erroribus with the addition of two new elements. The first was Anabaptism which he had presumably imbibed during his previous stay at Strasbourg. With vehemence he denied the rightfulness of infant baptism, and recommended the postponement of baptism to the thirtieth year in imitation of Christ. The very title of the book, the Restitution of Christianity, is reminiscent of several Anabaptist works and the idea is precisely the Anabaptist ideal of the restoration of primitive Christianity. With the chiliastic Anabaptists he looked for the speedy return of the Lord and assigned to himself some ill-defined messianic role in that Michael Servetus would assist the archangel Michael. But Servetus was not an Anabaptist in his view of the church, which he held to be only a spiritual fellowship, nor in his conduct, since as a Nicodemite he attended mass.

The second new element was the Neoplatonism of the Florentine academy with which he became acquainted through the medical humanists of France. In accord with this tradition he interpreted Christ to be the light of the world in terms of the metaphysics of light. Servetus was not a systematic thinker. His writing is marked by bold speculation and by passionate outbursts of lyrical piety.

Through channels unknown to us the full circumstances of Servetus' identity and of the publication of his book came to be known in Geneva and were brought to the attention of John Calvin with whom Servetus some time previously had carried on an exacerbated correspondence. A certain Guillaume Trie, a Protestant of Geneva, had betrayed Servetus to the Inquisition at Vienne and then, being challenged for evidence, inveigled Calvin into supplying the necessary documentation. Servetus escaped, however, from the prison of the Inquisition and after wandering for three months turned up in Geneva on Aug. 13, 1553.

There he was recognized and was denounced to the Town Council on the capital charge of heresy at the instance of John Calvin. After a trial of two months Servetus was condemned as guilty of the two religious crimes subject to death in the code of Justinian, namely, the repetition of baptism and the denial of the Trinity. He was sentenced to be burned at the stake. Servetus petitioned for death by the sword lest he recant and lose his soul. Calvin seconded his request, but it was denied by the Council. From the flames Servetus called upon "Christ, the Son of the eternal God." Had he been willing to shift the position of the adjective and call upon "Christ, the eternal Son," he might have been saved. The Restitutio Christianismi was so effectively suppressed that only three copies survive, though there is an 18th-century reprint.

The execution on Oct. 27, 1553, marked the beginning of the toleration controversy (q.v.) on an extensive scale in Protestant churches. The reformers of the established Protestant churches endorsed the action of the Geneva Town Council and of Calvin, for example, Melancthon and Brenz. (Luther was dead.) But many were deeply troubled. Vergerio was aghast. David Joris entered a plea for the accused during the trial. Catherine Zell, Postell, and Curio voiced disapproval. The most influential protest was that of Castellio (q.v.) in his De Haereticis (1554, actually printed at Basel). R.H.B.

Services Bulletin, an 8-page 8½ x 11 in. monthly periodical published by the Mennonite Central Committee at Akron, Pa., first issue March 1947, last issue April 1956, at which time the circulation was 7,500 copies, distributed free. The following have served as editors: Ernest W. Lehman, Paul Holde-man, Ruth Hess, Emma Schlichting, Marion W. Kliever, and Margaret Jantzi. The purpose of the Services Bulletin was to give in a concise form a review of the various services sponsored by the MCC, namely, foreign relief, refugee resettlement, voluntary service, peace, and mental health. In April 1958 the periodical was reactivated under the name Report and published as a quarterly interpreting the MCC program to 2500 church leaders and educators. Each issue of this 6½ x 9½ in. booklet is devoted to a section of MCC activity. This periodical is edited by the Information section of the MCC.

Settlement Mennonite (MC) Church, now extinct, was organized by Mennonite families (MC) in Northampton County, Pa., in 1802, when a meeting-house was built, evidently as the continuation of the older Siegfried (q.v.) congregation, the first meeting-house of which was built on what is now Twenty-first Street, Northampton, Pa., in 1760 or earlier. The trustees in 1802 were Jacob Baer, Jacob Histand, John Ziegler, and Samuel Landis. As was usual in Pennsylvania prior to the adoption of the Public School Law of 1834 the land was given for both church and school purposes. The Mennonites built on this lot a frame building, 26 x 30 feet in size. But the effort to revive the congregation did not succeed. For the next hundred years there was a weary struggle for survival. Franconia Conference preachers, General Conference Mennonites, and even independents, all made efforts to keep the congregation alive, but in vain. Finally in 1908 the property was sold and converted into a dwelling. The Cement National Bank of Siegfried, Northampton, Pa., is custodian of a trust fund for the care of the cemetery, which has about 60 marked graves. J.C.W.

Seu, Johannes (Jan Seeus), a native of the Dutch province of Zeeland, d. 1613 at Middelburg, capital of Zeeland, was a Reformed minister. At first he was a schoolteacher at Frankenthal, Germany. As pastor he first served in Germany, in 1575 being preacher of the Calvinist refugees at Frankfurt on the Main. From 1576 he was a Reformed clergyman at Middelburg, Holland. Seu was a bitter opponent of the Mennonites. It was obviously Seu who caused the imprisonment of Hans de Ries (q.v.) at Middelburg in 1578, when de Ries visited this town. When later the Mennonites of Middelburg refused to take an oath and to bear arms Seu tried to press them into the military civil guard, and if they should refuse, to close their shops. By the intervention of Prince William of Orange (q.v.) the Mennonites of Middelburg could live in peace, being exempted from the oath and the military service (1577-78, 1580). But Seu continued to attack the Mennonites and tried to persuade the magistrates to forbid the public exercise of their religion. Again Prince William brought relief. Seu also wrote some books against the Mennonites: Schriftmatige Artykelen tegen de ongeschikte en valsche dwaelingen der wederdoopers (Middelburg, 1599), Corte Beschrijvinge van het ampt der overheid ende wederlegginge van een boucxken dat eenen Wederdooper met verswijging zijns naems . . . heeft laten uitgaen . . . tegen het recht gebruik des krijchs (Middelburg, 1600). In his Waeraghtige grondige bewijsinge . . . van den Kinderdoop (Leiden, 1601) he defended infant baptism, attacking believers' baptism; it is the duty of the magistrates to eradicate the Mennonites by forbidding their meetings and removing their preachers. In 1608 he published Antwoordt op een boecxken gemaectt door eenen wederdooper Cornelis de Cuyper genaemt: eenvuldighe verantwoordinghe . . . (Middelburg, 1608), which severely attacks the Mennonites, saying that they are worse than the Pope and his idolatry. Seventh Street Mennonite Mission (MC) is located at 347 South Seventh Street in Reading, Pa. The work is an outpost of the Twelfth and Windsor Mission established in Reading in 1938 among the colored. In 1957 the minister was William M. Weaver and the membership 22. I.D.L.

Seventh Street Mennonite (MC) Church (known until 1947 as the Alpine Street Mennonite Church), located on Seventh at Campus Avenue, Upland, Cal., was organized in 1942 with 25 members as a member of the Pacific Coast District Conference (now South Pacific Conference). A new church was dedicated on Aug. 17, 1948. The first minister was William Jennings. In 1957 the membership was 104, with Sherman Maust as pastor. J.D.L.

Seward County, Neb., is located in the east central part of the state. The Mennonite settlement of the county is in and around Milford, a town of 951 population, in the south central part of the county. The four Mennonite churches (MC) in the county, West Fairview (q.v.), East Fairview (q.v.), and Milford (q.v.), and a new congregation formed in 1958 by members of East Fairview, had a combined membership of 650 in 1958. The first settlers were Amish Mennonites from Walnut Creek, Ohio, arriving in the spring of 1873; others came later from the Wayland (Iowa) neighborhood and from Central Illinois. In 1958 the Bellwood (MC) congregation was established with 55 charter members. A new congregation has also been formed with 22 members in Lincoln, Neb., of former members of the Milford, West Fairview, and East Fairview churches, who are now living in Lincoln. A.M.M.

Sewel, William (Dutch, Willem Sewel) (Amsterdam, 1653-1720), an outstanding Quaker historian and author of Historie van de Opkomst, aanwas en voortgang der Christenen, bekend by den naem van Quakers . . . (Amsterdam, 1717), of which book there is also an English translation, The History of the Rise, Increase and Progress of the Christian People Called Quakers (London, England, 1722), was of Mennonite descent. His grandfather William Sewel, a painter, belonged to the Brownists (q.v.), who moved from England to the Netherlands in 1589. This William Sewel's son was Jacob Sewel (who often spelled his name "Zeenwel"), a surgeon at Amsterdam, who married Judith Zinspenning. Both Jacob and his wife were members of the Utrecht Mennonite Church and later of the Amsterdam Flemish congregation until about 1656, when Quakerism arose in the Netherlands; under the Quaker influence especially of William Ames (q.v.) both Jacob Zeenwell and his wife left the Mennonite Church. Especially Judith Zinspenning was an ardent Quaker, charging that the spirit of true conversion was lacking in Mennonite sermons and meetings, and that they held too much to the "outward (i.e., visible) church," considering baptism and communion as divine orders, while neglecting enlightenment by the Spirit of God. Thus she wrote in her book Eenige Schriften en Zendbrieven (Amsterdam, 1684). Her son William Sewel repeated these charges in his book. vdZ.

Sewing Circle Committee, General, the name applied to the committee supervising women's sewing circles in the Mennonite Church (MC). In the 1932 Mennonite Year-Book, the name appears for the first time, replacing the earlier Women's Missionary Committee. In 1947 the General Sewing Circle Committee became the Women's Sewing Circle Organization and in 1955 the latter became the Women's Missionary and Service Auxiliary (q.v.). M.G.

Seye (Seyen, Seijen, Sye, Sije, Sijen), a Dutch Mennonite family, now extinct, formerly largely represented in the Waterlander congregation of Amsterdam, later also found at Haarlem, Leiden, and Rotterdam. Many members of the family served as deacons in Amsterdam as well as in Haarlem and Leiden. There were at least three Mennonite preachers of this family: Jacob Seyen was a preacher of the Waterlanders at Amsterdam 1642-d.70. Hendrik Seye served the Flemish and Frisian Kruisstraat congregation of Haarlem 1715-c50. Hendrik Seye Jr, after serving as assistant pastor at Friedrichstadt (q.v.) in Holstein, Germany, was the last minister of the Mennonite congregation of Schiedam (q.v.), serving there 1741-47. He was at the same time an ardent Collegiant (q.v.), often speaking in the Collegiant meetings at Rotterdam and at Rijnsburg (q.v.). Whether a Jacob Seyen was a preacher at Alkmaar in the early 18th century is questionable. vdZ.

Seyel, Hans: see Seidl, Johannes.

Seyfried, Johann, a preacher at the Lutheran church of St. George in Augsburg, Germany, was tolerant to the Anabaptists in the city and was one of the few clergymen of the Reformation period to defend them. He is reported to have frequently said from the pulpit, "One finds nowhere in the Scripture that the Anabaptists should be punished to the extent to which they are punished" (Literaliensammlung des Augsburger Stadtarchivs, July 4, 1528). When Martin Zehentmaier (q.v.) was heard by the council of Augsburg on Nov. 27, 1528, he asserted that he had conversed with Master Hans Seyfried; he did not condemn rebaptism, but said if anyone came to him desiring rebaptism, he would rather baptize him himself. Seylemaker (Seil(e)maker), a Mennonite family, formerly found at Hoorn, Dutch province of North Holland, where Volkert Maertensz Seylemaker, a sailmaker, lived in the 16th century. Brandt called him "a man of knowledge and loyalty among the Mennonites, now called Frisians" and says that it was Seylemaker who told that when he was visiting Menno Simons, who lay on his deathbed, Menno said, "Be not a servant of men, as I have been." Volkert Maertensz was probably well-to-do, for his youngest son Dirk studied medicine at Leiden and in Italy, obtaining his medical degree in 1594 at the famous University of Padua. This Dirk Volkertsz Seylemaker (b. 1572 at Hoorn, d. there 1630) after finishing his medical studies was a physician in his home town; after a fashion of that period he used a Latin name, Theodorus Velius, and Velius became the family name of his descendants. He was married first to Martha des Muliers, a Mennonite refugee from Flanders (d. before 1599), and then to Aef Ewouts. Velius was a man of erudition and also wrote some poetry. He is specially known for a historical chronicle, Chronijk van de Stadt Hoorn (first ed. Hoorn, 1604, reprints 1617, 1648, 1740), which gives some information about the Mennonites. His son Pierre Velius, a physician like his father, left the Mennonite Church, as did most of his descendants. Mennonite descendants called Velius were found at Leiden and Amsterdam in the 16th and 17th centuries.

Willem Maertens Seylemaker (1626-81), a grandson of the above Volkert Maertensz, was married to Aechtje Sleutel. He and most descendants took the family name of Sleutel (q.v.) instead of Seylemaker. He was a preacher of the Frisian Mennonite congregation at Hoorn from 1649 and elder from 1657. Two of his sons, Jan Willems Sleutel (1654-92) and Gerrit Willem Seylemaker, were preachers of the same congregation, Jan Willems from 1678 after his father died, and Gerrit Willems from 1688. vbZ.

Shady Pine Mennonite Church (MC), located at Willow Hill, Pa., member of the Washington-Franklin Mennonite Conference, is a mission congregation under the district mission board. It was established in 1948, and had 25 members in 1957, with Howard Lehman as pastor. M.G.

Shafter (Cal.) First Mennonite Church (GCM), a member of the Pacific District, had its beginnings with the migration of Mennonites to the area in 1918-19, stimulated by H. J. Krehbiel of Reedley. Meetings were held in homes, the Santa Fe school, and later in a small church erected on Scaroni Avenue. Herman Janzen was the first leader. When some of the Mennonites moved away, those remaining joined other denominations for a time, but when Krehbiel returned to Shafter in 1935, the congregation reorganized and in 1937 built the present church at the corner of Golden West and Wall Streets. The congregation had 56 members in 1957, with Ramon H. Jantz as pastor. J.B.A.

Shafter (Cal.) Mennonite Brethren Church, a member of the Pacific District Conference, was organized in the fall of 1918, when a number of recent settlers met in the home of Henry Kohfeld. Deacon Frank C. Penner, formerly of Escondido, Cal., also assisted in the organization. For a time the congregation met in private homes and later in the local school. In 1919 a tabernacle was built near the center of town at the corner of Kern and California Streets. The membership in 1958 was 522 with H. H. Dick as the pastor in charge, and D. W. Nikkel assistant pastor. E.Sr.

Shamshabad, a Mennonite Brethren mission station in India, located near the large village of Shamshabad, 10 miles southwest of Hyderabad, Madhya Pradesh (formerly Central Provinces), was opened in 1920, and in the following years the Mission built two bungalows for missionaries, a church, two school buildings, hostels for school boys and girls, a hospital, and living quarters for workers and students. Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Pankratz began the work in this area and resided at this station one year. Dr. Katharina L. Schellenberg and Anna Hanneman have lived and worked here many years. In 1957 the missionaries were Mr. and Mrs. P. V. Balzer, Emma Lepp, Helen Harder, and Marie Riediger.

Regular worship services and other church activities have been conducted at the station from its beginning. A middle and primary school has been conducted since 1920. In 1946-48 the mission high school was located here, and the Bethany Bible school 1930-45. In 1927 the hospital was built and it is still in operation. The Shamshabad station field, comprising an area of 1,000 square miles and having a population of 160,000, in 1957 had a growing Christian community with a church membership of 800. J.H.L.

Shank (Shenk, Schenk, Schenck), a Mennonite family name formerly found in Switzerland in the Emmenthal in the 16th and 17th centuries. Some of the family emigrated to Moravia in the 1530's, others to the Palatinate, Germany, in the 1670's, among whom was Michael Schenk, of Mühlbach, Emmenthal, who in 1671, at the age of eighty-one, settled in Osthofen in the Palatinate, leaving his wife and 14 children in Switzerland. He was accompanied by one son with his wife and children, and his brother(?) Christian, aged ninety-five, with two daughters. Since 1800 the name is not found among the Swiss Mennonites.

In Pennsylvania a Michael Shank (Schenck) (d. 1744) and his son Michael Shank (d. 1785) were on the naturalization list of 1729. There was also a Henry Shank (Shenk) on the Strasburg Stettlet tract. These lived and died in Lancaster County, Pa., and are the ancestors of all Mennonites with this name. Some outstanding bearers in the Lancaster Conference were bishops Henry Shenk (1794-1865) of Conestoga Township, and Daniel Shank (1832-1906) in Adams County.

The first bishop in Virginia was Henry Shank (1758-1836), ordained in 1810 to have the oversight over all the congregations in the Shenandoah Valley; his son Samuel Shank (1790-1863) was bishop in the Lower District in Virginia, and the latter's son Abraham Shank (1829-1901) was bishop in the same district. Samuel Shank (1821-1901), a minister, a brother of Bishop Abraham Shank, was a leader in the Virginia Conference, serving a number of years as moderator. Three of his sons, Lewis, Joseph, and Perry, and several of his grandsons followed him in the ministry. Lewis Shank (1855-1942) was bishop of the Lower District in Virginia from 1901 until his death. J. Ward Shank (1904-) has been serving as bishop in the Lower District since 1954. John H. Shenk (1911-) is a minister at Denbigh, Va., and John F. Shank (1911-) a minister at Broadway, Va.

Deacon Jacob A. Shenk (1900-50) established the successful Shenk Hatcheries at Harrisonburg and was active in church work, especially in missions, serving as president of the Virginia Mennonite Mission Board until his untimely death in a plane crash. Aaron M. Shenk was a bishop in the Lancaster Conference at Myerstown, Pa.

In Allen County, Ohio, the successor of Bishop John M. Brenneman (q.v.) was John M. Shank (1848-1935). J. W. Shank (1881-) was a Mennonite missionary to Argentina 1917-49. His brother J. R. Shank (1877-1958) served as a rural missionary in Missouri from 1905. David Shank, their nephew, is a missionary in Belgium. Stanley C. Shank (1919-) was a minister and writer at West Liberty, Ohio, and his brother Charles J. Shank is now a missionary in Japan. Harvey E. Shank (1887-) is a bishop at Chambersburg, Pa., and G. D. Shank (1878-) a bishop at Sheridan, Ore. Dozens of ministers in the Mennonite Church (MC) have borne the name Shank or Shenk. In 1957 there were 32 such, of whom 19 were Shank and 13 Shenk, in Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, Ohio, Idaho, Indiana, and Oregon. J.C.W.

Shank, John Robert (1877-1958), a Mennonite (MC) bishop and editor, was born Aug. 19, 1877, at Versailles, Mo., a son of Lewis and Mary Wenger Shank. Ordained a minister in 1905, he served first at Pea Ridge, Mo., until 1908, then at Carver, Mo., and in the surrounding Osage River district. In 1941 he was ordained bishop. Besides his rural missionary work he served widely in Christian educational work as editor and writer for the Sunday-school periodicals of the Mennonite Church, and editor of YPBM topics. He was secretary of the Missouri-Kansas Conference 1907-34, and long-time member of the Mennonite Publication Board. He was married to Clara M. Brubaker; there were no children. He died April 26, 1958. H.S.B.

Shantipur Leper Homes, situated 4 miles southwest of Dhamtari near the Dhamtari-Balodgahan highway, Madhya Pradesh (formerly Central Provinces), India. During the famine of 1899-1900 the lepers among the thousands who came for food and shelter were placed in separate huts and were fed from separate kitchens. The British government and the municipality of Dhamtari gave grants of money and private individuals subscribed sums for their later maintenance.

In 1901 J. A. Ressler (q.v.), an American Mennonite (MC) missionary, was asked to assume the responsibility for founding an institution for the lepers. He received financial aid from the Mission to Lepers in India and the East, with headquarters in Edinburgh, Scotland. The American Mennonite Mission was to have free access to the lepers for religious work and for organizing and supervising the living and work of the lepers and also built up a Christian staff of overseers and helpers.

The first leper asylum was located on a plot of ground donated by Dhamtari at the southern edge of Dhamtari, where a group of lepers had previously lived in little bamboo matting huts, subsisting by begging. The first substantial buildings were constructed in 1902-3. Much of the material was donated by the Government Forest Department. Gradually kitchens for cooking, a medical dispensary, a house for the caretaker, and a chapel were built. Ultimately the Government provided a per-capita grant for the maintenance of the lepers to supplement the sum given by the Mission to Lepers. To care for the increasingly large number of lepers applying for admittance it was found necessary to find a larger site. Accordingly in 1920 the Mission to Lepers sanctioned a scheme for a project estimated at $60,000 which would provide for Leper Homes with all the facilities for their care and treatment. By this time the enrollment of inmates was 251 of whom 227 were baptized Christians and 22 were applicants for baptism. In 1922 an area of 115 acres of land was purchased from a village for $2,400. The estimated cost of the entire plant to accommodate about 500 inmates with medical and other facilities would be about $60,000 of which Government and the Mission to Lepers each would provide half.

In 1924 the lepers were transferred from Dhamtari to Shantipur. By 1929 there were cottages to house the 450 lepers and healthy children of lepers, two large hospital wards, a large medical dispensary with laboratory, school buildings for leper and non-leper children, buildings for administration and hospital staff, and the bungalow for the missionary superintendent. The medical staff had at their disposal all the latest remedies for the treatment of the lepers. Shantipur became one of the largest leper homes in the interior of India.

A word of tribute must be given to Dr. C. D. Esch who untiringly gave his time and effort to the building up of Shantipur. G.J.L.

Shantz (Schantz, Shanz, Tschantz, Johns), a Swiss Mennonite family, with few representatives in Europe today (Albert Schantz is a preacher in the Regensburg, Bavaria, congregation and chairman of the relief committee known as Christenpflicht, q.v.), but early represented in Pennsylvania (Jacob Schantz, immigrant to Montgomery County, Pa., in 1737, Hans Tschantz, third bishop in the Lancaster County, Pa., colonial Mennonite settlement, active c1742; a cemetery plot donated by him still called "Hans Tschantz cemetery"), and since 1800 a prominent family in the Mennonite Church (MC) in Ontario. There the following ordained men bearing the name Shantz have served or are serving: bishops, Henry Shantz (1864-77), Detweiler congregation from 1842; Israel R. Shantz (1863-1910), moved from Waterloo to Carstairs, Alberta, c1903; Moses H. Shantz (1884-1938) at Blenheim, Ont., many years moderator of the Ontario Conference (MC) and for a time president of the Mennonite Publication Board; Benjamin B. Shantz (1880-), Hagey congregation; Stanley D. Schantz (1914-), Guernsey, Sask.; preachers, Merle Schantz, Wanner congregation, Ont.; Irwin Schantz, Loman, Minn. Jacob Y. Schantz (q.v.) was a prominent layman (MC) in Kitchener, Ont., joining the M.B.C. Church c1875 when it was started. John Schantz (1774-1855) and his son Joseph (1814-81) were ministers in the Upper Milford (Pa.) congregation which joined the Oberholtzer group (GCM) in 1847, and J. W. Schantz (1878-1916) was a minister (GCM) at Schwenksville (Pa.) and Zion at Souderton (Pa.) 1907-16.

An Amish branch of the family came to America c1768. Joseph Schantz (1749-1810), who changed his name to Johns, was in Somerset County, Pa., by 1793, and in 1810 founded the city of Johnstown on his land. Some of his descendants moved to Elkhart County, Ind., where Daniel J. Johns (1850-1942) was an outstanding leader and two of his sons also, Ira S. Johns (1879-1956), preacher at the Clinton Frame congregation near Goshen and long secretary of the Indiana-Michigan Mennonite (MC) Conference, and Otis N. Johns, bishop of the Beech congregation near Louisville, Ohio, and long secretary of the Mennonite Publication Board. Joseph Schantz (1856-1934), a preacher at Ingolstadt, Bavaria, where his father and grandfather had been bishops in the Amish congregation, emigrated to the Midwest, finally locating at Wisner, Neb., in the M.C. congregation. Two brothers, Daniel and Andrew Schantz, also came with Joseph to the Midwest. Descendants of the three men are scattered in Nebraska, Oklahoma, and other midwestern states. Other Amish Schantzes came from Europe to Central Illinois, including Christian Schantz to Tiskilwa c1840, Jacob Schantz from Hesse-Darmstadt, Germany, to Congerville, Ill., in 1847. A son of Jacob, Peter (q.v.; 1853-1921?) Schantz, was an outstanding leader in the Central Mennonite Conference.

The earliest known mention of a member of the family among the Anabaptists is in 1541 in the canton of Bern, Switzerland. In 1567 a Hans Tschantz of Kiesen, canton of Bern, was imprisoned for his faith. Oppligen and Röthenbach in the same canton were mentioned in connection with the family. In the fore part of the 18th century members of the family moved to the Bernese Jura district, also to Montbéliard and Alsace. In 1824 a Johannes Tschantz and his son Abraham left their Jura home and settled in the Sonnenberg district in Wayne County, Ohio, where many of their descendants still live. H.S.B.

Daniel Kauffman, Mennonite Cyclopedic Dictionary (Scottsdale, 1937).

Schantz, Jacob Yost (1822-1909), of Berlin (now Kitchener), Ont., for many years a promoter of the Mennonite settlements in Manitoba, was born on May 2, 1822, the eighth child of Jacob and Maria Yost Schantz, of Montgomery County, Pa., who had purchased a farm in what is now East Kitchener. The son's interests soon extended beyond his vocation of farming. Fruit growing, maple sugar production, and the operation of a sawmill were added to his activities. Later he entered the building and contracting business. He promoted various industries in his city, the chief being the Dominion Button Works. For 27 years he served on the Berlin school board and in 1882 was unanimously chosen as mayor of Berlin, but he resigned the position after four days in office.

Schantz's chief public contribution, however, lay in the promotion of Mennonite immigration to Manitoba. In 1872 as a representative of the Canadian government Schantz accompanied Bernhard Warkentin (q.v.), who represented the prospective Mennonite immigrants from Russia, on a land inspection trip to Manitoba. The Canadian Department of Agriculture published Schantz's report under the title The Narrative of a Journey to Manitoba, which became a history-making pamphlet going through various editions with a total circulation of several hundred thousand. During the next 35 years, Schantz made many trips to Manitoba, the twenty-seventh and the last in his 85th year. His work consisted in assisting the Mennonite immigrants who wished to settle in Manitoba with transportation and supplies, as well as helping them settle on the land. By November 1874 it was reported that 1,400 Mennonites had been placed in Manitoba and five years later the number had grown to over 7,000. Schantz not only obtained most favorable travel rates for the immigrants but often used money from his $100,000 personal credit fund in a Berlin bank to assist his friends from Russia by helping pay their transportation costs, equipment, and farm machinery. Schantz was also placed in charge of the $100,000 Canadian government loan to the Russian Mennonites, guaranteed by the Ontario Mennonites. As treasurer of the "Aid Committee of Ontario" Schantz also dispensed the funds loaned to the immigrants by his fellow Mennonites. He lived to see the day when all of these loans were repaid, the final settlement having been made in his 85th year. In 1893 Schantz began promoting Alberta land and here again future developments proved his business judgment and vision. (In his German correspondence he usually spelled his name "Schantz.")

Schantz became a member of the Mennonite Church (MC) at an early age. In 1875, desiring a more progressive church, Schantz became a member of the group later to be known as the Mennonite Brethren in Christ. For eighteen years he served on the Managing Committee of the Gospel Banner (q.v.) and for at least 8 years on his denomination's Foreign and Heathen Missionary Society. In his last years he showed interest in Christian Science but died a member of the M.B.C. church. He was always deeply interested in the temperance movement and a defender of Biblical nonresistance.

Although Schantz was a quiet and unassuming man, his voice had a deep, organ-like tone that people did not forget. He was married three times, in 1843 to Barbara Biehn, in 1853 to Nancy Brubacher, and in 1871 to Sarah Sherk. Two sons and three daughters were born of the first marriage, and three sons and four daughters to the second. Schantz was buried in the East End Mennonite Cemetery of Kitchener.† M.G.

Shantz Mennonite Church (MC), located in Waterloo County, Ont., north of Baden and about 8 miles west of Waterloo, is a member of the Ontario Conference. It is locally also known as the Upper Street Church. It was founded in the 1830's, the first settlers having been George R. Schmitt and John Schmitt, from Alsace. George Schmitt (d. 1882) was the first minister. The first meetinghouse, a stone structure, was built in 1853 and remodeled in 1900. It was replaced in 1929 by a red brick building. Among the other ministers who served the Shantz congregation were Tobias Bowman (ord. 1875), Orphen H. Wismer (ord. 1898), and Leslie Witmer (ord. 1937), the pastor in 1958.

It is improbable that the Ohio-Canada West (GCM) movement greatly affected the Shantz congregation. However, at the neighboring Geiger church, south of Baden, Ulrich Geiger, a minister, was influenced by this movement and was out of fellowship with the main body for a time. Divisive influences seem to have touched the Shantz congregation. The Wayland List of 1853 indicates that Amos Cressman, a deacon, was not in fellowship, though he lived close to the Shantz church. He is buried in the little Crosshill Mennonite plot several miles north, although the Cressman family plot is in the Shantz cemetery. (See also Wellesley). J.C.F.

Sharon Bethel Amish Mennonite Church, unaffiliated, located 5 miles north of Kalona, Iowa, was organized in 1946, under D. O. Burkholder of Nappanee, Ind. The congregation held its services in a Lutheran meetinghouse until 1952, when it dedicated its own meetinghouse. In 1954 Jonathan M. Miller was the bishop. J. C. Helmuth and Mose E. Yoder the ministers, with 52 members. J.M.M.

Sharon Conservative Mennonite Church, located at Ragersville, Ohio, was established in 1951 and had 51 members by 1957. Harry J. Stutzman was its bishop. M.G.

Sharon Mennonite Brethren Church, located at Hooker, Okla., was organized Jan. 8, 1936, with a membership of 30. Henry S. Voth was the first leader. The following have served as pastors of the church: H. S. Voth, Abraham Cornelsen, H. B. Pauls, B. C. Willems, H. H. Hiebert, and M. R. Schimnowski. Mr. and Mrs. P. V. Balzer have gone out as missionaries to India. The first church building was built in 1905, and the present building in 1925. The 1957 membership was 117. In 1957 the name was changed to Adams M. B. Church.

Sharon Mennonite Church (MC), located on Winton Way Street, Winton, Cal., a member of the South Pacific Conference, was organized March 15, 1931, with 23 members. J. P. Bontrager was appointed pastor and bishop, and L. E. Weaver minister. The meetinghouse was built in 1935 with a seating capacity of 180. The membership in 1957 was 75, with Wilbert R. Nafziger, Luke E. Weaver, and Leonard Garber as ministers. J.P.Bo.

Sharon Mennonite Church (MC), 3 miles southeast of Plain City, Ohio, a member of the Ohio and Eastern Conference, was organized Jan. 15, 1933, most of the members having come out of the Madison County Old Order Amish (q.v.) church. Abram Kaufman (ordained bishop in 1948) has been the pastor from the beginning. Sunday-school work was begun in 1926 in an abandoned church which was used until 1938. In that year a new building was erected, which burned down just before completion. It was at once rebuilt and dedicated in January 1940. In 1957 the membership was 163. Ab.K.

Sharon Mennonite Church, located in Steelton, Pa., at 401 Main St., a colored congregation (MC), an outpost of the Elizabethtown congregation of the Lancaster Mennonite Conference, opened in 1952.

Sharon Mennonite Church (MC), located near Guernsey, Sask., a member of the Alberta-Saskatchewan Conference, had its origin in the winter of 1903-4, when a committee from Berlin (now Kitchener), Ont., inspected the Saskatchewan Mennonite Reserve. In 1905 the first settlers left from Ontario, followed in 1906 by another group. The first sermon was preached by Eli S. Hallman. Early services were held in the home of Aaron S. Biehn, and later, until 1911, at the Waterloo School. In 1911 a meetinghouse, 30 x 40 ft., was built. The following ministers have served the congregation: Eli S. Hallman, Moses H. Schmitt, Isaiah S. Rosenberger, Burton Weber, Daniel Schlabach, Stanley Schantz, Aaron S. Biehn, Edwin Bowman, and Arnold Shantz. Prominent family names are Bowman, Biehn, Snyder, Shantz, Weber, and Gingerich. The membership in 1957 was 136, with Bishop Stanley D. Shantz as pastor. E.S.

Sharon Valley Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, located at Ulen (hence also called the Ulen church), Clay Co., Mich., was organized in 1924 with I. S. Mast as pastor. The highest membership, about 40, was reached in 1925. In the following years the families moved into other communities. By 1938 Mennonite church activities in the area had ceased. F.E.K.

Shelby Reformed Mennonite Church, located 3 miles east of Shelby, Oceana Co., Mich., is the only congregation of this branch of Mennonites in Michigan. The congregation was organized in 1888 and the meetinghouse, a frame structure with a seating capacity of 160, was built in 1893. The organizers of the church were Ambrose Bearss, John Near, and Peter Roth, Bearss serving as minister and Near as deacon. Other ministers who have served the congregation are Eli Near, Al Near, and Jesse Fogelsonger. In 1952 Omar Near was the minister. In 1958 the membership was 52. R.N.

Shelby County, Ill., is located in the southern half of the state, approximately 50 miles southeast of Springfield. In 1872 a small Old Order Amish settlement was established in the county by settlers from Elkhart and Lagrange counties, Indiana, and Holmes County, Ohio. Among them were Jacob Miller, a minister, and Christian Borntrager, later ordained minister. Because of a disagreement among the organizers, most of the settlers moved away in 1883, principally to Reno County, Kan.

In 1907 John D. Kauffman (q.v.) and his followers established another Amish Mennonite settlement in the county near Shelbyville. Their church, named Mt. Hermon, was built in 1912. The membership had declined to 41 by 1957. Joseph D. Reber was bishop. M.G.

Sheldon Mennonite Church (MC), located 4½ miles northwest of the town of Sheldon, Rusk Co., Wis., a member of the North Central Conference, was organized on July 15, 1936, by B. B. King of Elida, Ohio, and built its church in 1937. In 1957 the membership was 73, served by Daniel L. Martin and Norman H. Witmer as ministers. D.L.M.

Shelly, a Mennonite family which, according to tradition, is of English origin, but which under the religious persecution of Queen Mary fled to Holland. About 1725-30 Abraham Shelly, a recent Mennonite immigrant from Switzerland, purchased from William Penn and his brother a tract of land in what is now Milford Township in Bucks County, Pa., about 35 miles north of Philadelphia. The family is now scattered in many of the states and Canada. The greatest concentration of Shellys is still in the Milford Square area of Bucks County.

Andrew B. Shelly (q.v.; 1834-1913) was a contemporary of John H. Oberholtzer and a leader and organizer of the General Conference of Mennonites. Anthony S. Shelly (q.v.; 1853-1928) taught in the Wadsworth Mennonite school 1877-79, and for ten years served as editor of the Mennonite (q.v.). Other members of the Shelly family in the ministry were Elwood Shelly and Harvey Shelly. G.C.M. ministers of the present include Ward W. Shelly of Lancaster, Pa.; Paul R. Shelly, Bluffton College; Andrew R. Shelly, Mennonite Biblical Seminary; Maynard Shelly, North Newton, Kan.; Wilmer S. Shelly, Frederick, Pa.; and Kenneth Shelly, Pulaski, Iowa. W.S.S.

Shelly, Andrew B. (1834-1913), was an outstanding leader in the Eastern District Conference and in the General Conference Mennonite Church for 50 years, from about 1865 until his death. His leadership was revered in his pastoral ministry, his district conference activities, and in his many tasks in the General Conference. He was born in Bucks County, Pa., on Sept. 23, 1834, the only son and oldest child of Joseph and Elizabeth Bauer Shelly. His great-great-grandfather on both his father's and mother's side was Abraham Shelly, who with his two brothers immigrated to this country from Switzerland about 1720.

Shelly always enjoyed studying, having an inquisitive mind. At the age of seven he went to the parochial school conducted by the West Swamp Church for one year and then went to public school during the winters until he was nineteen. He worked on his father's farm during these summers. After this he began to teach. He further prepared himself for teaching by going to an academy for nine months. He taught school until 1863, when he devoted all of his time to farming. Another of his activities in this period was teaching "singing school." On Oct. 15, 1858, Shelly married Fannie Weinberger, daughter of Joseph and Mary Shelly Weinberger. They had three sons and two daughters, one son and one daughter preceding their parents in death.

Shelly began his work in a local church as a layman. In 1857 he became superintendent of the Sunday school in the West Swamp Mennonite Church. This has been referred to as the first G.C.M. Sunday school. Later he helped to organize the Sunday School Convention of the Eastern District Conference. The first meeting of this group was held on Oct. 2, 1876. His first contribution to the life of the church in wider circles was in the field of editing and writing. In 1866 he became editor of the Mennonitischer Friedensbote, serving until 1881 when this paper was merged with Zur Heimath and the Christlicher Bundesbote. He served as assistant editor of the new paper until 1884. Seeing the need of an English church paper he urged that one be started. He was on the original board which published the Mennonite, the first issue being printed in October 1885.

Shelly was ordained to the Christian ministry on March 25, 1864, to serve as associate minister to John H. Oberholtzer. He was pastor of the First Mennonite Church of Philadelphia 1869-71. On Aug. 22, 1872, he was ordained as bishop of the West Swamp, East Swamp, Flatland, and Saucon congregations. He served as pastor at West Swamp throughout his further life and for part of this time he was also pastor of one or more of these other churches. In addition to his work as pastor, he engaged in an unusually large number of conference activities. He was president of the Eastern District Conference 1871-82 and of the General Conference 1874-96. He was also active on various boards. His major contribution in this area was his service on the G.C.M. mission board 1874-1911, when he resigned because of his age. He was secretary of this board 1889-1911. He was elected to the educational board at the 1913 session of the General Conference. He attended all the sessions of the General Conference from 1866 to 1913. He died while visiting N. B. Grubb in Philadelphia on the morning of Dec. 26, 1913. The funeral and burial took place on New Year's day of 1914 at the West Swamp Mennonite Church. His wife died on Oct. 13, 1913.

Shelly was said to be conservative yet aggressive in his leadership. He promoted causes even though the church as a whole was not ready for them, such as the organization of the General Conference, the educational program of the church, an English paper, etc. He was said to have been conscientious and painstaking in his pastoral work and always anxious to develop lay leadership. Shelly, Anthony S., was born on Feb. 28, 1853, in Milford Twp., Bucks Co., Pa., the third of the seven children of Levi and Barbara Shelly Shelly, who were members of the West Swamp Mennonite Church (GCM). He grew up during the leadership of John H. Oberholtzer and Andrew B. Shelly in the West Swamp Church.

Shelly enrolled for one year at the G.C.M. school in Wadsworth, Ohio, in 1870. After teaching in Pennsylvania two years he entered Millersville State Normal School in 1873, graduating in 1875. Again he taught two years in Pennsylvania and then taught English in the school at Wadsworth in 1877-79. Following a period of teaching in 1879-84 in Newtown, Bucks Co., Pa., he taught at the Mennonite Academy at Halstead, Kan., 1884-86. He then returned to Pennsylvania and became a partner in the newspaper business with U. S. Stauffer, his brother-in-law in Quakertown. He was married to Percilla S. Stauffer in 1875. They were parents of five children, three sons and two daughters. He began his ministry in Halstead, Kan. In 1886 he was given an evangelist's license by the Eastern District Conference and assisted Andrew B. Shelly in the West Swamp Church. He became pastor of the Hereford Mennonite Church, Bally, Pa., in 1890 and served there for 25 years. He was pastor of the Upper Milford Mennonite Church, near Zionsville, Pa., for 16 years, and the Menno Simons Mennonite Church, Boyertown, for 9 years, serving these churches concurrently with his pastorate at Bally. He was pastor of the Mennonite Church at Upland, Cal., for three years and the First Mennonite Church of Bluffton, Ohio, for two years. He was superintendent of the Bluffton hospital for one year. His final pastorate was at Germantown, Pa., where he was pastor for six years. He died on Jan. 5, 1928. The memorial services for him were held in the Germantown and West Swamp churches with the burial at West Swamp.

Shelly's conference activities were numerous. He was president of the General Conference Mennonite Church for five years, twice serving a two-year term and once a one-year term. For ten years, beginning in 1910, he was editor of the Mennonite. He was a member of both the Home Mission and Foreign Mission boards of the G.C.M. Church. In addition he was active in the Eastern District Conference program, serving on the Board of Managers of the Mennonite Home for the Aged at Frederick, Pa., for a number of years. He translated the Ris Confession into English. P.R.S.

Shelly Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, located one mile west of Richfield in Monroe Twp., Juniata Co., Pa., was built in 1800. Until 1815 it was also used as a school. One of the oldest cemeteries in the Valley is found here. Under George Leiter a schism occurred, both sides using this meetinghouse for 40 years, until Bishop Leiter returned to the Lancaster Conference. This necessitated a larger, brick meetinghouse in 1868. In connection with the Solomon Graybill schism in 1884 a historic bill in equity was initiated in the Juniata County courts to obtain the use of this church for the new group. In 1886 the General Conference Mennonites built a church on the edge of Richfield. The Mennonites (MC) used this church until larger meetinghouses were built at Cross Roads and Lauver, and a decade later regular services were discontinued. It serves as a home for the sewing circles of the Valley now.

Shenk, John M. (1848-1935), a bishop in the Ohio Mennonite (MC) Conference, was born in Hocking County, Ohio, Jan. 19, 1848. His grandfather, Jacob Shank, was born in Lancaster County, Pa., and moved to Rockingham County, Va. There his eldest son Henry, father of John M., was born. Henry Shank left Harrisonburg, and married Susanna, sister of John M. Brenneman (q.v.), whom they followed to Allen County, Ohio, about 1855. At the Salem Church (q.v.) at the age of nineteen John M. Shenk was baptized and at once took an active part in the Sunday school. At twenty-one he married Frances Good; ten of their eleven children grew to maturity. At Salem he was chosen by lot and ordained to the ministry in 1874 by George Brenneman, his bishop uncle. Ten years later he was ordained bishop by Abraham Shank of Virginia. From 1920 to 1927, when the Ohio Mennonite Conference merged with the Ohio and Eastern A.M. Conference, he was the only Mennonite bishop in the western half of the state. He was much interested in the missionary and charitable activities of the church. He seldom missed a meeting of General Conference or of the state conference and long worked for the union of the Amish Mennonite and Mennonite Conferences. J.S.U.

Sheridan Mennonite Church (MC), located in the city of Sheridan, Yamhill Co., Ore., about 35 miles from the Pacific Ocean, is a member of the Pacific Coast Conference. The church was organized in December 1923 with 35 charter members, as the outgrowth of a branch Sunday school started near McMinnville, Ore., by the Hopewell congregation of near Hubbard, Ore. The first ministers were Bishop Jacob D. Mishler and Daniel F. Shenk. In 1957 the membership was 302, with Gabriel D. Shank and Raymond Mishler as bishops, and Daniel F. Shenk, LeRoy Cowan, and Oscar Wideman as ministers.

Sherk (Sherrick, Scherch, Shirk, Schoerg, Shurk, Sharig), a Mennonite family name which has been traced to Sumiswald in the Emmenthal in the Swiss canton of Bern. As a result of persecutions in Switzerland members of the family moved first to the Palatinate; later some migrated to Pennsylvania. The family name is found today in Karlsruhe, Germany, and in Luxembourg as well as in the United States and Canada. The first of this name in America was Joseph Schoerg, who arrived in Philadelphia in 1727 and settled in Lancaster County, Pa. Others of Joseph Schoerg's family came in at various times up to 1747 and settled in Pennsylvania. Several descendants moved to Upper Canada (now Ontario) about 1799 and later. A grandson, also named Joseph Schoerg, was the first settler in what is now Waterloo County, the largest Mennonite settlement in Ontario. David Sherk (q.v.) was a leading minister (MC) in Waterloo County. The name occurs frequently in eastern Pennsylvania and in Ontario, and is found occasionally in Alberta and British Columbia and in Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, and other states. Records show the names of many members of this family who have served as missionaries, ministers, bishops, and in other capacities in Mennonite and other churches. Others were teachers, doctors, lawyers, businessmen, etc.

Sherk, David (1801-82), a leading Mennonite (MC) minister, was born in 1801, the fourth son and sixth child of Joseph Schoerg, who came to Waterloo County, Ont., in 1800, from Franklin County, Pa. David was married to Elizabeth Betzner (1811-94) in 1827. They had ten children. Two of his daughters were successively the wives of Jacob Gingerich (1840-1920), preacher of the Hagey and Wanner congregations. About 1837 David Sherk was ordained deacon for the Hagey Mennonite Church and the following year as minister for the three churches, Strasburg, Hagey, and Wanner. In his time he was considered one of the leading ministers of the Ontario Mennonite (MC) Conference. He was the author of Nonconformity to the World (72 pp., Elkhart, 1882). He died in 1882. J.C.F.

Sherkston Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, located in Bertie Twp., Welland Co., Ont., lay north of Lake Erie some 12 miles west of Buffalo. The deed was given in 1828 to the "Mennonite Society" by Samuel Sherk. No record exists of the nature of the building until a brick church was built in 1853. This was replaced by a cement block church in 1917. Ministers who served are George Zavitz, Christian Herschi, John Zavitz, Benjamin Hershey, Peter Sherk, John Hershey, Nelson Michael, Gilbert Bearss, Howard Stevanus, Noah Hunsberger, and Simon B. Martin. For about 20 years before the building of the church in 1917 the congregation was nearly extinct. With declining membership the church was sold to the Brethren in Christ ("Tunkers" in Canada), whose families dot the area (1931). This was a very early settlement of Mennonites in Ontario, Jacob Zavitz (Sevitz) having come from Lancaster County in 1788. A score of families may have been the extent of the Bertie settlement, with as many or more in Willoughby Township further north near Niagara Falls. Their activity in the Mennonite Conference of Ontario was apparently never very great. J.C.F.

Shetler, Samuel Grant (1871-1942), a prominent Mennonite (MC) evangelist and Bible teacher, was born Jan. 13, 1871. He was baptized Dec. 13, 1892, at the Stahl Mennonite Church, where he was ordained deacon in 1894 and minister in 1897. He was ordained bishop in 1915 at the Hopewell Mennonite Church near Hubbard, Ore., where he was temporarily residing and serving as pastor. He was an energetic promoter of summer Bible schools and in 1920 established the Johnstown Winter Bible School at the Stahl church in addition to promoting and teaching in various winter Bible schools (q.v.) in other parts of the church. He was widely used as an evangelist for many years, holding revival meetings in almost every section of the Mennonite Church (MC). In 1919 he served as moderator of the Mennonite General Conference; he also served in various offices in the Southwestern Pennsylvania Conference. H.S.B.

Shirati Mennonite Church, located about 30 miles north of Musoma, East Africa, along the Kenya-Tanganyika boundary, is in the Luo tribe. It is the oldest congregation of the Mennonite mission in East Africa. Mission work was begun at Shirati on May 26, 1934, by John H. Mosemann and Elam W. Stauffer. The church was begun on Sept. 15, 1935, when at the first baptism and communion services held, fifteen persons were baptized and six others received into fellowship, a total of twenty-one. The membership in 1956 was 511. John Mosemann had first pastoral oversight of the church until his furlough in 1939. The succeeding pastors have been J. Eby Leaman, Clinton Ferster, Noah Mack, Merle Eshleman, Elam W. Stauffer, and James Shank. In 1956 the ministers were J. Lester Eshleman, Robert G. Keener, and Zedekeia Marwa Kisare, with Simon W. Hurst as bishop. E.W.S.

Shirk's Mennonite Church, now extinct, located in Hanover Twp., Lebanon Co., Pa. The area was settled by the Dohner, Miller, Peiffer, Moyer, Getze, Hain, and other families. On Oct. 26, 1823, Peter and Barbara Sherrick deeded to Jacob Sherrick 73 perches for the building of an "Unparteyish Menist Gemeinhouse." After a few decades (1845), the United Brethren claimed most of the membership and the house for many years. Today it is still intact, a large unused unpainted frame house, a bleak reminder of a religious ancestry. A cemetery lies east of the church. I.D.L.

Shirk's Reformed Mennonite Church, located near Brownstown, Lancaster Co., Pa., is one of the 5 meetinghouses of the Reformed Mennonites in Lancaster County which are counted as one congregation, which had a total of 221 baptized members in 1958. The meetinghouse was built in 1889. H.S.B.

Shirksville Mennonite Church (MC), located 7 miles north of Lebanon, a member of the Lancaster Conference, is the oldest (founded 1740) and most northerly of Mennonite churches in Lebanon County, Pa. Caspar and Barbara Shirk moved from Chestnut Hill to the farm from which the site for the meetinghouse was taken. When the deed was given to Christian Newcomer, Peter Graff, Peter Wolf, and Christian Lentz in 1776, the meetinghouse was already erected and the cemetery ground provided. It served the congregation until the present frame church was built on the same site in 1895. Most of the original families have been lost to the church, but others have moved in, especially during the last decade; the membership in 1957 was 60, with Lester C. Shirk as minister. I.D.L.

Shisler Mennonite Church (MC), located in Humberstone Twp., Welland Co., Ont., is one of two points where the Mennonite Brethren in Christ worshiped in 1880-1900. The church was located a few miles west of the Sherkston Mennonite (MC) Church in Bertie Township and close to Lake Erie at Shisler's Point. The membership was small. Ministers from the Twenty, 40 miles north, usually supplied. Organized work was discontinued about 1900 and the church was disposed of to the Brethren in Christ (Tunkers). Since the Brethren bought the Sherkston (MC) church in 1931 the Shisler church has fallen into disuse. J.C.F.

Shoemaker, Joseph S. (1854-1936), an outstanding bishop in the Mennonite Church (MC), was born Feb. 1, 1854, at Philadelphia, Pa., but early located on a farm near Freeport (Dakota), Ill., where he spent his active life. He married Elizabeth Brubaker on Dec. 6, 1877. Among their 9 children were Charles B. Shoemaker of Scottdale, Pa., long an officer of the Mennonite Publishing House, and Stella (Mrs. A. E. Kreider). He was ordained preacher in 1892 and bishop in 1902. He was president of the Mennonite Board of Publication 1908-33, secretary of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities 1906-20, many times moderator of the Illinois Mennonite Conference, moderator of the Mennonite General Conference in 1905 and 1909, and a member of the Mennonite Board of Education 1903-20. He was publisher and a coeditor of the Church and Sunday School Hymnal (1902), writer of the section on the "Ministry" in the Christian Worker's Manual Vol. I (1915), author of The Ideal Christian Home (1925), and coauthor of Among Missions in the Orient and Observations by the Way (1912). He was a widely used evangelist, a great influence for unity and progress, and for many years one of the most widely known and beloved leaders in his denomination.† H.S.B.

Shope Mennonite Church (MC), located a few miles southeast of Harrisburg, Pa., one mile east of the Lancaster Pike at Steelton, was first called the Mumba Mennonite congregation, since they worshiped in Frederick Mumba's home. By 1815 a church-schoolhouse, 20 x 30 ft., of log with comb roof was erected, and later weatherboarded. It was replaced in 1873 by the present brick church. The cemetery was started in 1877 on the elevation. Bishop Nathaniel Shope was the first to be buried there. It is a part of the Strickler-Shope circuit of the Lancaster Conference, with communion at the Strickler church. The total membership in the circuit in 1957 was 87. Harry L. Longenecker was the minister at the Shope church. A separate Sunday school of 50 is maintained. (See Strickler.) I.D.L.

Shore Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the Indiana-Michigan Conference, is located one mile south and one mile east of Shipshewana, Lagrange Co., Ind., on State Road 20 near Shore Lake. In the early 1860's church services were held in a barn or homes of members. A few years later a schoolhouse was used for services. At this time the name Shore was given to the small village, the school, and the lake. The members residing in this community held membership with the Clinton Brick Mennonite Church, and many years after the church was organized the ministers served both congregations. In 1874 a site was donated by William Wiler, and a church 30 x 40 ft. was built on the west side of Shore Lake. The membership then was about 200. In 1893 this building was moved across the road and enlarged; it was replaced by a new church in 1929.

Some of the early ministers who served at the Shore Mennonite Church were John Nusbaum, Henry A. Miller, and J. J. Weaver (who preached in English), P. Y. Lehman, James J. Mishler, John Garber, and P. J. Miller. In 1957 the bishop was Lee J. Miller (ordained 1945), and Josiah J. Miller and Percy J. Miller (ordained 1933) the ministers. The membership was 333. V.C.

Showalter (Schowalter), a Mennonite family name of Swiss origin found in the Palatinate and across the border in Alsace, chiefly at Deutschhof, Kaplaneihof, Schafbusch, and Geisberg. In 1717 a Bernard Schowalter lived at Lambsheim, Palatinate. About 1720 a Johannes Schowalter was living at Geisberg and a Peter Schowalter at Schafbusch. In 1740 a Christian Schowalter lived at Mechtersheimerhof. About 1750 a Jakob (Christian Schowalter) came to the Haftelhof. In 1787 a Joseph Schowalter of Klein-Bunderbach near Zweibrücken purchased the Kaplaneihof, where there are still four Schowalter families. In 1794 Jakob Schowalter purchased part of the Deutschhof. Pastors Otto Schowalter of Hamburg and Paul Schowalter of Weierhof stem from the latter two communities. In 1936 Schowalter, with 98 persons, was the third most common name in the Mennonite congregations of the Palatinate, exceeded only by Krehbiel and Stauffer. The chief congregations with numerous Schowalters were Deutschhof-Geisberg (24), Monsheim-Obersülzen (20), Neudorferhof (17), and Ludwigshafen (8).

Christian Schowalter (q.v.; 1828-1907), a prominent minister and leader in the formation of the General Conference Mennonite Church in the 1860's, pastor at Donnellson, Iowa, 1861-1907, came from Assenheim in the Palatinate to America in 1850. Jacob A. Schowalter (1879-1953), a G.C.M. layman of Halstead and Newton, Kan., born at Friedelsheim in the Palatinate, came to Kansas in 1883, served in the Kansas State Legislature 1934-38, and established upon his death the J. A. Schowalter Foundation, a charitable trust for Mennonite purposes, with assets of some $1,200,000.

In 1750 five Schowalters arrived on the Brotherhood at Philadelphia—Jacob Sr., Jacob, John, Christian, and Peter. By 1759 Jacob Sr., John, and Joseph owned land in Whitehall Twp., Northampton Co., Pa., Jacob Sr. being a leader in the newly established Siegfried (q.v.) (MC) congregation. The removal of John, Joseph, and Jacob (Jr.?) in 1771 to other places was a severe blow to the congregation, which soon died out. Of Jacob Sr.'s eight sons, Christian Showalter moved to Lancaster County, Peter and Jacob Showalter died in Bucks County, John and Joseph Showalter in Chester County, Pa., while three, Daniel, Valentine, and Ulrich Showalter, moved to Rockingham County, Va. Three Showalters were preachers in Chester County, Pa., Joseph (d. c1802) at Charlestown (MC) and John and Daniel (d. 1840) at Phoenixville (MC). In 1824 David was a trustee at Charlestown. Additional immigrants were John (1744) and Christian (1764) Showalter. The original Showalters have apparently died out in Eastern Pennsylvania.

In 1788 Daniel Showalter, apparently ancestor of most of the Virginia Mennonite Showalters and the few MC families by this name living farther west, settled near Broadway, in Rockingham County, Va. Among his descendants are an unusual number of Mennonite ministers. Serving the Northern District churches in the Shenandoah Valley were his son Daniel (1802-89) Showalter and the latter's grandson, George B. Showalter (1859-1931). Four of George's sons have served in the same area: Bishop Timothy Showalter (1887-1957), G. Paul Showalter (1890-), Lewis P. Showalter (1890-), and Mark Showalter (1891-), and a daughter, Elizabeth Showalter, serves as editor at the Mennonite Publishing House at Scottdale, Pa. Three grandsons of George B. Showalter are also Mennonite ministers: Elmer Showalter at Lebanon, Pa., Omar Showalter at Pipersville, Pa., and Paul Showalter at Wooster, Ohio. A great-grandson of the first Daniel, Earl Showalter (1890-), served at La Junta, Col., and elsewhere. A younger descendant, Richard L. Showalter, served at Perryton, Tex. Mary Emma Showalter, a great-granddaughter of the first Daniel and a daughter of Howard D. H. Showalter, is professor at Eastern Mennonite College, and Amos M. Showalter, a great-grandson of Daniel and son of Cyrus who moved from Virginia to Kansas in 1910, is professor at Madison College, both of Harrisonburg, Va. H.S.B.

Shroud, in Mennonite circles a white gown in which the dead are buried, which was made over a specified pattern. In the 19th century its use was probably universal in the Mennonite Church (MC). The more conservative areas of the Mennonite Church (MC) such as the Franconia Conference still make some use of the shroud, and such groups as the Wisler Mennonites still use it as a general practice. Funeral directors have each shroud made to order.

Mennonite funerals tend to be somewhat differentiated from general Christian practice in various respects. Earlier this meant the use of a coffin rather than a casket, the coffin being tapered gently from the shoulder point toward both ends, while the casket was completely rectangular; the body was clothed in a shroud rather than in conventional dress; there was congregational singing rather than special music; no flowers were brought to the meetinghouse; the body was viewed outside the meetinghouse; and burial occurred before the memorial service was held. By the mid-20th century many of these distinctive practices had been lost except in the more conservative groups, and in the more conservative areas of the Mennonite Church (MC). (See also Funeral Customs.) J.C.W.

Siberia, a part of Northern Asia and of the RSFSR of the Soviet Union, lying between the Ural Mountains and the Pacific Ocean, consists of one third of the Asiatic continent, 4,887,223 sq. miles, with a population of 30,000,000 (1956). It comprises seventeen divisions of the RSFSR, some of which are regions, some territories, some republics. The following are the most significant of them from the west to east: Perm, Tyumen, Sverdlovsk, Chelyabinsk, Kurgan, Omsk, Novosibirsk, Altai, Tomsk, Kemerovo, Krasnoyarsk, Irkutsk, Chita, Maritime Territory, Khabarovsk. Old Mennonite settlements are located in the Omsk (see Omsk Mennonite settlement) and Altai (see Slavgorod Mennonite settlement) regions. The Semipalatinsk region of the Kazakh SSR, now Soviet Central Asia (q.v.), was formerly also considered a part of Siberia, in which the Pavlodar Mennonite settlement (q.v.) is located.

Today Mennonites can be found in almost all of the regions, territories, and republics of Siberia. Exile and evacuation from the Mennonite settlements of European Russia, particularly the Ukraine (q.v.), have scattered them over the older Mennonite settlements in Siberia as well as in most of the other regions and territories.

1. Opening Siberia. During the 14th century a Tatar kingdom called Sibir was located on the Irtysh River in Siberia. The Cossack Yermak subdued the Tatars in 1582, and Tobolsk became the capital of the established government. By 1875 the Russians had occupied all of Siberia including the island of Sakhalin and in the 1890's the Trans-Siberian railroad was built, reaching Vladivostok. Previous to that time, Russian population had been moved into Siberia, some of whom were political and religious exiles. With the coming of the railroad and a systematic plan of the government to populate this vast territory, Russian population, particularly from the Ukraine, was attracted by generous offers from the government. The Mennonites were among the first to follow this invitation and to establish daughter settlements in Siberia. As early as 1860, however, Martin Riediger and Bernhard Warkentin had made a trip to the Amur region, now Khabarovsk, in order to investigate settlement possibilities. At that time Crimea was opened for settlement, and as a result nothing came of the plans to settle in the Far East.

The first Mennonite to settle in Siberia was Peter J. Wiens from Schönau, Molotschna, who established a business enterprise in agricultural machinery in the city of Omsk (q.v.) in 1897. Others followed from the various settlements and established themselves along the Trans-Siberian railroad between Petropavlovsk (q.v.) and Omsk (q.v.). This settlement became known as the Omsk Mennonite settlement (q.v.).

2. Old Mennonite Settlements. In 1906 official announcements were made by the government about the availability of land in Siberia. A delegation representing the settlements of Zagradovka, Ufa, Samara, and Orenburg was sent to the Kulundian Steppes between the Irtysh and the Ob rivers in the Omsk region to investigate the land. They made a trip to Barnaul (q.v.) and some even continued the journey again to investigate the Amur region. They found the land near Barnaul more suitable. In 1910 the city of Slavgorod (q.v.) was established here and the settlement became known as Slavgorod Mennonite settlement (q.v.). The delegates reserved 58,441 acres of land for 1,443 persons, with the following privileges: (1) reduced fare; (2) exemption from taxes for five years; (3) exemption from governmental services for three years; (4) loan of 160 rubles and a credit of 160 rubles. The land was free of charge.

In 1908 the settlement consisting of 59 villages on some 135,000 acres was finally established. The cities of Kameny and Pavlodar (q.v.) were each about 130 miles from the settlement. The city of Slavgorod (q.v.) was ten miles away and became the Mennonite business center. Barnaul was 250 miles away on the Ob River. Many of the non-Mennonite Germans and also Ukrainians settled on the Kulundian Steppes (see Barnaul Mennonite Settlement and Slavgorod Mennonite Settlement).

The Pavlodar Mennonite settlement (q.v.) was started in 1906 near the Irtysh River, some 15 miles from the city of Pavlodar which was later connected with the Trans-Siberian railroad to the north. The settlement consisted of 12 villages. The city of Pavlodar (q.v.) had a number of Mennonite enterprises. Under the Soviet regime the villages of the Pavlodar settlement became a part of Kazakh SSR in Soviet Central Asia (q.v.).

The Minusinsk Mennonite settlement in the Province of Yenisei (now Krasnoyarsk Territory) was established in 1913, consisting of two villages, Rozovka and Krasnovka. During the Revolution of 1917 this settlement suffered so severely that it was gradually dissolved (see Yenisei).

The latest Mennonite settlement voluntarily established was the one in the Amur (q.v.) region in 1927. From here many Mennonites moved to Harbin (q.v.) in 1929 and later, from where they proceeded to the United States and South America. Of significance is also the Ob Mission (q.v.) established in northern Siberia c1926.

3. Mennonite Exiles and Evacuees in Siberia. Thus far the story of Mennonite settlements established voluntarily has been related. The most recent chapter deals with the information pertaining to Mennonite movements to Siberia under the Soviet government mostly because of exile, forced labor (q.v.), and the evacuation from the Ukraine, a practice introduced by Stalin. At that time thousands of men were exiled to northern parts of European Russia (see Vologda) and also Siberia and Soviet Central Asia (q.v.).

This forced movement of the Mennonites to Siberia occurred primarily during the years 1931-32 and 1937-38, at the outbreak of World War II (1941), and again later when Mennonites who had been evacuated from the Ukraine by the German army were repatriated by the Soviet army (1945-46). It is estimated that 25,000 Mennonites were returned from Germany to Soviet Russia, many of whom were sent to Siberia.

How many Mennonites have been exiled and evacuated from European Russia and how many of them are located in Siberia? No exact answer is possible to this question. There were some 100,000 Mennonites in Russia when the German army invaded the Ukraine (1941). We proceed with the assumption that approximately one fifth, that is, 20,000, had been exiled by that time. The German invasion of the Ukraine was the reason for an evacuation of all people of German background. Stalin succeeded in evacuating a large percentage of the Mennonite population of the settlements which were close to the front. This involved about one fourth of the total population making it about 25,000. Some 35,000 were taken along by the retreating Germans in 1943 of which the Red army repatriated nearly 25,000 who were sent primarily beyond the Ural Mountains into Asiatic Russia including Siberia. This makes 70,000 uprooted or exiled and evacuated Mennonites out of a total population of 100,000. Of these remaining 30,000 some 6,000 are found in the Orenburg settlement (q.v.) and some 4,000 in the Pleshanovo settlement (q.v.), which are the two major settlements of European Russia which were not completely disintegrated and uprooted during the war. The remaining 20,000 Mennonites who stayed in their homes and settlements are found in the Slavgorod (q.v.), Omsk (q.v.), Pavlodar (q.v.), and Amur (q.v.) settlements of Siberia. According to these figures 30,000 Mennonites are still in their former homes and 70,000 are living in dispersion.

We proceed with the assumption that of these 70,000 Mennonites no longer living in their home communities some 20,000 live in European Russia particularly in the Vologda (q.v.) and Arkhangelsk regions from which they were exiled but also in many other parts of Russia particularly since many have obtained permission to move about more freely. Some have even returned to their former homes. Adding to this number the 7,500 who have remained in their communities it can be assumed that there are some 27,500 in European Russia.

Of the remaining 50,000 Mennonites who have lost their homes we can assume that half are in Siberia and half in Soviet Central Asia (q.v.). Many of these Mennonites who have come to Siberia under the Soviet government have found their way to the Mennonite settlements of Slavgorod (q.v.), Omsk (q.v.), and Pavlodar (q.v.). Most of them, however, are located in regions in which until recently no Mennonites were found. A great number are found in the regions of Perm (formerly Molotov), Tyumen (q.v.), Sverdlovsk (q.v.), Chelyabinsk (q.v.), Akmolinsk, Aktyubinsk, Kurgan, Novosibirsk (q.v.), Altai, Tomsk (q.v.), Karaganda, Alma Ata, Stalinabad, Tashkent, Frunze, and other industrialized areas in the far south of Central Asia.

What do the Mennonites do and how do they live in these areas? Those who were exiled mostly worked in mines in the Ural Mountains, forestry, railroad and other building projects, and agricultural units. Living conditions were extremely difficult and many thousands perished. The complete record is not available and what is available has not been investigated and systematically used. Of the 76 labor camps in Asiatic Russia listed by Dallin and Nicolaevsky 68 were located in Siberia, many in the Ural Mountain area. Even if the inhabitant of a camp survived the 10-20 years of slave labor his record did not permit him to move freely. Since 1955-56 changes have come about. This is clearly recorded in the correspondence coming from Russia, and was reported by Bender and Wiens as a result of their trip to Russia in 1956. Many leave their place of labor and move to other places in order to improve their living conditions and above all in order to unite with their family members and relatives. A considerable number now live in and around Karaganda.

The fate of the evacuees of 1941 and those repatriated by the Red army in 1945-47 was probably not as severe as that of the exiles, nevertheless they too have endured severe hardships during the last ten years. But their conditions also seem to have been improved. According to a recent study made of letters the Mennonites are located in rural areas as well as in large cities. They follow almost any occupation. They are tractorists on collective farms, students in agricultural and medical schools, workers in factories, engineers, etc. The children attend public schools and are often unable to speak German except some Low German. Inter-marriages with non-Mennonites are frequent, although not as frequent as one could expect after all the movements and shifts of the population. The general revival of interest in religious life is noticeable in Siberia as at other places.

4. Bibliographical Information. Siberia is "a dark chapter" in Mennonite research. The settlements originated just before World War II and were far removed from the cultural centers of the Mennonites in the Ukraine. Occasional reports or letters are the major sources of information. P. M. Friesen (Mennonitische Bruderschaft, 1911) contains little information about the settlements in Siberia. Some information is contained in the annual reports (Jahresbericht) of the forestry service in Russia compiled for taxing Mennonite property. The almanacs, such as Mennonitisches Jahrbuch, edited by H. Dirks and D. H. Epp (see 1913), Christlicher Familienkalender, edited by A. Kröker, and the Haus- und Landwirtschafts-Kalender (Odessa) contain lists of villages and other statistical information up to 1914.

The two periodicals, Der Botschafter and Die Friedensstimme, contain announcements about the planned settlements in Siberia, the movements of the Mennonites to Siberia, the beginning and pioneer experiences, and the developments up to the time that the papers ceased publication during World War I. After the Russian Revolution, the Siberian Mennonite settlements were in touch with the Allrussischer Mennonitischer Landwirtschaftlicher Verein and were visited by representatives of this organization and reported regularly. These reports have been preserved in the A. A. Friesen Collection of the Bethel College Historical Library and some were published in Der Praktische Landwirt (q.v.). The reports about the cultural life and religious activities, such as song festivals, baptismal services, visits by ministers from other Mennonite settlements, appeared regularly in Unser Blatt (q.v.) from 1926 on, which was discontinued in 1928. From there on, there was silence. Otto Auhagen published some letters from Siberia in Die Schicksalswende des russlanddeutschen Bauerntums in den Jahren 1927-1930 (Leipzig, 1942).

Of some significance are scattered reports written by non-Mennonites. Jakob Stach, who was serving the Lutheran churches of Slavgorod, Pavlodar, etc., immediately after the Russian Revolution, reported about it in his books, Meine Feuertaufe (St. Gallen, 1924) and Das Deutschtum in Sibirien, . . . bis in die Gegenwart: Geschichte und Selbsterlebtes (Stuttgart, 1939). The novelist Edwin Erich Dwinger, in his Zwischen Weiss und Rot (Jena, 1930) (reportage), relates that the retreating White army stayed overnight in one of the Mennonite villages which he describes vividly. The cultural life of the Mennonites of the Slavgorod Mennonite settlement is described in greater detail in the novel Beata (Heilbronn, 1935) by Ernst Behrends. In this book Jürgen, a German soldier, who became a prisoner of war and was sent to Siberia, met Daniel Hooze of Rheinfeld, who took him home to his parents, where he fell in love with Daniel's sister Beata. However, Jürgen returned to Germany and Beata married someone else. Later Jürgen met her, a widow with three children, in the refugee camp in Mölln, Germany. This novel describes in a sympathetic and accurate way the cultural traits of the Mennonites of Slavgorod.

Of descriptive nature is H. Anger, Die Deutschen in Sibirien. Reise durch die deutschen Dörfer Westsibiriens (Berlin and Königsberg, 1930), who presents valuable information about the German settlements including the Mennonites. Walter Quiring in "Die russlanddeutschen Flüchtlinge in China" (in Der Wanderweg der Russlanddeutschen, Stuttgart, 1939) relates the story of the escape of the Mennonites of the Amur settlement to Harbin, China. The story of the Amur (q.v.) settlement has been related in greater detail by A. Loewen and A. Friesen, Die Flucht über den Amur (Steinbach, 1946).

The first attempt to present the story of the Mennonites in Siberia in general was made by J. J. Hildebrand in Sibirien (Winnipeg, 1952). His book is subdivided into two parts, the first one dealing with Siberia in general and the Mennonite settlements of Omsk (q.v.) and Slavgorod (q.v.), and the second part specifically with the Mennonite group under the leadership of Hermann Peters known as Apostolische Brüdergemeinde (q.v.), which is the most detailed account found anywhere on this subject. This part also contains the author's account of his effort in trying to help young men of Siberia establish the status of conscientious objectors to war during the years following the Revolution.

The most recent book dealing with the Mennonites of Siberia was compiled and edited by Gerhard Fast under the title In den Steppen Sibiriens (Rosthern, 1957). Numerous accounts of eyewitnesses and participants in the early settlements in Slavgorod were collected and edited which contain more information on this subject than any other source. The Omsk, Pavlodar, and Amur settlements are sketched only briefly.

Many hundreds of letters have been published in Der Bote (Rosthern) and Mennonitische Rundschau (Winnipeg). Virginia Claassen, Peter Neufeld, and Vern Q. Preheim, in a Mennonite Seminar of Bethel College under the direction of Cornelius Krahn (1947), checked this correspondence and prepared an alphabetical index including names, locations, economic, cultural, religious, and occupational conditions, etc., of the Mennonites of Russia as portrayed in the correspondence. The findings were presented in "Glimpses of Mennonites in Russia 1948-57." To a large extent, this information which originated in Siberia and Soviet Central Asia was made use of in this and other articles written for this ENCYCLOPEDIA.

The only eyewitness who has visited a part of the Mennonite settlements of Siberia (Slavgorod) since World War II is Klaus Mehnert, who gave illustrated accounts in Christ und Welt (Stuttgart, June 21, 1956), Quick (Munich, July 7, 1956), and Bote (Sept. 5, 12, 19, and 26, 1956).

The account of the relief activities among the Mennonites of Slavgorod was presented by Alvin J. Miller in Feeding the Hungry (Scottsdale, 1929, p. 312 ff.). M. B. Fast reported about his visit in Siberia in Geschichtlicher Bericht . . . (Reedley, 1919). The best studies on forced labor and concentration camps in Siberia and other parts of Russia are those by David J. Dallin and B. I. Nicolaevsky, Forced Labor in Soviet Russia (New Haven, 1947), and B. Yakovlev, Concentration Camps in U.S.S.R. (Munich, 1955). Siberia in general is treated by Juri Semjonow in Sibirien, Eroberung und Erschliessung der wirtschaftlichen Schatzkammer des Ostens (Berlin, 1954), which presents a very valuable bibliography, and by Donald W. Treadgold in The Great Siberian Migration (Princeton University Press, 1957). C.K.

Sibes, Jan, surnamed Pot(te)backer, was an elder of the Mennonite congregation of Harlingen in Friesland, Netherlands, in the 17th century. Concerning this elder there is not much information. He may have been identical with the Jan Sybesz who was a member of the Glückstadt (q.v.) Mennonite congregation in 1633. Sibes often preached in the congregation of Hamburg-Altona; in 1676 he there ordained Ocke Pieters as a preacher. In the same year during a trip of 42 days with Elder Gerhard (Gerrit) Roosen (q.v.) of Hamburg he visited a number of congregations in West Prussia, preaching and baptizing in Orloff, Nieschewski, Montau, Kasou(?), Lunau, Markushof, and Danzig. Maatschoen (q.v.) mentions a poem by Jan Sibes written in Danzig, which describes their trip and was published by Roosen, but is lost. voZ.

Sibrandt Sibrandtszoon, a revolutionary Anabaptist, was arrested at the Oldeklooster (q.v.) on April 7, 1535, and executed at Leeuwarden one week later. (K. Vos, Menno Simons, Leiden, 1914, 229.) voZ.

Sibrant Smit, of whom there is little information, was in the last decades of the 16th century an elder of the Flemish Mennonites together with Hans de Wever (Hans Busschaert), Jacob Pieters van der Meulen, Pieter van Coelen, and others. It is said that Smit took a less strict and more tolerant attitude as to the practice of banning, and was therefore banned by the other Flemish elders. He is also said to have founded a special branch of Mennonites, of which however nothing further is known. Nor is it known where he served. This information is found in V.P., Successio Anabaptistica, printed in 1603 at Cologne, Germany, and reprinted in Bibliotheca Reformatoria Neerlandica VII. (BRN VII, 69.) voZ.

Sichar Mennonite Church (GCM), now extinct, located at Cordell, Okla., was organized on April 14, 1896, with the help of Elder Jacob Toews of Newton, Kan., by a group of Mennonite settlers who withdrew from the Bergthal Mennonite Church (q.v.). The first minister was Peter Pankratz. In 1896 Michael Klaassen was ordained minister. The first services were held in a schoolhouse. In 1897 a church located on the Jacob Janzen farm was dedicated. In 1899 the congregation divided, the part called the Herold Mennonite Church (q.v.) obtaining possession of the church building. The other group, under the name Sichar Mennonite Church, in 1900 erected a new church building 2½ miles south of the Herold church. Gradually members began to affiliate with the near-by Herold Mennonite Church. During November 1947 the church agreed to dissolve. C.K.

Sichem, van, a Roman Catholic family of Dutch artists, particularly engravers, who for four generations made and published a large number of engravings both as illustrations for books and as loose pictures. Christoffel van Sichem, called "de Oude" (1546-1624), of Amsterdam, who lived at Basel, Switzerland, for a few years, published at Amsterdam in 1606 a number of loose sheets, most of them drawn and engraved by himself, on which were pictured a number of "Anabaptists" such as Jan van Leyden, David Joris, and Knipperdolling. Beneath each picture was a biographical sketch. In 1608 these pictures, augmented with some new ones, were published in book form, entitled Historische Beschreibung unnd abbildunge der fürnembste Haupt-Ketzer so . . . für Schwärmer unnd irige gaister verbannt . . . seind, durch C.V.S.A., zu Amstelredam Bey Cornelis Niclausz, 1608. This book contains the following seventeen pictures: Bishop Arius, Lodewyck Hetzer, Johannes Hut, Johan Matthis von Haarlem, Johan Böckelsz von Leyden, Melchior Hoffman, Michael Servetus, Adam Pastor, David Görgen (i.e., David Joris), Hendrick Niclaus, Balthasar Hubmor (i.e., Hubmaier) von Fridberg, Herman Schoenmaker op 't Sant, Bernhard Knipperdollinck, Dietrich Schneyder Adamyt (see Dirck Jansson), Melchior Rinck, Thomas Muncer (i.e., Müntzer), and Machomet den Aertsketter. All these pictures have a letterpress in the German language. Another Dutch edition with the same seventeen pictures is titled Historische beschrijvinge . . . (Amsterdam, 1608). The Latin version has the title Iconia et Historica descriptio praecipuorum haeresiarum . . . (Arnhem, 1609). There may have been other editions; as late as 1677 Het Tooneel der Hooft-Ketteren, bestaande in verscheide Afbeeldsels van Valsche Propheten, Naacht-Loopers . . . in't Koper gesneden door C.V. Sichem appeared at Middelburg. This is an enlarged edition, containing in addition to the former seventeen pictures also pictures of Menno Simons (the familiar picture!), Doctor Faustus, Christoffel Wagenaar (Wagner), and Broer Cornelis van Dordrecht, "prediker tot Brugge" (i.e., Cornelis Adriaensz, q.v.).

Greuel der vornehmsten Haupt-Ketzeren, so wohl Wiedertaufer als auch andern (Leiden, 1608), and its Dutch version, Grouwelen der voornaemster Hooft-ketteren, of which the first known edition was published 1623 at Leiden, contain a number of pictures, for which probably the van Sichem engravings were used, but they are all altered and aesthetically less satisfying; moreover the reviser did slovenly work. The person representing Thomas Müntzer, for instance, is the one who in the original van Sichem editions is indicated as Jan Matthys. The Dutch Grouwelen has only nine of the seventeen pictures.

The historical verisimilitude of the pictures by van Sichem is probably not too great, though it is possible, even probable, that the author occasionally used old pictures. voZ.

Sicily Mennonite Mission (MC) was established in 1942 under the Virginia Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. The work developed out of early contacts with MCC workers and visits by Mennonite ministers and others from America. There have never been any permanently stationed American workers; the work has been self-propagating and by 1957 had 82 members, all living in Palermo, where a congregation has been established with national leadership. Truman Brunk has bishop oversight.

Sicke Freerks (Frerichs, Frerickx; also called Sicke Snyder), an Anabaptist martyr, who was beheaded March 20, 1531, at Leeuwarden, Dutch province of Friesland. Menno Simons writes, "Afterwards it happened, before I had ever heard of the existence of brethren, that a God-fearing, pious man, named Sicke Snyder, was beheaded at Leeuwarden, for being rebaptized. It sounded strange to me to hear a second baptism spoken of. I examined the Scriptures assiduously and meditated on them earnestly, but could find nothing in them concerning infant baptism." Van Braght's account of the execution in the Martyrs' Mirror contains several errors; the date is 1531 instead of 1533 as he has it; nor does Reitsma, who has examined the relevant archives, know anything of the torture van Braght mentions.

Early in 1531 Sicke Freerks, an honest and quiet tailor of Leeuwarden, was accused of heresy and given a trial. In the cross-examination it was revealed that he not only confessed Protestant doctrine, but considered faith a prerequisite for baptism. Two weeks before Christmas he had confessed his faith and been baptized at Emden.

Because he persisted in his faith he was condemned to death by the court of Friesland. He was beheaded; his body was tied to the wheel and his head put on a pole. Sicke was the first Anabaptist martyr in the Netherlands. The execution was publicly performed and made a deep impression. A drummer among the soldiers, who was a friend of Sicke's, began a tirade against Catholicism and had to flee. His wife Hadewyck (q.v.) later became an Anabaptist and was imprisoned with Elisabeth Dirks (q.v.), but managed to escape.

Through his preaching Sicke Freerks founded a small circle of Anabaptists, who were adherents of Melchior Hofmann's (q.v.) doctrine, peacefully awaiting the return of Christ, and hoped that in 1534 the New Jerusalem would be established. They called themselves Bondgenooten (q.v.; i.e., Covenanters). Prominent leaders emerged from this circle, including Obbe Philips (q.v.) and Dirk Philips (q.v.). About January 1534 Pieter de Houtzager (q.v.), the emissary of Jan Matthijsz of Haarlem, led a number of this circle into fanaticism; Obbe and Dirk Philips rejected Houtzager's proposals. The followers of Obbe were called Obbenites. This was the group that Menno Simons joined in January 1536.

Sicke Freerks was obviously a convert of Melchior Hofmann's, as well as Jan Volkertsz Trypmaker (q.v.) of Hoorn, who was baptized at Emden, Nov. 15, 1530, and was sent to preach in Amsterdam and North Holland. Sicke was presumably baptized by Trypmaker and sent out to Leeuwarden to spread the new faith there.

Siegenbeek, Matthijs (b. June 23, 1774, at Amsterdam, d. Nov. 26, 1854, at Leiden), a Dutch Mennonite pastor and scholar, studied at the Mennonite Theological Seminary at Amsterdam and became a ministerial candidate in 1795. Accepting a call of the Mennonite congregation of Dokkum (q.v.) in Friesland, he served here from March 1796 until July 1797. He then left Dokkum where soon after his departure the Mennonites and Remonstrants (q.v.)—very probably not without Siegenbeek's influence—merged as the "United Christian Congregation." Siegenbeek moved to Leiden, where he had accepted a professorship in Dutch elocution at the University. In 1799 he taught also the Dutch language and literature and from 1815 also national Dutch history. He published a number of literary books and papers. His project for better spelling of the Dutch language (spelling-Siegenbeek) was accepted by the government in 1804. Siegenbeek gave much energy to the Association for Dutch Literature (Maatschappij der Nederlandsche Letterkunde), of which he was secretary 1803-22, and president 1822-47.

At the same time Siegenbeek gave much of his time and his care to the Mennonite brotherhood. In 1804-29 he served the congregation of Leiden as an assistant pastor, in 1814-45 he was a trustee of the A.D.S. (Dutch General Mennonite Conference), several times its president and also a curator of its seminary 1814-45. Even after his death his love for the seminary was shown by an important bequest for the purpose of rewarding prominent students.

In Archief voor Kerkgeschiedenis (VI, 1835, 203-24) Siegenbeek published a paper, "Over hetgeen het kerkenootschap der doopsgezinden in de laatste vijftig jaren tot verspreiding van redelijke Gods-kennis, handhaving van het zuiver Christendom en verbetering van de predikwijze heeft toegebracht." In 1808-10 he was active in behalf of a new Mennonite hymnal, forming a committee with P. Beets, J. van Geuns, and J. de Vries, which prepared the edition of Uitgezochte Liederen (q.v.) in 1810.

Matthijs Siegenbeek married Geertuida Tieboel, of Dokkum. They had two sons, both born at Leiden on Feb. 23, 1806, but one of them soon died. The other, Daniel, bearing the family name of Tieboel Siegenbeek (d. Jan. 11, 1866, at Leiden), studied literature and law at the University of Leiden and became a lawyer in his home town; in 1858-66 he was burgomaster of Leiden. He married Elizabeth van Heukelom, and served as a deacon in the Leiden congregation 1838-65. He sponsored his cousin Daniel van Heukelom (1850-1900), who adopted his family name and was called Daniel Eliza Siegenbeek van Heukelom; he was a medical professor at the University of Leiden and served the Leiden congregation as deacon 1874-76 and from 1886 until his death. Matthijs Siegenbeek was commemorated in a funeral sermon by Christian Sepp (q.v.); Samuel Muller published an obituary notice for the Dutch Association for Literature. vdZ.

Siegfried Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, called "Lehay" (Lehigh) in the letter written by the Franconia bishops to Holland in 1773, was located on what is now Twenty-first Street, Northampton, Pa. Common names in the congregation were Showalter, Basler, Funk, Ziegler, Hiestand, Landis, and Siegfried. The log meetinghouse was built about 1760. The land for the cemetery was conveyed to four trustees in 1770: Joseph Showalter, Henry Funk, Peter Fried, and Jacob Baer. In 1802 the congregation built the Settlement meetinghouse (q.v.) and the Siegfried church building and cemetery were abandoned. In 1829 Jacob Funk, a survivor of the Siegfried congregation, was legally empowered to sell the remaining unused portion of the cemetery lot. A stone wall was built around the cemetery, which contained almost one hundred graves. In 1885 Tilghman Seiple, a grandson of Henry Funk, raised money by popular subscription to put an iron fence around the cemetery. Later the cemetery was filled in and all but two headstones were covered. It is traditional that the services of the Siegfried congregation were sometimes disturbed by Indians. J.C.W.

Siemelink, Tjaard Hendrik (1864-1928), married to G. Gaastra, a Dutch Mennonite pastor, serving at Workum 1890-1908 and at Vlissingen-Goes 1908-27.

He was well versed in Mennonite history and published a painstaking study on the history of the Mennonites at Workum in Doopsgezinde Bijdragen 1899, 1903, and 1905. He further published a sermon in commemoration of the second centennial of the Workum meetinghouse (Workum, n.d.-1895) and Het beginsel der Hervorming en de opkomst der Doopsgezinden (booklets published by the Committee for the Mennonites in the Diaspora, Nos. 45, 48, and 49; Amsterdam, n.d.). Siemens (Simons, Simon, Siemen, Ziemens) is a family name originating among the Mennonites of Prussia and Danzig which was transplanted to Russia and America. One of the earliest records of the name is found in the church record of Danzig (1665). The name was common in Elbing, Königsberg, Tiengenhausen, Rosenort, Fürstenwerder, and Tragheimerweide. The name was presumably derived from Simon. It is a common German name. Among the Russian Mennonites B. H. Unruh lists as ministers Franz Siemens, George Siemens, Peter Siemens; and A. A. Töws names D. J. Siemens. Jan Siemen was one of the first Germantown settlers. J. Siemens had a large flour mill at Nikopol, Ukraine, and another J. Siemens was Oberschulze at Fernheim, Chaco. J. G. Rempel lists as ministers (GCM) J. J. Siemens, a minister in Winkler, Man., Gerhard Siemens, and F. F. Siemens. Rubin L. Siemens is a minister (GCM) at Ransom, Kan. Nikolai Siemens is a leader among the Mennonites of Paraguay, and was long editor of the Menno-Blatt. J. J. Siemens was a business leader of Altona, Man. C.K.

Siemens, Gerhard, an elder of Naumenko Mennonite Brethren Church (q.v.), Russia, from 1903 until he went to North America in 1905. Upon his return to Russia in 1907 he continued as elder of the church at least as late as 1910. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 450-51.) C.K.

Siemens, Nikolai (1895-1958), a leader of the Mennonites in the Fernheim Colony, Paraguay, was born March 15, 1895, in Johannesfeld in the Crimea, South Russia, died Sept. 24, 1958, in Fernheim. In 1910 his family moved to Smolyanovka, Omsk district, Siberia, where he was baptized at 15 in the M.B. Church and early chosen as preacher. In 1923-25 he attended the Bible School at Tchongrav, Crimea, and the following year the Orenburg Bible School, after which he returned to Smolyanovka to become leader of the M.B. congregation there. In 1929 he emigrated to Paraguay and settled in Fernheim in 1930. Here he became editor of the Menno-Blatt, which he edited and published for 25 years. He served for varying periods on the KfK (q.v.), on the Missions Committee, and as director and teacher of the traveling Bible school, the forerunner of the Fernheim Bible School. He was the guide and teacher of many young ministers, was active in youth work, was a warm advocate in inter-Mennonite co-operation, and a loyal and firm supporter of Fernheim Colony. Sieswerdus Klerick (erroneously sometimes Kurick), a schoolteacher in Geldern, Rhineland, Germany, was an Anabaptist leader, of whom there is no further information but that he was present at the conference of Anabaptist leaders at Boekholt (Bocholt, q.v.) in Westphalia in August 1536. vbZ.

Sieuwertsz van Reeseema, a Dutch Mennonite family whose ancestor was Willem Sieuwersze, a maker of camlet (a fabric of camel's hair or wool), b. 1643 at Emden, East Friesland, Germany, who moved to Amsterdam, Holland, where he died in 1688. He and his wife Susanna van Gent were members of the Mennonite church as were their descendants for many generations, found at Amsterdam, Haarlem, Leiden, Rotterdam, and other towns of the Netherlands. They first were textile merchants and manufacturers, but later also bakers and lawyers. Some of them served the Mennonite congregation at Rotterdam as deacons. Abraham Sieuwertsz van Reeseema (Leiden, 1786-Rotterdam, 1848), a lawyer and deacon of the Rotterdam church, was a close friend of Pastor Nic. Messchaert (q.v.), whom he assisted morally and financially in his efforts for the welfare and better education of his fellow citizens. Albert Cornelis Sieuwertsz van Reeseema (1853-1911) was a deacon at Rotterdam and in 1873-86 a trustee of the A.D.S. (Dutch General Mennonite Conference). Most of his descendants have now left the church. In 1690 a Sievert Sievertsen van Reschema was found at Danzig, West Prussia, who may have been a member of the same family. vbZ.

Sigismund II (1520-72), King of Poland 1548-72, united Lithuania, West Prussia, Volhynia, and the Ukraine with Poland in 1569 and granted general religious freedom in 1572. He did not at first tolerate the Anabaptists, whom he considered a threat to the state. When he heard that Dutch Mennonite refugees were settling in Elbing he issued a mandate in 1556 ordering their expulsion, but later he confirmed the contract of lease concluded by the barons of Loysen with the Mennonites. Sigismund III, King of Poland 1587-1632, confirmed the contracts of lease made with the Mennonites and on Oct. 20, 1623, accorded special privileges to the lacemakers of Schottland, most of whom were Mennonites. But he refused to grant them any new rights or liberties. Upon the complaint of the city council of Elbing that the Mennonites broke up marriages without having previously informed the authorities (i.e., they practiced avoidance), married one another, and divided property at their pleasure, he forbade the Mennonites, upon penalty of a fine of 100 guilders, to marry without the foreknowledge of the authorities, and ordered that the Mennonites should be given no special rights. When the Mennonites nevertheless requested release from all civil handicaps, especially from military defense of the city and the court oath, he decreed on April 26, 1615, that they should do their duty like others.

But the ruling was not enforced. On April 26, 1626 (1635, as given by Mannhardt, p. 72, is impossible because he was no longer on the throne at that date), the king sent the following orders to the magistrate of Elbing: Because he had heard that they had accepted Anabaptists and Mennonites and given them liberties, so that they "without swearing to him and the city, carried on trade and crafts, bought houses, snatched food from the citizens, and tolerated them free of all that citizens must assume, and, what was not the least, their testimony at court was counted as valid as an oath, all of which is contrary to the public and special laws and offended his royal regard sorely and threatened to do harm," therefore these "people shall be held to sworn obligations to the king and the city, to take up all civil burdens." Sigismund placed wild hordes of Cossacks and Poles at the disposal of his brother-in-law, Ferdinand II, of Austria, which burned and sacked the Hutterite Bruderhofs at Schädowitz, Wätznobis, and Göding, killing many of the people. Signau, a large village and former government center (Landvogtei) in the Emmental, Swiss canton of Bern, where the Anabaptists early found adherents. At the great Anabaptist colloquy at Bern in 1538 (q.v.) Hans Krähenbühl represented the Signau congregation. A formal hunt was organized against the Anabaptists in the Emmental in these years, which was very rewarding in Signau, the bailiff of the Emmental receiving six pounds, and another man eight pounds for hunting Anabaptists there. About five persons were put to death in the Signau district in 1537-66, among them the well-known Wälti Gerber (q.v.) of Röttenbach (which belonged to Signau), who was beheaded in Bern on July 30, 1566. Strict orders from Bern that the Anabaptists were to be punished were sent to the Signau district in 1564; these regulations were even proclaimed from the pulpits. Bernetta Blindenbach was taken from Signau to Bern the second time in 1566, and imprisoned and tortured because she refused to name her brethren.

In the 17th century also the Anabaptist movement spread in Signau. The ancient mandates were renewed. In February 1649 the Mennonite preacher Joseph Widmer (q.v.) was caught in the territory of Signau and taken prisoner to Bern. Among the Mennonite preachers delivered in chains to the new penitentiary and orphanage (q.v.) in Bern was Hans Zaugg of Signau. All of this indicates that the Anabaptist movement was comparatively strong in the region of Signau. Johannes Frischling, magistrate at Signau, wrote to Bern in 1663 that his subordinate officers were unwilling to be used in the seizure of Mennonites on account of blood relationship. Among the Mennonites expelled from the canton in the 18th century there were many from the territory of Signau. S.G.

Sijbrant Jansz, an Anabaptist martyr, executed at Hoorn, Holland, on June 7, 1535, with Hendrik Gijsbertsz, of Kampen, Steven Benedictus, Femmetgen Egberts, and Welmoet Jans. Sijbrant and the two other men were beheaded; the two women were drowned. In March of the same year they had been arrested, and though Catholic theologians tried hard to make them recant, they all remained steadfast. The Court of Holland ordered them to be executed without pardon and without delay. Their execution stirred Hoorn deeply; even most city magistrates abhorred the executions.

Sijmensma, Ruurd Jacobs (1816-54), preacher of the Mennonite congregation at Balk (q.v.) in the Dutch province of Friesland, chosen in 1842, who because of his opposition to the general trend of liberalism developing among the Dutch Mennonites, and particularly because he wished to maintain the principle of non-bearing of arms, decided to emigrate. With Ruurd Johannes Smid (q.v.), an elder of this congregation, and 17 of its members and a few non-Mennonites he left Balk on April 9, 1854; via Rotterdam and Liverpool (England) they arrived at Philadelphia, Pa., on May 6. On June 1 a few of their company including Sijmensma arrived at Goshen, Ind., ten miles southwest of which they settled. In August their families, which they had left behind at Dover, Ohio, joined the pioneers. Sijmensma died in 1854, not quite a year after the emigration. Five letters written by Sijmensma and Smid to the Mennonites remaining at Balk, describing their travel and their settling in the United States, are printed in Doopsgezinde Lectuur. The first two of these letters were written by Sijmensma. His grandfather Ruurd Symens was an elder of the Balk congregation at the close of the 18th century.

The adventures of these Balk immigrants (the first group of April 1853 was followed by a few others; 19 members of Balk with their families, a total of 52 souls, moved to America) are related in the article by Marie Yoder, "The Balk Dutch Settlement Near Goshen, Indiana, 1853-1889," MQR XXX (January 1956); the five letters are found in Gorter's Doopsgezinde Lectuur, 1854, 261-300; DB 1861, 130 f.; 1887, 112; Carl F. Sijntgen, an Anabaptist martyr, the aged mother of the martyr Steven de Graet (q.v.), was burned at the stake with her son on April 7, 1564, at Gent in Flanders, Belgium. The information given in the Offer des Heeren and in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror is rather incomplete, stating neither the exact date nor the manner of execution. Verheyden was able to give some details from the official records: Sijntgen's full name was Jozyne Steghers; she was born at Kortrijk in Flanders, and was the widow of Cornelis Segaert (the name of de Graet is apparently a corruption of Segaert). Both Sijntgen and her son are commemorated in the hymn "Als men schreef duyst vijfhondert jaer ende twee en tsestich mede," found in the Lietboecxken. (Offer, 651; Mart. Mir. D 301, E 666; Verheyden, Gent, 30, No. 98.)

Sijntgen (Kreupel; i.e., Lame Sijntgen), an Anabaptist martyr, who was beheaded on July 19, 1576, at Gent in Flanders, Belgium, together with Lippijntgen Roetsaert and Barbele Pieters. The account in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror on this martyr incorrectly gives 1573 as the year of execution; van Braght calls her a cripple and relates that she was carried to the scaffold on a chair. Verheyden has added some particulars from the official documents: her official name was Jossyne Bornaige, or Barninge; she was a daughter of François and was born at Kortrijk in Flanders; she was the widow of Maerc de Smet. She had been baptized upon her faith at Wervik, Flanders, by Joachim (i.e., Elder Joachim Vermeeren, q.v.) in 1561.

Sijntgen van Gelder (Cynken in Offer), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on July 21, 1562, at Gent in Flanders, Belgium. Her official name probably was Josynken (Srijnken) Cruels, b. at Kortrijk in Flanders; she was the widow of Adriaen Brave. These details have been published by Verheyden, who also found in the records both the exact date and the manner of her execution, not mentioned in Offer and van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror. Four other women were put to death with Sijntgen, viz., Vijntgen, Goudeken, Janneken de Joncheere, and Betgen van Maldegem. These women are commemorated in the hymn "Als men schreef duyst vijfhondert jaer ende twee en tsestich mede," found in the Lietboecxken.

Sijntgen van Roesselare, in the official documents called Synken Snellaerts or Syntgen van Roselaer, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake at Antwerp, Belgium, on Nov. 19, 1573 (van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror does not state the day of execution). In prison she wrote a letter to S.I.H., a sister of the congregation; this simple pious letter, full of fitting quotations from the Bible, admonishes to steadfastness and loyalty; she thanks God for His mercy and is prepared to die for His name. "Greet with the peace of the Lord, in my name, your people where you live, and all dear friends, known and unknown, especially your brother and sister Passchier, my familiar acquaintances. My fellow prisoners greet your love cordially with the peace of the Lord. Pray the Lord heartily for us; we will most gladly do the same for you according to our weak ability. And let us always persevere steadfastly, that no one may take our crown, but that we may with the wise virgins enter into joyful rest. Amen." This letter, found in the Martyrs' Mirror, indicates that Sijntgen was not only a pious Christian but also a well-educated woman. In the letter she calls herself the wife of Jeronymus.

Sijntgen Wens, also called Sijntgen (Joosyne) Swynts (Swints), and Syntgen de Wind, an Anabaptist martyr, who was secretly strangled on April 13, 1589, with Joos de Tollenaer and Michiel Buyse within the 's Gravensteen castle at Gent, Belgium, and then hanged. She was 33 years of age and the wife of Pieter Dierkens. She had been (re)baptized at the end of 1588 during a meeting held outside the city of Gent. Before she was baptized she had already taken part in the meetings of the congregation for six or seven years. The account of this martyr by van Braght in the Martyrs' Mirror is rather short. He mentions that Sijntgen was arrested on Jan. 10, 1589, at ten o'clock in the evening. Verheyden found the particulars (given in this article) in the official records. (*Mart. Silesia (German, Schlesien; Czech, Slezsko; Polish, Slask), a region in east central Europe along both sides of the Oder River. Most of it is divided between Poland and Czechoslovakia. In almost all the principalities and duchies of Silesia there had been Anabaptists from 1525. Half the village of Stolz, near Frankenstein, was Anabaptist at this time. A particularly active Anabaptist in these regions was the furrier Gabriel Ascherham (q.v.). In Breslau an Anabaptist butcher, Claus Salb, won some adherents and was expelled. Other Anabaptist preachers, such as Ernst von Glatz, Behmisch David of Schweidnitz, Bärthel Riedmaier, who was the leader of one of the seventeen Hutterite congregations in Schäckowitz (q.v.), Veit Uhrmacher or Grünberger, Walter Schlesinger, and Peter Riedemann (q.v.), also called the "Silesian"), are named. Also Hans Hut (q.v.) and a certain Oswald (Glaith?) and a brother Hess caused the government and established church some uneasiness in the region of Breslau (q.v.), Glogau, and Glatz, "whereby many people were misled." According to a virulent attack, Wiedertäuferisches Gesindleins in Mähren und Schlesien seltsame Beschaffenheit, Ascherham was considered the founder of a number of the Anabaptist congregations in Silesia. On Aug. 1, 1526, King Ferdinand issued a harsh mandate against not only the Anabaptists and Schwenckfelders, but also the Lutherans. Duke Frederick of Liegnitz therefore protested at the court against this mandate, promising to take suitable steps to suppress the Anabaptists in his lands, but refusing to re-establish Catholic ceremonies. From that time on, Anabaptists who would not desist from error were to be placed in stocks and have an ear cut off. Luther advised the Protestant pastor Johann Hess, who complained that the Anabaptists were getting the upper hand, that he should not report them to the authorities, but let them betray themselves; then the senate would expel them.

To evade these strict measures Gabriel led his followers, also known as Gabrielites (q.v.), to Moravia. But when persecution began there in 1535, many Anabaptists who had emigrated from Silesia returned, causing a sudden increase in the movement in Schweidnitz, Guhrau, Jauer, and Habelschwerdt. But they had a bitter opponent in the Breslau preacher Ambrosius Moibanus (q.v.), who wrote a tract against them, for which Luther wrote a foreword. On July 28, 1529, the returning Anabaptists presented a petition to the princes and estates assembled at the Silesian Landtag requesting safe conduct to the assembly so that they might defend their religious views on the basis of Scripture, assuring the assembly that they gave to the emperor what was the emperor's and to God what was God's. They called themselves "the faithful subjects of the prince's grace and authority and obedient brethren and integrated members of Christ's covenant" (Kaster, 61). But the assembly did not consider this appeal. On March 30, 1530, Ferdinand ordered Frederick II to take sterner measures against the Anabaptists, since he feared a revolt and a treaty between them and the Turks. On Oct. 13, 1533, the city council of Breslau wrote to Frederick that several Anabaptists were living under the Baron of Bernstein, among them a certain Clement, who preached and induced all kinds of people to move away. Frederick replied that Clement had been imprisoned in the Wohlen tower for several weeks and had again been expelled from the district. Clement was beheaded at Glogau in 1535.

In 1538 the churches in Habelschwerdt were not being attended, because the Schwenckfelders were meeting in private homes. Pastor Petrus Eiserer left the town and gave the keys of the church to the city council. But the Anabaptists laid no claim to the church either. "For them the whole city was a temple; in private homes of citizens they held their meetings. The Neisse and the Weistritz were the great baptistries, into which adults were immersed and made members of their covenant." Immersion was apparently practiced here. In Weizenrode, in the principality of Schweidnitz, when a tailor was about to be arrested in 1536, "an entire little congregation was discovered," to which the servants of the mayor and the miller's wife belonged.

Such proceedings of course precluded any congregational organization. It seems that the Anabaptists continued in Silesia as Schwenckfelders, since the latter often had possession of Anabaptist writings. But as late as the 1570's individual Anabaptists were found in the country. W.W.

Silver Lake Mennonite Brethren Church (sometimes called the Dolton M.B. Church), Hutchinson

Co., S.D., was organized by about 30 members under the leadership of P. H. Unruh in 1889. In 1891 a church was constructed east of Silver Lake and about three miles southwest of Dolton. P. H. Unruh was succeeded by Peter Fast, who served 1909-23, J. J. Adrian 1923-46, G. S. Warkentin 1946-?. In 1920 a new church with a seating capacity of 275 was erected. In 1957 the membership was 140, with John Regehr as pastor. J.A.W.

Silver Street Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Clinton Twp., Elkhart Co., Ind., a member of the Central District, was organized by former members of the Clinton Frame Amish Mennonite Church (q.v.) in Indiana. Due to a number of disagreements regarding church government and ordinances, particularly the prayer covering and the bonnet, in early 1892 the congregation divided into two groups, conservative and progressive, the progressive being the minority group, but including the bishop, Benjamin Schrock. The two groups used the same building for worship services for some months until June 1892, the progressive group using it on Sunday afternoon. The climax came when the progressive group invited Joseph Stucky and Peter Tschantz of Illinois to hold meetings for two weeks in June. On Oct. 23, 1892, the progressive group dedicated a new meetinghouse, the membership being 87, and Benjamin Schrock the pastor, with Jacob Smoker, Daniel Smoker, and Christian Mehl as deacons. The name Silver Street Mennonite Church was adopted. In 1893 J. C. Mehl was asked to provide services in the Topeka area and within the first year a new congregation had begun, members coming from the Silver Street mother church and from the Topeka area. In 1913 a second offspring was born when Alvin K. Ropp, then pastor of the church, organized the Eighth Street Mennonite Church in Goshen. By this time the church had joined the Central Illinois Conference. The Silver Street congregation reached its peak of 250 members in 1924 under the leadership of Allen Yoder. In 1958 it had 130 members.

The Silver Street church has had the following pastors besides Benjamin Schrock 1892: John C. Mehl 1892-1906, M. A. Niswander 1906-11, A. K. Ropp 1911-13, Allen Yoder 1913-35, Harry Yoder 1935-41, Robert Hartzler 1942-45, H. E. Nunemaker 1946-53, William Klassen 1953-54, Daniel Graber 1954- . D.J.G.

Simon Fyts (Fijts) was a preacher of the Mennonite congregation on the Dutch island of Texel in 1569. The 1626 edition of the Dutch martyr book mentions that the accounts in this book on the martyrs Thijs Joriaensz (q.v.), Jan Claesz (q.v.) van Weesp, and Jan Smit (q.v.), which are reproduced in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror (pages D 481, 641, E 823, 962), were given by Simon Fyts, who had visited Thijs and Jan Claesz in prison and observed their execution, and who was a close friend of Jan Smit.

In 1606 he ordained Jan van der Voort as elder of the Flemish congregation at Utrecht (q.v.). Further particulars about Fyts were not available. (DB 1873, 141; 1899, 104, 120.) vdZ.

Simon den Kramer (Simon the Shopkeeper), an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake in 1553 (exact date unknown) outside the town of Bergen op Zoom, Dutch province of North Brabant. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, which is the only source concerning this martyr, relates that Simon was a market vendor (kramer), and while standing near his stall refused to give homage to the Roman Catholic "idol" (probably the Holy Sacrament passing in a procession), whereupon he was arrested. Van Braght also relates that the sheriff (drossaert), upon coming home from the execution, fell ill and died soon after, filled with doubt whether Simon's execution was just. (Mart. Mir. D 149, E 540.) vdZ.

Simon Maertsz Vernouwen, a Dutch Anabaptist, an adherent of the revolutionary wing led by Jan van Batenburg (q.v.), was sentenced by the Court of Holland on July 31, 1544, to be burned at the stake, and executed that day or the next at The Hague. He had been active at Alkmaar, North Holland, where he lived, but also in the neighborhood of Brugge and Gent in Belgium, in Münster (q.v.) in Westphalia, Germany, and in other towns. This man's career shows both that revolutionary Anabaptism still was active at that late date, and also that long journeys were made by its adherents to propagate their ideas. vdZ.

Simon Michielsz (Machielsz) was an elder of the Waterlander congregation at De Rijp (q.v.), Dutch province of North Holland. In 1575-76 Michielsz baptized Hans de Ries (q.v.) here, who soon became an influential elder and leader of the Waterlanders. In 1577, at a conference of Waterlander elders and preachers held at Alkmaar, a resolution was passed that Jacob Jansz (q.v.) Scheedemaker and de Ries should draw up a confession of faith, assisted by Simon Michielsz and others. Again in 1581 a Waterlander conference at Amsterdam discussed the question of drawing up a confession; it was then resolved that de Ries should write it with the assistance of Michielsz and Scheedemaker, which confession, after approval by the congregations, would be printed.

Later Michielsz was an elder at Haarlem, where he and Scheedemaker adopted a stricter practice in banning than a part of the congregation favored, which led to some trouble. Simon Michielsz probably died in 1587, for after this year there is no information about his activity. His brother Cornelis Michielsz was also a Waterlander preacher. In 1592 he refused to sign the Concept of Cologne (q.v.), because he believed that the strict regulations concerning banning and shunning as found in the Concept were too much "human views" and not Scriptural. vdZ.

Simon van Vliermaal, a locksmith, was burned at the stake in 1534 at Curingen (Curanges) near Haselt, Belgium. He confessed that he was an Anabaptist, and that his coreligionists were planning to bathe the country in fire and blood. This Simon of Vliermaal shows that revolutionary Anabaptism was at this time also found in northeastern Belgium.

Simons, Menno: see Menno Simons.

Simplicity, a Christian virtue stressed by the Anabaptists and the Mennonites, closely related to sincerity, humility, and forthrightness, and applying to many aspects of life, including the manner of address and communication, forms of worship and type of meetinghouse, character of homes and furniture, costume, etc. It is closely related to the principle of nonconformity (q.v.), and hence it is at times difficult to distinguish the motivation for simplicity of expression, whether it is grounded in sincerity and opposition to prideful expression, or in the intent to be different from the world. It is also related to such attitudes as oppose materialism and complexity. At times it has been closely related to ruralism and anti-urbanism, since many Mennonites have been farmers, and also to traditionalism as opposed to change. At times it has been strongly identified with simplicity in dress. It is therefore not always easy to assign to the concept of simplicity particular expressions of behavior. Much of what might be referred to here is treated in the articles Nonconformity and Dress.

The earliest testimony to the Anabaptist emphasis on simplicity is found in Kessler's Sabbata, written in 1525, describing the Swiss (St. Gall?) Brethren: "They shun costly clothing, they shun expensive food and drink, clothe themselves with coarse cloth, cover their heads with broad felt hats. Their entire manner of life is completely humble." Sebastian Franck (Chronica, 1531) refers to Anabaptist regulations on simplicity of clothing. Bullinger (1561) wrote: "They reprov'd sharply covetousness, pride, profanity, the frivolous talking and inordinate life of the world"; and at another place, "They reprov'd earnestly all vain display, all intemperance in eating and drinking." The Strasbourg Conference of 1568 directed that "tailors and seamstresses shall hold to the plain and simple style and shall make nothing at all for pride's sake" and that "brethren and sisters shall stay by the present form of our regulation concerning apparel and make nothing for pride's sake." The Catholic Franz Agricola, evidently describing the Hutterites, wrote in 1582: "Among the existing heretical sects there is none which in appearance leads a more modest, better, or more pious life than the Anabaptists. As concerns their outward public life they are irreproachable. No lying, deception, swearing, harsh language, no intemperate eating and drinking, no outward personal display is found or discernible among them, but humility, patience, uprightness, meekness, honesty, temperance, straightforwardness in such measure that one would suppose that they have the Holy Spirit of God."

Menno Simons said: "We acknowledge, teach and seek no other kingdom than that of Christ, which shall endure forever, in which there is no pomp, splendor, gold, silver." At another place he said that Christ's kingdom is not one "in which a display is made of gold, silver, pearls, silk, velvet and costly finery, as is done by the proud, wicked world."

It is clear that all early Anabaptists of Swiss, Dutch, or Hutterite type and background stressed simplicity consistently in all aspects of life. It is also clear that growing wealth and acceptance in society became a weighty influence militating against the maintenance of simplicity in certain aspects, especially in housing and clothing. This is clearly revealed in the following article on simplicity in the Netherlands. A similar development took place in North Germany and in West and East Prussia, as the second article below indicates. However, simplicity in worship was retained in all these areas, and ceremonialism and liturgical forms never made their way into Mennonite worship anywhere, unless one would rate the introduction of musical instruments as a violation of the original simplicity of Anabaptist worship.

Anabaptist-Mennonite simplicity was on the whole retained in Europe in the rural Mennonite communities in Switzerland, France, and South Germany, even though any prescribed forms of plain dress have long since disappeared; and there is still a spirit of simplicity and resistance to modern fashions and ornamentation in many areas.

The traditional simplicity of Mennonite meetinghouse architecture in Europe and America has been due in part to sincere insistence upon a modest, functional, and economical character of the meetinghouse. However, the severe restrictions placed upon the "churchly" appearance of Mennonite meetinghouses by the governmental authorities in Holland and elsewhere, as well as the desire by the once persecuted Mennonites to avoid all occasion for calling attention to themselves, and possibly the carry-over from the house meetings into the first meetinghouses, have also contributed to keep Mennonites from following prevailing ecclesiastical styles, such as Gothic or ornate later styles, with towers, belfries, stained glass windows, etc. In Pennsylvania the influence of the plain Quaker meetinghouse may have been a factor.

The first Mennonites who came to America in 1683-1756 settled in Pennsylvania and came under Quaker influence, the dominant cultural and political group at that time, who strongly emphasized simplicity in many aspects of life including plain dress. Their later neighbors, the Dunkards, the Moravians, the Schwenckfelders, and the Amish, all emphasized simplicity and plainness. All these groups manifested or developed plainness in garb, somewhat like the Quakers, hence the intensification of the "plain" spirit in this area was natural, and all these groups gradually became thought of and often labeled as "the plain people" or "the plain sects."

The Eastern Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia areas of the Mennonite Church (MC) as well as the Old Order Mennonites who broke away from them, as well as the various groups of Amish and Amish Mennonites, have maintained a strong emphasis on simplicity and plainness, including certain aspects of a prescribed "plain" costume. Simplicity at times may have become perhaps too exclusively identified among them with "plain dress," although the spirit of plainness is carried through in other aspects of life as well. It is interesting to note that an early source described the Mennonite immigrants of 1710 to the Lancaster area in the following terms: "The dress of both female and male was domestic, quite plain, and of coarse material, after an old fashion of their own." J. C. Wenger cites Morgan Edwards, a Baptist historian writing in 1770, as describing the Mennonites as people who dressed very plainly and as claiming that some men had been expelled for wearing buckle shoes and outside coat pockets.

But the first Eastern Pennsylvania Mennonites and Amish and their descendants were not the only American Mennonites to emphasize simplicity and to apply it concretely to costume as well as other things. The same was true of the Alsatian Amish immigrants of the first half of the 19th century, and of the Swiss immigrants of the same period who later joined the General Conference Mennonite Church. Such groups as the Church of God in Christ Mennonites, the Evangelical Mennonites (Kleine Gemeinde), and the various conservative Manitoba groups (Old Colony, Sommerfelder, etc.) still continue to stress simplicity and plainness.

The increasingly higher level of income, the gradual acculturation to the contemporary manner of life in society in general, and the powerful pressure of clever and materialistic advertising, press hard upon the general Mennonite desire to maintain the simple life. Among the American Mennonites of Swiss-South German background, the principle in general is being maintained, although certain outward forms are changing, particularly in costume, but vigorous action in teaching and discipline will be necessary to maintain to the full any valid expression of simplicity in the contemporary situation. Netherlands. Simplicity of dress, food, and furniture, if not a doctrine, was nevertheless the style of former Dutch Mennonite life, which was inspired by Matt. 5:19 ff. Though the main groups of the Dutch Mennonites, such as the Waterlanders, (Young) Frisians, and (Young) Flemish, never prescribed what degree of simplicity of life was necessary, various incidental references suggest that simplicity was held to be a desirable Christian virtue. During the 17th century in the prosperous Dutch "Golden age," when particularly Mennonite merchants at Amsterdam, Haarlem, Leiden, and other towns became well-to-do and even wealthy, they began to wear costly dress, to build stately homes and country seats, and to furnish their homes with costly furniture and treasures of art. Preachers like Jacob Cornelisz van Dalen (Waterlander), Tieleman Jansz van Braght (Flemish), and Galenus Abrahamsz de Haan (Lamist) ardently protested against the growing luxury and for the retention of simplicity, but seemingly without much success. In 1647 a large Waterlander delegates' meeting held at Amsterdam resolved to remind the preachers of the resolutions taken in the conference of 1581, "to impress both by their lives and teachings" the members of the church of the dangers of "the great pomp of clothes, wedding parties, funerals, meals, decoration of the homes," and similar things.

At the same time or somewhat before, both Old Frisians and Groningen Old Flemish occupied themselves with the same matter. In 1639 the (Old) Frisian Conference of North Holland drew up twelve articles in some of which simplicity of dress and furniture was emphatically demanded. These articles, expanded in the following years, were always read at the beginning of the yearly meetings of the conference. They are found in Blaupot ten Cate, Holland II, 223-28.

In 1656 the Groningen Old Flemish Conference, meeting at Loppersum, resolved to adopt a number of articles in which the members, on penalty of excommunication, were urged to avoid luxury. These regulations were rather rigorous: forbidden were such things as colored clothing, fashionable shoes, the use of smoothing irons, luxurious bedding, chinaware, silver cups and spoons, colored harness for horses, gaudily painted carriages, long hair for men, paintings or pictures on the walls, fire screens with pictures, Delft tiles on the walls, etc. An incomplete copy of these regulations is found in Blaupot ten Cate, Friesland, 307 f. After the last decades of the 18th century they fell into disuse.

In 1698 H. L. Benthaim, a Lutheran opponent of the Mennonites, wrote: "Although there is need of guarding against the errors of these people, one can learn much from them that is good, namely, humility, contentment, sobriety. . . . Above all, they insist on modesty in respect to clothing, although there are some in Amsterdam who are attracting attention by using periwigs and other indications of worldliness. However, in Friesland and in Groningen one will see them in plain dress, although they also as a class are well-informed and well-to-do."

But still in the 19th century, particularly in some conservative rural congregations like Aalsmeer, Balk, Warns, and Ameland, Mennonites held to simplicity. On the island of Ameland, Mennonite homes were generally not painted red, white, green, but a sober brown. Occasionally mention is made of "Menistblauw" (blue), and in my youth I often heard it said that my grandfather refused to wear a gold watch, always using a simple silver one. vdZ.

Prussia, Russia, and Descendants in America. The practice of simplicity among the Mennonites of Prussia and Russia was very similar to that of the Swiss and the Dutch. Through their isolated life they developed some specific beliefs and practices as to what constitutes a true, consecrated Christian life and what is "worldly." This was noticeable in their manner of life, their clothing, homes, furniture, worship services, entertainment, etc. Through group action, cultural patterns developed which were acceptable and variations became difficult to promote because of church discipline or group pressure. Mannhardt (p. 111) reports in detail the changes that took place in the Danzig Mennonite Church. The baptismal candidates were not accepted during a certain year because of their "worldly" clothing which included such items as wigs and scarves. However, being exposed to the culture of the surrounding cities, they gradually adjusted to their environment, although they retained certain characteristics of simplicity.

In Russia, because of greater isolation, patterns of simplicity could be preserved more readily. With later agricultural and economic progress the enforced "simplicity" of the pioneer days gradually disappeared. Contact with the German and Russian culture changed the pattern in clothing, furniture, and buildings. There is, however, very little reference to disciplinary action along these lines. Such features as clothing and head covering did not assume the religious significance and were not considered prerequisites for a simple Christian life to the same degree as among the Amish and other conservative Pennsylvania-German Mennonite groups, although some of the same problems are noticeable.

Particularly the migration of the Mennonites of 1874 must be viewed in connection with the process of an adjustment of the Mennonites to the higher standards of living and culture in Russia. Some of the more conservative groups, such as the later Old Colony Mennonites (q.v.) who settled in Manitoba (q.v.), left Russia not only because of the threat of military service but also because they felt that their simple way of life at home and particularly in the schools was threatened. In Manitoba and Mexico they developed very much along the same lines as the Amish and Hutterites in that they "froze" or "petrified" certain forms of culture in their belief and emphasis on the simple Christian life. The traditional head covering for men and women, clothing, and even the leather boots for the ministers, received religious significance. The objection to electricity and motor-driven vehicles and many other modern cultural and religious practices was due to their concept of simplicity and nonconformity.

To some degree some other conservative Mennonite groups from Russia who settled in the United States and Canada, such as the Kleine Gemeinde and smaller congregations, have emphasized simplicity similarly and objected to the introduction of some common American cultural customs and practices. The cutting of women's hair, attendance at motion pictures and other theatrical amusements, and at places the introduction of the radio have in some congregations caused disciplinary action on the basis that they were undermining the simple Christian life. This has been the case of some of the congregations of the G.C.M., M.B., K.M.B., E.M.B., and other groups of Russian background. As a rule there have not been great controversies or differences of opinion along these lines which led to separation, with the exception of the conservative Manitoba Mennonites where for instance one division in recent times was caused in part by a dispute regarding the wearing of white bridal gowns instead of the traditional black. It is generally emphasized that a stable consecrated Christian life will find an expression in daily living which will be in harmony with the traditional Biblical Mennonite concept of simplicity. Singel (Singhel, Cingel, Singele) van, a former Dutch Mennonite family, found in the 16th-18th centuries at Amsterdam, where Pieter Jans van Singhel was a preacher of the Danzig Old Flemish congregation from 1619. In the 18th century members of this family lived at Utrecht, Alkmaar, and Leiden. Pieter van Cingel (Singele) was a preacher of the Frisian Mennonites at Alkmaar 1703-48. The Mennonite van Cingel family of Scheemda, province of Groningen, most of whom were farmers and often deacons, was apparently not related to the above Amsterdam family. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 116f.; II, 2, No. 5; DB 1891, 10.) voZ.

Singel Mennonite Church, the name popularly given to the meetinghouse of the Amsterdam Mennonite Church, which is located on the Singel Canal, No. 452. In 1608 Harmen Hendriks van Warendorp (q.v.) had this meetinghouse built for the Flemish congregation; it was enlarged in 1639. It received the name bij't Lam because it was located near a brewery which had a lamb as its gable sign. (See Amsterdam.) voZ.

Singing, Hutterite, at Worship. Like the delivery of their sermons (q.v.) the congregational singing of the Hutterites of today is also strongly formalized, a practice which undoubtedly goes back to certain usages of the 16th and 17th centuries. Some of its characteristic features were mentioned in the article Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder; some further observations will be briefly summarized here. A. J. F. Zieglschmid reports in a footnote of the Klein-Geschichtsbuch (580, n. 3) that in the singing of hymns during the worship hour the preacher (Diener des Wortes) reads and sings one line of the hymn from the Liederbuch, whereupon the congregation sings this line in unison; then follows the second line in the same fashion, and so forth. Since most of the hymns are extremely long, only a few stanzas are sung. The singing itself is rather devoid of musical beauty; it is not only sung in unison but extremely shrill and loud. The tunes are known by all through oral tradition. The texts are taken from two printed hymnals, the Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder (1914) and Das Kleine Liederbuch (1930). The tunes derived originally from old secular folk tunes (mostly medieval) but they lost most of their melodiousness and freshness by the above described formalization.

There is good reason to ask what has made this overly loud, rather unmusical singing the congregational practice. A good conjecture would be that in the beginning it was introduced intentionally by brethren who were imprisoned and who wanted to be heard both by their fellow brethren in other parts of the jail and by outsiders that they might stop and listen to their testimonies of faith. Jeronimus Käls (q.v.), martyred at Vienna 1536, reports in one of his epistles from prison that at night the brethren in separate cells sang so loudly that they could hear each other and thus give each other mutual comfort; moreover by so doing they tried to allay their own agony (ME III, 340; also Arch. f. Ref. Gesch. 1929, 80).

Similarly Hans Schmid (q.v.) or Raiffer, martyred at Aachen 1558, wrote to the brethren in Moravia that "once God brought all of us together in jail; there I began to pray and sing as loud as I was able to raise my voice. Thereupon people came running to find out what was going on. The warden (Amtmann) came and threatened that unless we lowered our voices he would never again allow such a meeting. But," he concluded, "the brethren did not heed his words and continued in this loud manner so that everyone [outside] could hear how they stood to each other and how they were giving testimony for each other" (letter unpublished, but text also in part in the Chronik, 388 f.). The Scriptural basis for this attitude was Isa. 58:1, in Denk's translation: "So lasst uns schreien dass uns der Hals kracht."

All this indicates that congregational singing is neither folk singing nor artistic singing but a testimony to the praise and glory of the Lord.

As to the tunes used, Oliver S. Beltz (a professor at Mission College, Takoma Park, Md.) made a number of tape recordings of actual Hutterite singing both in Canada and in South Dakota in 1946-47. His material is now deposited in the Folk Song Collection of the Library of Congress. Transcripts in notation may be found likewise in the Music Section of this Library, and also at Concordia Theological Seminary, St. Louis, Mo. Beltz himself plans to publish his findings both from a musicological point of view and by comparison with earlier studies in this area of "folk music turned sacred music." A certain similarity is noticeable with the singing of the Old Order Amish, but thus far no study of any kind has been undertaken in this direction. The late A. J. F. Zieglschmid (q.v.) is said to have had a manuscript ready dealing with the remarkable phenomenon of tune transfers, but it seems to be lost.

Singing, Old Colony Mennonite. The singing of the Old Colony Mennonites (q.v.) of Chihuahua, Mexico, by far the largest body of this group, is here used as the basis for a brief descriptive account of Old Colony singing in the regular worship services, based upon an extensive and thorough monograph, "The Church Music of the Old Order Amish and Old Colony Mennonites," MQR XXVII (1953), pp. 34-54, by Charles Burkhardt, who spent a year in close contact with the Chihuahua group, carefully observing their musical practices. Old Colony singing has remarkable similarities to Old Order Amish singing (q.v.), which are not, however, noted in the following account. For a discussion of hymns and tunes, see Hymnology and Tunes.

Old Colony church singing is led by a number of song leaders called Vorsänger or choristers (q.v.), who are seated on a platform adjoining the pulpit at the front of the meetinghouse. The office of Vorsänger carries much prestige and is actually very important since, because of the absence of printed notes in the hymnal, the propagation of the tunes and mode of singing from generation to generation depends almost entirely on them. Because of the difficulty of learning the music much practice is necessary and few young men ever become proficient enough to become leaders.

Old Colony music is monodic and is sung by men and women together an octave apart. The natural voice is not used; instead the singing is nasal. Since no dynamics are consciously observed, all sing about mezzo forte in the middle of their range. The resulting tone quality is quite piercing and resonant. Use is made of simple responsive singing between the Vorsänger and the congregation. The former sings all the time, the latter making short pauses at specific points. At the end of each line the congregation stops singing on the first tone of the last syllable group, but the Vorsänger adds a few more tones of his own composition, after which the congregation, having caught a new breath, begins to sing again on the first syllable of the succeeding line. Thus there is no break in the sound, since the leader waits to catch his breath until the congregation has begun the next line. The tempo gives the impression of being very slow, partly because a single syllable is often sung to a fairly long melisma (melodic embellishment), although there are really few long notes. Nearly every syllable is sung to a melisma of anywhere from three to nine tones. Every syllable may be embellished, although the ornamentation is more florid for some than for others. Besides this primary type of ornamentation there is a secondary type composed of quite short tones, frequently inserted by the Vorsänger and naturally difficult for the congregation to follow. In addition to specific ornaments certain melodic formulas constantly recur which contain a number of short ornaments. The mediant sung by the leaders while the congregation catches its breath vary from one leader to another and actually serve as musical cues for the congregation's re-entrance, since the leader makes absolutely no physical gesture in his leading. Since part of the ornamentation is improvised, no two singings of a hymn are ever exactly alike. It is interesting to note that the mediant have something of a counterpart in the cadence formulas of the Psalms for the Gregorian vespers service. Being strictly monodic, the Old Colony style of singing lends itself to modality, both major and minor modes being used, as well as church modes and musica ficta. H.S.B.

Singing, Old Order Amish, in worship. In their regular biweekly worship service most of the Old Order Amish use the Ausbund (q.v.) exclusively. The hymnbooks are the property of the congregation and are gathered by the oldest hymn leader after each service and carried home in a satchel-like box. For the next service he selects the hymn sung traditionally with the Scripture suitable for that season of the year. (See "Amish Service Manuals" in MQR XV, 1941, 26-32.) Before the next meeting he marks with a piece of bluish-gray yarn in each book the first hymn to be sung. Arriving at the home where the service is to be held, he distributes the books along the benches in the rooms where the worshippers will sit. As the time for the service approaches, each one present takes up a book and turns to the marked page. Each congregation has several hymn leaders ("Vorsänger"), who decide among themselves who is to lead each hymn. Since the hymns of the Ausbund are sung to well-known medieval or Reformation folk tunes, and the books contain no music notation, hymn leaders must learn them by ear. Very few ever are able to learn all of the twenty-one tunes used by the Amish; many can lead only six or eight with complete confidence. Because leading a hymn is the only congregational activity usually engaged in by a layman, many members chosen for the lot when a minister is to be selected have first served as hymn leaders.

The Amish leader usually sings all but the last word or syllable of the first line alone, the congregation joining in unison at that point. The entire congregation sings the air; the men and women an octave apart; there is no four-part singing. The second hymn in every Amish worship service is the Loblied (hymn of praise), page 770 in the Ausbund, known in northern Indiana as the Lobgesang. Amish tunes have become embellished, down through the years, with so many glides and grace notes and are sung so slowly that the singing of a single stanza requires many minutes. The Loblied with its four seven-line stanzas seems to be the only one ever sung in full. If the ministers enter the room from their half-hour pre-service counsel meeting before the congregation finishes the Loblied, the singing stops at the end of the next line even though the hymn is not finished. If the ministers have not appeared by the time the Loblied ends, one of the hymn leaders announces further singing by saying, for example, "Page 492, stanza 25." Hymns always are announced by the page and the number of the stanza. When the ministers enter, the singing ends at the end of the next line even though the sentence is not complete. There is no further singing until after the benediction, which is spoken with both speaker and audience remaining seated. One of the hymn leaders then announces two or more stanzas from an appropriate hymn. After the service on the Sunday nearest Christmas, for instance, he says, "Page 545, stanzas 14 and 15," two stanzas dealing with the Incarnation and taken from a doctrinal hymn of 32 nine-line stanzas. On certain occasions Amish young people sing faster tunes like "Beulah Land," adapted to their Amish hymns. This is true of the celebration following a wedding service and at the Sunday evening "singings." Amish young people are fond of singing and usually have good, though untrained, voices. J.S.U.

Singing Schools. Church music among the Protestant groups was at its lowest ebb in the early 18th century. The Puritans sang only metrical versions of Psalms and possibly used no more than a dozen tunes, the Quakers sang not at all, and the Mennonites used the old hymns and slow monophonic tunes of the Ausbund. One of the earliest texts for teaching music was written by Thomas Walter of Roxbury, Mass., entitled The Grounds and Rules of Music Explained, and published in 1721. The book used shaped notes and bar lines.

Nathaniel D. Gould in Church Music in America explains how singing schools were organized in the New England states in the latter part of the 18th century. When the singing had become insufferable in a given church interested members of the congregation would form a committee to secure subscribers to underwrite a singing school. Then a teacher was selected and a place of meeting. According to Gould, this was frequently located in the village tavern for want of a better place. Instruction consisted of the simple elements of notation and vocal exercises. Gould lists 115 singing schools which he taught between 1799 and 1844.

Lowell Mason (1792-1872) was a musician with a talent to write, to teach, and to arrange singable tunes for church and school. He was founder of Boston Academy of Music and director of the Handel & Haydn Choral Society. He, with George J. Webb, had music festivals and short courses for singing class teachers that were attended by large numbers. In New York City William Bradbury and Joseph Holbrook were also promoters of school music and singing classes. Singing classes were found everywhere in the United States after the early part of the 19th century.

The earliest music enthusiast among the Mennonites was Joseph Funk, born in Berks Co., Pa., in 1777. He with his wife moved to Virginia, where he built a log cabin by the spring where the town of Singers Glen is now located. He introduced music in the schools where he taught, and was recognized as a leader of singing schools. The crowning work of his life was the publication of his collection of Genuine Church Music in 1832. With the fourth edition the name was changed to Harmonia Sacra. This was the great book of the early Mennonite singing schools. These schools were often community gatherings rather than a church-sponsored effort and were not held in the church, but usually in the school.

In 1875, the Mennonite Publishing Company, Elkhart, Ind., published a new book for singing schools, the Philharmonia, compiled by Martin D. Wenger of Virginia, which contains 37 lessons on music theory. All the tunes in this book have four-part harmony. The singing class teachers of the last quarter of the 19th century should be given credit for the style of music used in the M.C. Mennonite churches today. Besides Martin D. Wenger there was also Christian H. Brunk of Virginia who traveled widely among the Mennonites organizing Sunday schools and teaching singing. J. F. King of Orrville, Ohio, was a teacher and publisher of two singing class books, Silver Star and Singer's Joy. Abraham B. Kolb of Elkhart, Ind., and Aaron C. Kolb of Kitchener, Ont., gave much of their time and talent to the development of good singing in the Mennonite churches. Chauncey King of Wayne Co., Ohio, and Simon Hartzler of Cass Co., Mo., spent many years teaching singing classes among the Amish Mennonite churches of Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, and Missouri. The work of Joseph W. Yoder, Belleville, Pa., will long remain a dominant influence in the singing of the churches in the "Big Valley" and the Mennonite churches of the Franconia, Pa., district.

It was not until late in the 19th century or early 20th century that singing classes were permitted to be held in the churches. During the years from 1906, when John D. Brunk came to Goshen College to inaugurate the Music Department, until his health would not permit, he was a firebrand for better hymns and hymn singing in the M.C. churches. He was an excellent teacher and a well-trained Christian musician. His book, Educational Vocal Studies, was written and compiled for singing class use in the church. He opened each session with a devotional period; next a review and practice on points taught in previous lessons. He used a blackboard to present the new theory, then turned to Educational Vocal Studies for exercises and songs illustrating the point discussed; finally turned to the Hymnal for songs bearing on the new theory just taught. He closed the session with one or two good hymns for interpretation, in order that he might close on a high spiritual plane as well as a high musical experience. Singing classes are still held in some Mennonite congregations, though not as commonly as earlier. In the East they sometimes close with a public program at which heavier music may be sung. W.E.Y.

Singings, Amish, the name usually given to the Sunday evening gatherings of the Old Order Amish young people. (There are some "old folks' singings" for the purpose of transmitting the unwritten chants used in Amish church services.) The young people's singings are of long standing; they were begun to provide an activity of Christian fellowship for the young people.

In earlier times the singing consisted primarily of German hymns; however, not the slow tunes used in the church services. Today the singing is mostly English Gospel songs and hymns. In some communities there is 100 per cent participation in the singing. The evening is begun with Scripture reading and prayer, and usually the group disperses quite promptly after the closing prayer. In some other communities the singing is no longer of importance, since not more than 5 per cent of those present participate. H. GR.

Singmaster, Elsie (1879-1958), in private life Mrs. Harold Lewars, an American author who wrote outstanding "local color" fiction with Eastern Pennsylvania as a major locale. Since she was of Pennsylvania-German stock, some of her works naturally deal with the "plain people," including the Mennonites. Most of the short stories in her collection Bred in the Bone (1925) center around the Reformed Mennonites; a few deal with young Amishmen. These characters and their problems Miss Singmaster treats with sympathy and gentle (never derisive) humor. Her home was at Gettysburg, Pa., where her husband was a professor at Gettysburg College. She was the author of over 300 novels and children's stories, including twelve major novels, most of them dealing with American history, especially of Pennsylvania. E.H.B.

Sinntal Bruderhof, a community of the Society of Brothers founded in 1955 at Bad Brückenau in northern Bavaria. In 1959 the population was some 60, most of them having returned from Paraguay. The Sinntal Bruderhof earns its living by toymaking and some market gardening and is particularly active in reaching out to the younger generation in Germany. It publishes Der Pflug, the German edition of The Plough. E.C.H.A.

Sinsheim Mennonite Church, in Baden, Germany, the central Mennonite congregation of northern Baden (Elsenzgau and Kraichgau), an area which was formerly a part of the Palatinate, which meets every first, third, and fifth Sunday of the month in the county seat Sinsheim (pop. 5,430), 13 miles southeast of Heidelberg. Most of the members are farmers and come from a radius of 10-20 miles to the services. The congregation was formed in 1912 out of two congregations, one of them probably the oldest congregation in all South Germany, viz., Immelhausen (q.v., 1650-1912), combined in 1841 with Bockschaft and Streichenberg (q.v., 1655-1841), and Ittlingen (q.v., 1841-1912). Later two other congregations were merged with it, Mönchzell, formerly Meckesheim (1896-1914), and Dühren (*c*1675-1945). None of these congregations had a meetinghouse except Immelhausen (q.v.), which was really the direct ancestor of the Sinsheim congregation. The only other congregation remaining in this area is Hasselbach (q.v.). From this area a considerable emigration to Pennsylvania took place in the first half of the 18th century. In 1957 the membership was 101, plus 19 children; elders were Heinrich Fellmann, Heinrich Kreiter, and Ulrich Hege. Within the congregation is the oldest continuously occupied Mennonite farm in all South Germany, and possibly in all Europe, the Immelhäuserhof, probably occupied since 1650. The chief places in which members of the congregation live are Bockschaft, Daisbach, Dühren, Hoffenheim, Ittlingen, Immelhäuserhof, Kloster Lobenfeld, Mönchzell, Oberhof, Reichen, Sinsheim, and Weiler. Sintern (Sinteren), van, a family found in the Mennonite congregation of Hamburg-Altona, Germany, in the 16th-19th centuries. Pieter van Sinteren, whose daughter Elisabeth (1533-1624) was married to Geerlinck Roosen, of Steinrade, Holstein, Germany, in 1565 or 1566, was a Mennonite and had probably moved from Holland or Flanders to Holstein about 1555. Heinrich van Sintern, a grandson of Pieter, was a tailor at Altona about 1600. Another Heinrich van Sintern was baptized at Lübeck in 1710. A Hinrich van (von) Sintern and Isaac van Sintern with his wife Neeltje Claesen and their children emigrated from Altona to Pennsylvania in the spring of 1700, where they joined the Germantown (q.v.) Mennonite congregation. vdZ.

Siouw Harmen Thysdochter, a revolutionary Anabaptist; she was arrested at the Oldeklooster (q.v.) on April 7, 1535, and drowned at Leeuwarden a week later. (K. Vos, Menno Simons, Leiden, 1914, 229.) vdZ.

Sipke Sitszoon, an Anabaptist martyr executed at Leeuwarden, capital of the Dutch province of Friesland, on April 14, 1535, because he was rebaptized. He was a weaver of Pietersbierum, Friesland. (K. Vos, Menno Simons, Leiden, 1914, p. 229.)

Sipkema, a Dutch Mennonite family, formerly living near Joure, Friesland, where some of them were deacons until recent times. Ane Sipkema (b. 1845 at Broek, d. 1926 at Amsterdam), at first engaged in farming, became a student at the Amsterdam Mennonite Seminary in 1868-74 and was a pastor 1888-1912, serving at Mensingeweer 1874-81, Borne 1881-88, and Edam 1888-1912. Johannes Wibbrandus Sipkema (b. 1914) studied at the university and the seminary at Amsterdam, thereupon serving the congregations of Terhorne 1938-42, Drachten 1942-47, Eindhoven and Breda 1947-56, and Aalsmeer 1956. vdZ.

Sipman, Dirck, a Quaker of Crefeld, Germany, probably a Mennonite before the Quaker meeting was established in 1679, with Jacob Telner (q.v.) and Jan Streppers, one of the promoters of the Germantown (Pa.) settlement of 1683 ff. He bought 5,000 acres in Pennsylvania from Benjamin Furly, Penn's agent in Rotterdam, in 1682 but never emigrated. He sold his land to other settlers in 1685 and 1698. H.S.B.

Sittard, a town in the Dutch province of Limburg (pop. c24,000; 94 per cent Roman Catholic), which until 1794 belonged to the duchy of Jülich (q.v.), was, like some of the neighboring villages, e.g., Hoingen, Millen, Gangelt, and Nieuwstad, a center of Anabaptist activity about 1530-34; later also some Anabaptists lived here. Lenart (q.v.) van Ysenbroeck and Theunis van Hastenrath (q.v.) baptized in this vicinity about 1550; the latter baptized Herman van Sittart, a surgeon. Remken Ramakers (q.v.) was burned at the stake at Sittard in 1550.

Gerhart Siebenacker (q.v.), the author of some beautiful hymns, was from this town, as apparently were also Gijsbertus Sittart (q.v.), a Mennonite (Flemish) preacher at Leiden until 1679, and the van Sittert (q.v.) family at Amsterdam and Haarlem. vdZ.

Sittart, Gijsbertus, apparently a physician, was a preacher of the Waterlander congregation at Leiden, Holland, serving there from before 1670 until at least 1679. In 1671 he negotiated with the trustees of the Leiden Flemish congregation concerning a merger of the Waterlanders with the Flemish, but without result. (The two congregations united in 1701.) In 1675 Sittart, called to account by the city magistrates, promised not to teach the doctrines of Socinus (q.v.). Sittart was the author of Jeugd-Oefening in de Ware Godsdienst Zo als de zelve onderwezen werd in de gemeente Christi (diemen de Waterlandsche Doops-gesinde gemeente noemd) binnen Leiden (Leiden, 1675; repr. there 1683 and 1704, and at Alkmaar, 1726). His daughter Remberta was married to Johannes Bremer, the Remonstrant pastor at Leiden, whose son Johannes Bremer (q.v.) was a well-known Mennonite pastor at Amsterdam. Hendrik Sittart, probably a descendant of Gijsbertus Sittart, was a deacon of the Leiden congregation from 1690. vdZ.

Sitter, de (de Sutter, de Zuttere), a Dutch Mennonite family, originally living in Flanders, Belgium. Some of them, who were farmers, moved to Dutch Zeeland Flanders in the early 17th century and joined the Aardenburg (q.v.) congregation. In the 17th and 18th centuries the de Sitters, then usually engaged in business such as textiles, one of them a manufacturer of white lead paint, are found in Rotterdam, where some of them were deacons of the Mennonite church. vdZ.

Sittert, van, a Dutch Mennonite family found at Amsterdam and Haarlem in the 17th and 18th centuries; in the 18th century a branch of this family was living at Zutphen and Winterswijk. Tieleman Tielen van Sittert (q.v.) was a member of this family; his son Sander van Sittert (d. c1690), married first to Anneken van Limburg, then to Clementia van Vollenhoven, was a noted cloth merchant at Amsterdam. vdZ.

Sittert, Tieleman Tielen van (d. 1664 at Amsterdam), was a Dutch Mennonite elder, originally belonging to the High Germans, a friend of Elder Leenaert Clock (q.v.). In 1630-39 he served as an elder of the united Frisian and High German congregation and, after the merger (1639) of this church with the Flemish, in the united Flemish-Frisian-High German congregation bij 't Lam until June 1664. After the Lamist-Zonist schism in June 1664 he served in the Zonist congregation for a few months until his death. Van Sittert, often called Tieleman Tielen without his family name, was conservative, strictly maintaining the old doctrines and ardently defending his view that his church was the only truly Christian church. Among the Flemish-Frisian-High German delegates assembled at Haarlem in 1649 it was especially van Sittert who advised the rejection of the request of the Waterlanders to merge with the Flemish. From about 1650 he showed himself a fierce opponent of Preacher Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) and Collegiant (q.v.) ideas. Meihuizen is of the opinion that the pamphlet Commonitio ofte Waerschouwinghe aen de Vlaemsche Doops-gesinde Gemeynthe binnen Amsterdam (n.p., 1655) was drawn up (probably Cornelis de Vries was the author) with the help and at any case in the spirit of van Sittert. In this booklet, whose author calls himself a "voorstand" (deacon) and member of the Amsterdam Flemish congregation, Galenus, David Spruyt, and Frank Beuns are severely attacked and charged with Socinianism. Tieleman Tielen was a noted personality among the conservative leaders and often conducted services, particularly baptism and communion services in other congregations, for example, at Utrecht and Hamburg-Altona.

Tieleman Tielen co-operated with Jan Cents (q.v.) and others in drawing up the Jan Cents confession of faith of 1630, on the basis of which the merger of the Frisian-High German group with the Flemish came about in 1639. He was the editor (publisher) of Christliche Glaubens-Bekentnus der Wajfenlosen und fürnehmlich in den Niederländern (unter dem nahmen der Mennonisten) Wohlbekanten Christen, wie auch Eiliche Christliche Gebährte eben derselben Glaubensbekenner . . . (Amsterdam, 1664, 1686, and 1691; n.p.-1711; Basel, 1822); an English edition was printed at Amsterdam in 1712 in behalf and upon the request of the Mennonites in Pennsylvania; a large number of reprints were published in America, both in English and German. This Christliche Glaubens-Bekentnus is a translation of the Dordrecht Confession (q.v.) of 1632. To the translation van Sittert added a number of prayers, seven hymns (written by Leenaert Clock), and a brief Mennonite history. This book was very popular among the South German, Alsatian, and American Mennonites; in places it is still used. vdZ.

Skalitz (Gallitz; Slovak, Scalica), a village located between Hosterlitz and Stignitz (Trstenice) in Mährisch-Kromau (Muravsky Krumlov), was the seat of two Hutterite Bruderhofs in the 16th century, the first founded in 1563. They were among the "upper households." In 1592 one of the Bruderhofs was abandoned, presumably because of heavy taxation. In 1605 much burning, murdering, and robbing was done in the remaining Bruderhof by the Bocskay troops. (Zieglschmid, Chronik.)

Skippack, a village in Skippack Twp., Montgomery Co., Pa., with a population of 3,224 (1950), near which are two Mennonite congregations, the Lower Skippack (q.v.) independent congregation, and the Upper Skippack congregation, usually called simply Skippack, of the Franconia Conference (MC). Skippack is also the site of the publication of a number of Mennonite books in the 19th century: the Dordrecht Confession of Faith, 1836; Henry Funck's Spiegel der Taufe, 1853 (German and English editions); Menno Simons' Fundament-Buch, 1851; the Waldeck Katechismus, 1848. A Skippack Mennonite preacher named Henry Bertolet started a monthly religious periodical entitled Der Evangelische Botschafter in 1836, but was unable to continue it beyond one issue. The name Skippack is spelled Schipbach in the introduction to Zwey Erbauliche Lieder, 1764, where Christopher Dock is called "Schulmeister an der Schipbach." This spelling is probably reminiscent of the Swiss name Schüpbach near Signau in the Emmental, canton of Bern. The Skippack is a small creek, a tributary of the Perkiomen.

On May 8, 1742, and on Oct. 19, 1745, the congregations in the Schiebach (Skippack) area wrote letters to the Zonist Mennonite congregation of Amsterdam, asking advice on how to retain the privileges granted to them by the King of England. They said that particularly the freedom from military service was endangered by the threat of war. They also asked for advice concerning translating into German and printing 1,000 copies of T. J. van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror, which they wanted especially for their youth. J.C.W.

Skippack Mennonite Church (MC) in Skippack Twp., Montgomery Co., Pa., is affiliated with the Franconia Conference (q.v.). Skippack was settled in 1702 by Johannes Custer, Claus Jansen, Jan Krey, and others. In 1717 the wealthy Matthias van Beber, Mennonite owner of the 6,000-acre tract on which the Mennonites settled, conveyed 100 acres to 7 Mennonite trustees named Sellen, Jansen, Ziegler, Custer, and three Kolb brothers, Henry, Martin, and Jacob. A meetinghouse was built here c1725, replaced in 1844 by a new one.

Preacher Martin Kolb had settled at Skippack by 1709, and Jacob Godshalk, who functioned as a bishop, arrived three or four years later. Henry Kolb also served as a preacher. Jacob Kolb was probably a deacon, for he was treasurer of the church funds. Claes Jansen and Michael Ziegler were preachers. The congregation has kept an alms book since 1738, which is a valuable source of information because the ordained men audited and signed it annually. Perhaps the ablest minister in the history of the congregation was Bishop Henry Hunsicker (1752-1836), ordained preacher 1781/82 and bishop soon thereafter. His son John Hunsicker (1773-1847) was the senior bishop in the Franconia Conference in the division of 1847 and with Oberholtzer withdrew from the conference. John Hunsicker's younger brother, Abraham Hunsicker (1793-1872), was ordained as preacher at Skippack on New Year's Day of 1847. He followed Oberholtzer in the division. In 1848 he and his son Henry A. Hunsicker established Freeland Seminary (q.v.) at Collegeville, Pa. (now Ursinus College). (See also Hunsicker.) The history of the portion of the congregation which withdrew from the Franconia Conference in 1847 is given under Lower Skippack. The portion which remained with the conference built a new meetinghouse one and one-fourth miles northwest of the old meetinghouse site in 1848. This building was replaced in 1950. The most prominent minister since 1847 was Jacob B. Mensch (1835-1912), preacher from 1867, antiquarian and unofficial secretary of the Franconia Conference from 1880. In 1958 the ministers were Jacob T. Landes and Daniel Reinford; the membership was 102.

Slackwater Mennonite Church (MC), located on Route 1, Millersville, Pa., was established in 1950; by 1957 it had 31 members, with Frank K. Garman as pastor. It is a member of the Lancaster Conference.

Slag(h)regen, a former Mennonite family of Amsterdam, Holland, members of the Flemish congregation and after the schism in 1664 of the Zonist (q.v.) Mennonite congregation, some of them serving as deacons. The Slagregens were also found in the Haarlem Waterlander congregation, where a few of its members were trustees of the congregational orphanage in the 17th and 18th centuries. Jacob Slagregen, d. 1853, a stone merchant at Amsterdam, was a trustee of the Oranjeappel (q.v.) orphanage in 1823-53 and a cofounder of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association. This family died out in the 19th century.

Slate Hill Mennonite Church (MC), located in the beautiful Cumberland Valley, 7 miles west of Harrisburg, Pa., began when David Martin (1767-1822), oldest son of Bishop Henry Martin of Weaverland, settled here. In 1810 the scattered members built a brick meetinghouse called "Martin" on an elevation on his farm. In 1831 the ministers were his brother David (1807-75) and William Westhafer (1782-1851). The second brick church was built in 1875. This has always been the strongest Mennonite congregation in the Cumberland Valley. It was the home congregation of Bishop Benjamin F. Zimmerman (1851-1930), Samuel Hess (1854-1948), and the present Bishop William M. Strong. The first Sunday school, headed by Jacob Mumma (1809-76), was held in 1872. The first Sunday-school meeting in the Lancaster Conference was held here on Nov. 5, 1896. In 1957 the ministers were Christian W. Zimmerman and Norman L. Zimmerman; the membership was 124.

Slavgorod, a city in the region of Tomsk in the Kulundian Steppes, Siberia, was established in the vicinity of the Barnaul (later Slavgorod) Mennonite settlement in 1909. The engineers in charge of building this city were Belyayev and Tchernov. Tchernov in particular, as a direct representative of the St. Petersburg government, helped the Mennonites in establishing the Slavgorod settlement (q.v.). The city was planned so that lots 140 x 175 ft. could be rented. By 1913 the streets were lighted. Slavgorod soon developed into a business center, particularly for the Mennonites. A number of Mennonite businesses were established here. Cornelius P. Wiens, Peter A. Friesen, and Jakob Dück had grocery and dry goods stores. Peter P. Friesen and Franz P. Friesen operated a flour mill. Mills were also owned by Peter F. Klassen, Jakob C. Friesen, H. Hamm and H. Miller, David Hübert, and Heinrich Hübert. Among the dealers in farm machinery were Bernhard Friesen and Peter J. Wiens. All these businesses were confiscated after the Revolution of 1917. After World War II the town had a population of 16,000. It is located on a branch of the Trans-Siberian railroad, 250 miles west of Barnaul.

In 1927 J. Wall, an M.B. minister, preached and conducted Bible conferences in the large Baptist church, which had been built in the previous year.

Klaus Mehnert, who visited Slavgorod in 1955, reports that the population was about 30,000, of whom approximately one third were of German background. He found a Baptist church, which is also attended by the Mennonites. At the time of his visit German services were not yet permitted. Meanwhile this permission has been granted. The minister told Mehnert that they had 300 registered members, but that the attendance was larger than the capacity of the church. Permission had not yet been granted to enlarge the church. (See also other articles under Slavgorod.)

Slavgorod City Mennonite Brethren Church was founded in Slavgorod in 1914, in the center of the Slavgorod Mennonite settlement (q.v.), Siberia. Worship services were originally conducted in private homes. After World War I a church was located on Sadovaya Street and later the old post office on Moscow Street was purchased and remodeled into a church. The first leading minister was Dietrich Friesen, followed by P. P. Friesen. They were assisted by Heinrich Hiebert and Gerhard Wiens. The church served the growing Mennonite population of the city of Slavgorod. Under the Soviets this church was closed. According to latest reports, Mennonites worship in the Baptist church of Slavgorod, which conducts some services in the German language. A report dated Feb. 8, 1927, states that J. Wall (MB) was working among the Russian Baptists, conducting Bible discussions and explaining the plan of salvation.

Slavgorod (Kulundian) Mennonite Brethren Church was established in the Slavgorod Mennonite settlement (q.v.), Siberia, in 1908. A minister, Sawatzky, of Alexandertal, Samara, served the group in 1908. In 1909 the following ministers joined the group, coming from various settlements: Aron Reimer, Jakob Bergen, Abram Ratzlaff, Peter Bergen, and Heinrich Janzen. The Mennonite Brethren were divided into five independent congregations known under the following names: Schönwiese, Schöntal, Alexandrovka, Gnadenheim, and Grishkovka. Quarterly meetings of the leading ministers took care of business and problems of a general nature. Each congregation had a church council and its regular congregational meetings. Periodically all the congregations joined in a meeting by sending one delegate to represent each 25 members.

In 1917 the Slavgorod Mennonite Brethren had 12 congregations, located at Schönwiese, Schöntal, Alexandrovka, Gnadenheim, Grishkovka, Fernheim, Saratov, Pashnya, Svistunovo, Tchayachy, Glyaden, and the town of Slavgorod. The first general elder was Johann Wiens, who organized congregations, ordained ministers and deacons, and led Bible discussions and ministerial courses. In 1910 he went to the Pavlodar settlement. He was succeeded by Aron Reimer, who left for Canada in 1925. Daniel Heide and Franz Friesen succeeded him. When Friesen emigrated to Canada, Heinrich Janzen took his place until 1929, when he also emigrated to Canada. Of special significance were the Sunday schools conducted on Sunday afternoons, the church choirs, and the harvest festivals. The Mennonite Brethren supported the Ob Mission (q.v.) among the Ostyaks. The following paragraphs report on the congregations with names beginning with letters preceding "O" which have not been taken care of in the ENCYCLOPEDIA. Congregations under "O" and following can be found under the following separate articles: Schönwiese M.B. Church, Saratov M.B. Church, Pashnya M.B. Church, Tchayachy M.B. Church, and Slavgorod M.B. Church.

Alexandrovka M.B. Church served the four villages of Alexandrovka, Orloff, Friedensfeld, and Tchernovka. The leading minister was Johann Schmidt, who left for Canada in 1926 and was succeeded by Cornelius Funk. They were assisted by Wilhelm Giesbrecht and Heinrich Teichrieb. Tina Hübert from this congregation served as a missionary among the Ostyaks in the Ob Mission (q.v.).

Gnadenheim M.B. Church served the villages of Gnadenheim, Blumenort, Ebenfeld, Kleefeld, Shumanovka, Halbstadt, and Hochstädt. The first leading minister was Isaak Braun, who was succeeded in 1926 by Heinrich M. Janzen, who was ordained elder. Other ministers were Heinrich Konrad, Peter Esau, Jakob Rogalsky, Bernhard Klassen, Franz Friesen, and Herman Klassen.

Grishkovka M.B. Church served nine villages: Grishkovka, Markovka, Karatal, Chortitzta, Stepnoye, Golyenkoye, Alexanderkrone, Dolinovka, and Suvorovka. A church was erected in Grishkovka. There were smaller places of worship in other villages. The first leading ministers were Abram Ratzlaff and Jacob Ott, assisted by Gerhard Giesbrecht, Peter Krause, Johann Pätkau, and David Janzen.

Fernheim M.B. Church served three villages: Fernheim, Gnadenheim, and Sergeyevka. A church was erected in Fernheim during World War I. The leading minister was Cornelius Klassen, assisted by Johann Wiebe, Nikolai Kliewer, Peter Dück, and David Friesen.

Glyaden M.B. Church served the four villages of Lichtfelde, Ebenfeld, Ivanovka, and Sluchaynoye. The leading minister, Jakob Peters, was assisted by Franz Wiens, Peter Enns, Gerhard Neumann, and Heinrich Unger. A church was erected in Sluchaynoye in 1912.

A smaller congregation was founded in Svistunovo serving the villages of Volinovka and Tchernyevka, with the ministers Jakob Löwen and Wilhelm Löwen.

During the Revolution and after the establishment of the communistic regime, severe hardships were inflicted on the faithful believers and worshipers. Gradually the tax for the ministers and the meetinghouses became unbearable. Many ministers were exiled. By 1932 organized religious activities including worship services were impossible.

Since the death of Stalin in 1953 some of the religious activities and work have been resumed. Worship services are conducted at various places and conversions and baptismal services are taking place. (See also Slavgorod Mennonite Church.)

Slavgorod Mennonite Church was established in 1908 in the Slavgorod Mennonite settlement (q.v.) in Siberia. Originally worship services were held in the village schools. In 1909 a congregational meeting was held in Orloff attended by Elder Jacob Gerbrandt and the ministers Franz Buller, Johann Bergmann, Peter J. Wiebe, Gerhard Wiebe, Dietrich Epp, and Isaak Löwen. In this brotherhood meeting the Slavgorod (Orloff) Mennonite Church was divided into five districts: (1) Orloff with 6 villages, (2) Grünfeld 5, (3) Reinfeld 8, (4) Kleefeld 8, and (5) Markovka 6. All ordained ministers were recognized as such, and Jakob Gerbrandt, who had attended Bethel College, North Newton, Kan., was charged with the responsibility of baptizing, administering the Lord's Supper, and the ordination of ministers and deacons in all the districts. However, each district had its own leading minister. Between Easter and Pentecost the traditional catechetical instruction took place, and at Pentecost the first baptismal service and Lord's Supper were observed in the large shed of Johann Klassen, of Grünfeld. First the church of the settlement was known as Orloff, but later as Schönsee. This article treats this general area church under the name of the settlement, Slavgorod. The church records and the handing out of church certificates were in the hands of P. J. Wiebe.

When Kornelius D. Harder (q.v.) came to the Slavgorod Mennonite settlement in 1912, he was ordained elder of the Orloff (Schönsee) Mennonite Church. Another of the outstanding elders was Franz Buller, who was one of the delegates to look for land in the Kulundian Steppes. During the first years the responsibilities of the elder originally assigned to Jakob Gerbrandt were probably shared by some of the leading ministers. Gradually each of the congregations, particularly the larger ones, became independent. Of the churches listed above, those which should have been treated in the preceding volumes of this ENCYCLOPEDIA will be reported in the following paragraphs. The others are found in alphabetical order in this volume. (See Schönsee [Orloff] Mennonite Church, Reinfeld Mennonite Church, Pashnya Mennonite Church, Tcha-yachy Mennonite Church, and Svistunovo Mennonite Church.)

Grünfeld Mennonite Church comprised five villages: Grünfeld, Nikolaidorf, Alexandrovka, Rosenwald, and Tchernovka. The first elder was Jakob Gerbrandt (q.v.), who was originally elder at large. He was assisted by the ministers Isaak Löwen, Dietrich Epp, Peter P. Epp, and Martin von Kampen. Later were added Abram Block, Heinrich Unruh, and Heinrich Krahn. Jakob Gerbrandt was soon succeeded by Peter P. Epp as leader of the general congregation. The congregation did not have a church building, but worshiped in schoolhouses.

Kleefeld Mennonite Church served the following eight villages: Kleefeld, Shumanovka, Halbstadt, Alexanderkrone, Gnadenheim, Blumenort, Ebenfeld, and Hochstädt. The first leading minister was Abram Dück, who was succeeded by Cornelius Wiens (d. 1918) as elder. Wiens was succeeded by Jacob Harder, who emigrated to Canada. After him Johann Goossen became the leading minister. In 1918 a spacious, beautiful church was erected in Kleefeld. Other ministers who served the congregation were Jacob Kliewer, Wilhelm Hübert, Jacob Voth, and Dietrich Geddert.

Markovka Mennonite Church served the following eight villages: Markovka, Chortitz, Stepnoye, Golyenkoye, Grishkovka, Karatal, Dolinovka, and Suvorovka. The first leading minister was Jacob Enns; he was succeeded by David Bäcker, who was ordained elder. Other ministers of the congregation were Anton Löwen, Peter Enns, Isaak Wiebe, Franz Derksen, Jacob Spent, David Heidebrecht, and Peter Konrad. In 1913 the congregation built a church in Markovka. In 1923 Jacob Nickel started a Jehovah's Witnesses group in this congregation.

Khoroshoye (Nikolayevka) Mennonite Church served four villages: Khoroshoye, Nikolayevka, Saratov, and Silberfeld. The first leader was Dietrich Görzen. He was assisted by the following ministers: Jacob Harder, Abram Penner, Johann Derksen, Johann Krüger, Peter Voth, Jacob Enns, Abram Wiebe, and Salomon Derksen. In 1924 the congregation built a church in Khoroshoye.

Gnadenal Mennonite Church served three villages: Gnadenal, Fernheim, and Sergeyeвка. The first leading minister was Isaak J. Fast, who was assisted by Franz Harder, Abram Unruh, Cornelius Penner, and Peter Wiens. The congregation started the building of a church under the Soviet government, which was then prohibited.

Glyaden Mennonite Church served the following four villages: Lichtfelde, Ebenfeld, Ivanovka, and Sluchaynoye. The elder of this congregation was Jacob Warkentin, assisted by Jacob Boldt, Samuel Boldt, and David Harder, who became a communist. The congregation built a church in Lichtfelde in 1920. At this place an Adventist group originated under the leadership of Peter Thiessen.

The Slavgorod Mennonite Church was unique in difficulties to be surmounted. The congregations had barely been organized and had barely overcome the first pioneer difficulties when World War I broke out, which ended with the Revolution of 1917 ushering in a civil war and finally the communistic regime. All the congregations, although they had been registered in Tomsk in 1912, had to be registered now under the new Soviet government in Omsk. The hardships and antireligious attitude of the government, together with the accompanying exile of ministers and the taxation of church property, resulted in the cessation by 1932 of all official religious and worship activities. A few church leaders had left for Canada; most had been exiled, and many perished in exile. Since the Slavgorod Mennonite settlement, unlike the settlements of the Ukraine, was not completely disrupted, religious activities have been resumed more readily since the death of Stalin (1953) than among some of the scattered Mennonites in other regions.

It has not become apparent to what extent the Slavgorod Mennonite settlement has benefited by the greater religious liberty which is noticeable throughout the Asiatic communities in which Mennonites live. However, great changes have taken place. A letter written by Margarete Koop, who is living in the Slavgorod settlement, states that she had not been able to attend any worship services for a number of years (published in Menn. Rundschau, Dec. 12, 1956). Franz Thiessen, of Blumenort, Slavgorod, writes that there was no preaching of the Gospel in 1931-55. Now many, including Thiessen, are starting to preach. Scarcity of Bibles and hymnals compels them to copy hymnals by hand (Menn. Rundschau, Oct. 10, 1956, p. 6). Another letter reports that many people have been converted and that some, of whom it was never expected, have started to preach the Gospel (Bote, Jan. 2, 1957, p. 7). The Baptist church of the city of Slavgorod (q.v.), which Klaus Mehnert visited in 1955, was attended by many Mennonites when there was no other possibility for Mennonite public services. The church did not yet have permission to enlarge its facilities, but in 1956 it received permission to have German preaching. A letter written by the daughter of Margarete Boldt, in Orloff, Slavgorod, states that Peter Voth is to serve as elder in the neighboring church which has just been opened (Bote, Jan. 25, 1956, p. 7 f.). Anna Stobbe of Ivanovka, Glyaden, Slavgorod, writes that many conversions are taking place and that a new Mennonite Brethren church has been organized (Menn. Rundschau, Dec. 12, 1956, p. 11). Such information indicates that general revival of religious life and the permission for Mennonites to meet even though they are not registered are also noticeable in the Slavgorod Mennonite settlement.

Slavgorod Mennonite Orphanage was organized in 1919, when Peter Löwen, of Halbstadt in Slavgorod Mennonite settlement (q.v.) of Siberia, placed his newly established home at the disposal of the settlement for the purpose of caring for the orphans of the community. The dedication took place in September 1919. Some 50 orphans had been accepted. Mr. and Mrs. Nikolai Friesen, of Gnadenheim, were the house parents, assisted by a Vollrat, of Germany. Jacob Derksen, of Schöntal, was the teacher. The Mennonite community was responsible for the support of the institution. Help for the workers was received from private sources and through the Mennonites of America. Of the two freight car loads of clothing which came from North America to Slavgorod, the orphanage received a considerable share. Soon the Communist Party caused difficulties. Under pressure of the Soviet government the orphanage dissolved and the children were distributed in families.

Slavgorod Mennonite Settlement, also known as Barnaul (q.v.) Mennonite settlement, is located in the Kulundian Steppes between the Irtysh and the Ob rivers in West Siberia, a part of the USSR in the Altai Territory (formerly Tomsk). The settlement was at first called Barnaul, since this was the only city in the area at the time of the settlement in 1907. In 1911, when the city of Slavgorod was established ten miles from the settlement, the settlement took this name.

(1) The Settlement. When the government in 1906 announced the availability of land in the Kulundian Steppes, Mennonites became interested and sent representatives from the settlements of Zagradovka, Ufa, Samara, and Orenburg. In the Orenburg (q.v.) settlement Heinrich Neumann and a Hiebert took the initiative and called a meeting for Aug. 20, 1906, at which a committee of eight was elected. On September 20, Heinrich Krüger and Jakob B. Peters were delegated to investigate the Kulundian Steppes. In October the two delegates reported about their findings. At the end of April 1907 Krüger and Peters were sent again to Siberia for final arrangements. Here they met with the following representatives from Zagradovka: Franz Buller, J. D. Wiebe, Abraham Dück, Isaac Friesen, and Jakob B. Peters. The Davlekanovo Mennonites of Ufa also had investigated the settlement possibilities and had been in touch with others. Jakob A. Reimer met Stolypin (q.v.), who recommended the Barnaul area for settlement. When Franz Buller was in St. Petersburg in the interest of this matter, he was asked to investigate land along the Amur River. The representative from Samara was Heinrich Lorenz. Jakob B. Peters of Orenburg, Jakob A. Reimer of Ufa, and Isaac Friesen and Abraham Dück of Zagradovka continued the trip to the Amur (q.v.) region to investigate land. Upon their return, Reimer and Peters stopped in Barnaul to make arrangements for settlement in the Kulundian Steppes near Barnaul.

Fifty-nine villages consisting of Mennonites from all the major settlements of European Russia were established in the Slavgorod settlement on some 162,000 acres (60,000 dessiatines). They were given a reduction in railroad fare to the place of settlement, were exempted from taxes for five years and from government services for three years, received a loan of 160 rubles and also a credit loan of 160 rubles, and the land free of charge. The beginnings were especially difficult because of the distance from the railroad. The nearest railroad stations and also the harbor of Pavlodar on the Irtysh River were 150 miles away. The settlers raised wheat, oats, and other grains. The winter set in early and lasted long, leaving a short season for raising the grains and harvesting them. Of the promised 160 rubles only 100 were actually paid out. The lumber for building had to be gotten from the royal forest about 70 miles away. It was hard to obtain even the essential food supplies such as flour until Mennonites established their own mills.

An outstanding leader of the pioneer days was the Oberschulze Jacob A. Reimer (q.v.), from Zagradovka. With the establishment of Slavgorod (q.v.) as a city and district, this also became a business and industrial center, which improved the conditions of the new settlement. The government representative was located here and supervised the establishment of the settlement. Stolypin (q.v.), the premier of Russia, paid a visit to the Mennonites in 1910, which helped the development of the settlement.

The surrounding population consisted to a large extent of descendants of former Czarist exiles known as Chaldony. This population was extremely hospitable and honest, and of great help to the Mennonites in the pioneer days. In addition to these there were also the descendants of religious exiles such as the Baptists. Ukrainians and other Germans had also settled in this territory. The administration of the settlement was located in Orloff (q.v.). In 1920 an additional administration district was established in Chortitza.

The original settlement consisted of 36 villages. Later additional border settlements were added consisting of three to five villages each. Thirty miles from Slavgorod, Fernheim, Sergeyeвка, and Gnadenental were established in 1910 with 38 farms each. In 1912 four more villages were established some 20 miles southeast of Slavgorod, viz., Nikolayevka, Silberfeld, Khoroshoie, and Saratov.

In 1908 the Glyaden (q.v.) or Lichtfelde settlement, with four villages, originated some 80 miles from Slavgorod, consisting of Lichtfelde, Ebenfeld, Ivanovka, and Sluchaynoye. Another settlement, which was a part of the Slavgorod area in 1912, became known as Pashnya (q.v.) and consisted of the five villages of Grigoryevka, Markovka, Ananyevka, Ekaterinovka, and Zhelanovka. The location was about 70 miles from Slavgorod. Another settlement was Tchayatchy, consisting of the three villages of Nikolayevka, Alexeyevka, and Tatyannovka. Some settlers from here went to the Amur (q.v.) area in 1924.

(2) Agriculture and Industry. The villages of the settlements were similar to those of the mother settlements in European Russia. Summer wheat was the predominant grain produced. The farms followed the four-field rotation system. Summer was short and much work had to be done during this time. Products were very cheap during the first years because of lack of markets and transportation facilities. Farm machinery had been brought along from the old settlements. The first industrial undertakings were the common blacksmith shop and carpenter shops in which the farm implements were repaired. J. Walde, Lichtfelde, had a wagon and fanning mill factory. Windmills and mills driven by horsepower were established in order to produce the necessary flour. In 1911 Abram Tjart erected a steam flour mill for $67,500, which was nationalized in 1923 by the Soviet government. Jacob Martens erected another steam flour mill in Alexandrovka.

Some of the villages had grocery stores and other business enterprises: Franz Dyck in Orloff, Johann Abrahams in Rosenwald, Jacob Dyck in Slavgorod. Other businesses, such as farm machinery sales and mills, were established in Slavgorod. A Danish-Siberian company had numerous stores in the Mennonite and surrounding settlements. Co-operative stores, dairies, seed stores, etc., became common, particularly after the Revolution. The dairy co-operatives enabled the Mennonites to sell butter at a favorable price. In 1916 the Slavgorod Mennonite settlement was connected with the Trans-Siberian railroad by a branch line leading from Tatarskaya to Slavgorod, which was extended later to the city of Pavlodar (q.v.). This was a great improvement for the settlement.

The Slavgorod settlement built a hospital in Orloff village in 1911, in which Gerhard Fast served for a while as doctor. A number of midwives did significant work; e.g., Mrs. David Thielmann, Mrs. Jacob Voth, and Mrs. Franz Derksen. In 1919 the Slavgorod orphanage (q.v.) was opened for 50 orphans in the village of Halbstadt. In addition to the many elementary schools there was a Zentral-schule in Orloff and later for a while in Grishkovka and Schöntal.

The judges of the volost court were Johann Fast and Andreas B. Siebert. The first secretary was Peter Renpenning. In 1916 the second volost was established in Chortitza so that the settlement was under two separate administrations. The first Oberschulze of Chortitza was Jacob Nickel, and the first secretary Peter Töws. In 1922 the two administrations of Orloff and Chortitza were merged with the neighboring Russian administrations. Thus the Mennonite self-administration came to a close. In 1927 a district government (rayon) was established in Halbstadt, which included all German settlers. Later this was discontinued.

(3) From World War I to World War II. During World War I the young men of the Slavgorod settlement were drafted to serve in forestry and as hospital workers on the Caucasian front. In September 1916, 161 of the 200 men aged 42-43 were drafted and went to the Caucasus to serve in offices and hospitals. Some died of typhoid fever. The majority of the drafted men did forestry service. After the Revolution in 1917 most of the young men returned. Siberia was a battlefield between the White army led by Kolchak and the Red army, ending with a victory of the latter. Some Mennonites were drafted into the White army.

After the Revolution the German settlers organized a Slavgorod section of the Union of German Citizens of Russia (Verband deutscher Bürger Russlands), of which Peter A. Friesen was the chairman. At this time there were some hopes that Siberia would become an independent country in which the German element would have its own state. When the Soviets gained power the Union was dissolved.

In 1923 a section of the All-Russischer Mennonitischer Landwirtschaftlicher Verein (AMLV) was organized in Slavgorod with its headquarters in Orloff. As in European Russia the purpose was to promote agriculture and cultural objectives in general. The report made to the AMLV by H. Friesen, a representative of the Slavgorod Mennonite settlement, on Feb. 12, 1922, stated that the total Mennonite population in December 1921 was 14,890; the city of Slavgorod had 254 Mennonites in a total German population of 30,500, consisting of Mennonites, Lutherans, and Catholics. He pointed out that in 1921 they had been able to send food to the Mennonite settlements of Samara and the Volga district to help the starving. By 1922 the situation had changed considerably; because of the heavy requisition of grain no seed wheat was left for 1923. American Mennonite Relief furnished aid. However, P. F. Froese's report given in August 1924 on the extended trip he made with other representatives of the AMLV, including Alvin J. Miller of the American Mennonite Relief, through the Mennonite settlements of Siberia and particularly Slavgorod, says that there was actual starvation, lack of clothing and bedding, machinery, horses, and cattle. His report, although not hopeless, was extremely gloomy, and indicated dire need.

Some of this help was furnished when W. P. Neufeld and M. B. Fast of Reedley, Cal., collected clothing and sent it to Siberia via Vladivostok. The poverty-stricken non-Mennonite population was also helped by the American Mennonite Relief, through seed loans, wool, flax, and cotton, for the processing of which spinning wheels and looms were furnished (Unruh, 22). Decline and disruption was caused by the Revolution of 1917 and the ensuing civil war, crop failures, and the excessive expropriation of food stocks by the Soviet government.

The American representative, Alvin Miller, and the president of the Russian Verband, Peter F. Froese, attended a meeting held in the Slavgorod settlement in 1924. The seat of the organization was transferred to Slavgorod. Gradually the Slavgorod Mennonites overcame the extreme crisis. In 1925 P. B. Epp reported that gradual improvement was noticeable. Particularly the co-operative organized in 1923 and the stimulation which came through the branch office and headquarters of the AMLV in Moscow did much to improve economic conditions. The settlement co-operated in the selective seed program and the establishment of co-operative dairy organizations. By 1925 the AMLV had 960 members in this area. Froese, who attended the local meeting in 1926, could report more optimistically about the conditions. Epp reported that a new spirit had seized the settlers; buildings were in progress and improvements and repairs were noticeable ev-everywhere. J. Epp found 26 Fordson tractors acquired by the co-operatives. He still found some signs of "America fever," but only a few had left for Canada. In the 1930's this revival of personal initiative came to a close and a complete and radical collectivization program was inaugurated similar to that found everywhere in the Soviet Union.

According to a report given by H. Friesen, a representative of the Mennonites of the Slavgorod settlement in 1922, this settlement was divided into seven rayons (districts) in 1917. The population was expected to deliver grain to the government regardless of what had been harvested. A general retrogression was noticeable, as is evidenced in the following table: in 1920 the settlement had 3,005 horses, 1,530 cows, 1,702 sheep, and 710 pigs; in 1927 there were only 1,752 horses, 1,205 cows, 1,600 sheep, and 515 pigs. Similar retrogression was reported in farm machinery. For education the barest necessities were not available.

Confiscation, inflation, and various other policies of the newly established Soviet government, including the NEP, followed in rapid succession in Siberia. The NEP period was characterized by an increase in dairy organizations. However, by 1922 many were considering emigration to America. Two delegates were sent to Moscow in 1922 to inquire about the possibilities. Peter B. Epp, while attending a meeting of the Verband in Moscow in 1925, and others went to the GPU in the Lubyanka office to get information about emigration possibilities. Some Slavgorod families left in 1925. The following year a larger number followed. A committee was organized and an English physician came to examine the emigrants. Among those leaving were Elder Kornelius A. Harder and Peter B. Epp. The emigrants, which did not exceed 200, went to Canada and Mexico. (NEP = New Economic Policy).

Meanwhile Stalin introduced his five-year plan and with it sealed the fate of the farmers. Since the conditions became more difficult, a few farmers went to Moscow in 1929 hoping to obtain permission to leave the country. When they succeeded, large numbers followed them. Some received permission to leave, but the vast majority were returned in freight trains. Those who had sold everything had very difficult times. Most of those who emigrated finally got to Paraguay and settled in the Fernheim (q.v.) colony.

In 1930-31 all the villages were organized as collective farms. Many farmers and families were exiled, and great numbers perished. A number of the European Russian Mennonites who were exiled to Siberia under Stalin's rule, or were evacuated eastward in 1941 when the Germans occupied the Ukraine, doubtless found their way to the Slavgorod settlement after completing their term as exiles. Letters received by relatives in America indicate this.

A vivid description of conditions among the Slavgorod Mennonites is given by Klaus Mehnert in the article "Deutsche—vom Sturme verweht" (Der Bote, issues of Sept. 5, 12, 19, 1956). He visited the Mennonites through the publication office of the paper Arbeit in Barnaul. He judges that in the Kulundian Steppes there are some 200,000 to 250,000 people of German background. He had an extensive visit on the collective farm composed of five Mennonite villages consisting of 289 families with 1,025 persons. The 571 workers are divided into three groups, one taking care of the farming, the second the animals, and the third the buildings, homes, sheds, etc. A considerable amount of virgin land had been added to the collective farm. The farm had 514 cows, 356 pigs, and 512 sheep, and had been distinguished at the Moscow agricultural exhibition. For 1955 the monthly wages of an individual were 257 rubles and 110 kilograms of grains.

Mehnert found that the children were unable to understand High German, but they still spoke "Mennonitisch" (Plattddeutsch). The school was conducted in the Russian language. Recently the area was given permission to use the German language but decided to stay with the Russian. From his German point of view, the writer stated that he had never found a German settlement in all his journeys throughout the world which depressed his heart more than that of Slavgorod. It was not so much the poverty as the general despondency and apathy of the people, who no longer knew whence they had come and whither they were going. (Regarding the latest developments in the realm of religious life, see Slavgorod Mennonite Church.)

Slavgorod Mennonite Volost (administration) came into being with the establishment of the Barnaul (Slavgorod) Mennonite settlement (q.v.) in the Kulundian Steppes of Siberia. The seat of the administration (volost) was in Orloff. The first Oberschulze was Jacob A. Reimer (q.v.), who was followed by Abram Koop, Abram Wittenberg, Abram Fast, Gerhard Klippenstein, Abram Töws, and Heinrich Friesen. Reimer did much for the establishment of the settlement. The first secretary was Peter Renpenning. The Oberschulze received 300 rubles and the secretary 500 rubles per year. In connection with the volost there was a court which met a number of times monthly to take action on minor offenses. Judges were Johann Fast and Andreas B. Siebert. The volost building at Orloff had a small jail.

In 1916 the Slavgorod settlement was divided and a second administration was created in the Chortitza Volost. Nine villages belonged to this district. No special building was erected. The first Oberschulze was Jacob Nickel, and the secretary was Johann Löwen, who was succeeded by Peter Töws, H. Philippsen, and Helen Friesen. In 1920 Peter B. Epp became the Oberschulze of the Chortitza Volost, later succeeded by Heinrich Goossen and Isaak Derksen.

In 1923 the two Mennonite volosts of Orloff and Chortitza were merged with the Russian volosts of that region. The Orloff administration was transferred to the Russian volost of Znamenka and the Chortitza administration to the volost of Slavgorod. This brought the Mennonite self-administration to a close. In 1927 the German settlements of the Slavgorod region were merged into one district (rayon) with the seat of the administration at Halbstadt. All Mennonite, Lutheran, and Catholic German villages were under this administration, which was dominated by Communists, who received their directives from the Communist Party. In the 1930's this administration was dissolved and the pattern of administration established in 1923 was revived.

After the Revolution of 1917, when efforts were made to establish an independent Siberian government in Tomsk, the Mennonites also sent their representative, Franz F. Froese, to the Siberian Duma. After a defeat of the Communists in 1918, and a revival of the Duma with the help of the Czechoslovaks, Mennonites were again represented by such men as Franz F. Froese, Johann Penner, Peter Boldt, and Heinrich Boldt. Kolchak, the leader of the White army, dissolved the Duma.

The Mennonites also participated in the establishment of the Verband Deutscher Bürger Russlands (Union of German Citizens of Russia) in 1917, which aimed to establish an autonomous Siberia with an independent German state. Mennonite representatives in this Union were Peter A. Friesen, Franz F. Froese, H. H. Wiens, and others. This organization aimed to prepare a legal pattern for a better future of the settlement.

Another organization which played a significant role was a Slavgorod section of the All-Russischer Mennonitischer Landwirtschaftlicher Verein (q.v.), of which Heinrich Friesen, Johann Görz, and Abram Friesen were the first officers. After the permanent establishment of the Soviet government, Mennonite self-administration and organizations in any form disappeared. (See also Slavgorod Mennonite Settlement.)

Slavgorod Mennonite Zentralschule was first established in Slavgorod, Siberia, in 1917 through the Deutscher Verein with Franz F. Fröse, Aron Rempel, and Miss Neumann as teachers. This school operated only one year. In 1918 the Mennonite Church established a Zentralschule in Orloff with Heinrich D. Willms and Anna A. Chechulin as teachers. The Mennonite Brethren established a Zentralschule in Schöntal with Gerhard Fast and Olga G. Pobedimov as teachers. After the first year the schools were merged and transferred to Gnadenheim. Heinrich D. Willms and Eugenia G. Pobedimov served as teachers. In 1921-22 Jacob Wedel taught German and Bible. Wassily S. Modin and his son and daughter were also on the teaching staff. After this the school was closed.

Sponsored by Heinrich Wiens, of Grishkovka, the proprietor of a mill, Anton A. Löwen (q.v.) started a Zentralschule in 1918. Löwen's death in 1921 was soon followed by the death of the sponsor, and the school was discontinued. By this time it had become impossible to maintain a religious secondary school in Siberia.

Foundation gold medal. Van Slee received an honorary Th.D. degree from the University of Groningen in 1914.

Sleep of the Soul, the doctrine that the human soul passes into a state of sleep or dormancy at death, from which it will not awake until Christ appears for judgment. Many of its adherents understood it to be a state of forgetfulness, a sort of dream life without consciousness. Thus the ancient Greeks had the concept that the departed would drink of the stream of forgetfulness (Lethe), which obliterated all memory of their past life. Similar views are found in Christendom. Paulsen, for instance, says, "The imagery of the soul's sleep expresses the nature of the interim state of the soul; the idea that the soul sleeps is substantiated by those who have been roused from the dead, inasmuch as the awakened ones can give no information about death, as would be the case if they had remained fully conscious." Others, on the other hand, understand the sleep of the soul to be a sleep with consciousness (Schleiermacher in Morgenstern, No. 5, p. 98). Of Luther it is said that he "imagined the fathers and likewise the pious dead to be in a state of sleep, which was peaceful for them, because they were preserved and held in the faith in God's Word as in a womb" (Loofs, 779, note 8).

Calvin (q.v.), in his Psychopannychia (1544), counts the Anabaptists as one of the groups believing in the sleep of the soul, which is, however, obviously an error (see especially Hulshof, 188, note 2). Also Friedrich Spannheim (q.v.) asserts that the Mennonites held the belief in the sleep of the soul; the assertion is vigorously refuted by Maatschoen. Karl Müller, the church historian of Tübingen, thought the doctrine was definitely held by the Anabaptists in the Romance countries. The fact is, there is no convincing evidence that such a belief was held by the Anabaptists or Mennonites anywhere. NEFF.

Sleeping Preacher Churches, a term sometimes applied to those Amish Mennonite churches which had their origins about 1907 in the teachings and influence of John D. Kauffman (q.v.), the Amish bishop who preached full sermons while apparently in a trance. In 1957 six congregations with a total membership of 540 had this background, although several of these churches have deviated considerably from the practices of their first congregations. Sermons in those churches most loyal to the original pattern make frequent mention of Kauffman's teachings, referring to his statements as the preaching of the Spirit, so that one hears the statement, "The Spirit taught us . . ." His biographer, Pius Hostetler, explains that they think of his discourses as "Spirit preaching," i.e., actually the words of the Holy Spirit. What Kauffman taught in his periods of trance is therefore regarded as an authoritative interpretation of the Bible and as completely binding upon his followers. Thus Kauffman's teaching that men below 30 years of age should not be ordained to preach would be regarded as authoritative in those churches adhering most strictly to their early standards.

Originally these congregations had only German services, and no Sunday schools, prayer meetings, evangelistic meetings, nor youth and women's organizations. Their first congregation, Mt. Hermon (q.v.) near Shelbyville, Ill., now has English services and little is said about "Spirit preaching," which is also true of the Linn Township (q.v.) congregation. The third congregation in Illinois, Fairfield (q.v.), which broke away from the Mt. Hermon church in 1933 and was established in Henry County in 1938, is perhaps the most conservative of all, using German in its services and emphasizing Kauffman's "Spirit preaching." It has no fellowship with the Linn Township church but recently has had with the Mt. Hermon congregation. The Harrisburg (q.v.), Ore., congregation no longer considers itself a Sleeping Preacher church, although some of its members are related to those in the Illinois congregations and there is social fellowship between them. With its English services, Sunday school, prayer meetings, sewing circle, young people's meeting, Bible school, and missionary outreach, it is following the pattern of the Conservative Mennonite Conference, although not affiliated with this body. A split in this congregation led to the establishment of a more conservative group, the Pleasant Valley (q.v.) Church at Yoncalla, Ore. This congregation in turn was divided when its most conservative faction moved to Allendale, S.C., establishing the unorganized congregation of Pilgrims (q.v.), which is attempting to establish a "Spirit preaching" church similar to the Fairfield congregation. Sleeswijk, a Dutch Mennonite family, formerly found in the province of Friesland. Frederick Samuelz (c1605-April 22, 1680), from 1668 calling himself Sleeswij(c)k, was a Mennonite preacher at Harlingen; he had a yarn and linen shop, and was also engaged in a shipping ring; he was probably well-to-do. He married Antie Salomons, whose father, Salomon Jansz Buylaert, had in his youth immigrated with his parents from Gent, Flanders. His son Sicke (Sixtus) Sleeswyck (b. 1644 at Harlingen, d. 1705 at Workum), married to Catalina Jans Mesdag(h), of Alkmaar, was a physician at Workum, whose son Gillis (Jillis) (d. 1743) was a baker at Workum, and whose grandson Rienk (d. 1789) was a merchant at Workum. They were all Mennonites, but some branches of the Sleeswijk family left the Mennonite Church in the 18th century. vdZ.

Sleutel, a former Mennonite family at Hoorn, Dutch province of North Holland, descended from Elder Jan Willems (q.v., d. 1588), of Hoorn, who had nine children. The oldest of them was Pieter Jansz Lioren (q.v.); Jacob Fransz (1608-71), a grandson of Jan Willems, took the family name of Sleutel. He joined the (Old) Frisian congregation at Hoorn, of which Pieter Jansz Twisck (q.v.) was the elder. Jacob Sleutel wrote a number of hymns found in Claes Stapel's Lusthof des Gemoeds. His sister Aechtjen (Aagtje) was married to Willem Maartens Seylemaker (q.v.); their children usually also took the family name of Sleutel. Among them was Jan Willems Sleutel (1654-93), who in 1678 was appointed preacher (later elder) of the Frisian congregation of Hoorn; the elder of the congregation was Pieter Jans Twisck Jr., who was conservative and ambitious like his grandfather. Jan Willems Sleutel, being more progressive and mild in the practice of ban and avoidance, became involved in trouble with Elder Twisck, and in 1687 withdrew, in the next year however serving again. In 1690 a schism arose and Twisck with about thirty members left the main body, forming the "Plempsche" (q.v.) congregation. Shortly before his death Jan Willems Sleutel succeeded in merging the Frisian and the Flemish congregations at Hoorn. vdZ.

Sleyden (Sleiden), van (der), a Dutch Mennonite family, formerly living at Leiden and Rotterdam, where they were members and often deacons of the Flemish congregations. Isaack Leensz van Sleyden was a deacon of the Leiden Flemish church in 1683-87, as was his brother Samuel from 1689. Their brother Laurens at the same time took part in the Collegiant (q.v.) movement, as did also most members of the Rotterdam branch of this family, e.g., Anthony van Sleyden, the son of Barend van Sleyden, and Barendina Bredenburg. The Rotterdam van Sleydens were outstanding merchants (wine, textiles). Both the Leiden and Rotterdam branches died out in the 19th century. (Church records of Leiden and Rotterdam.) vdZ.

Slotel, Die, van dat Secreet des Nachtsmaels (The Key to the Mystery of the Communion) is an important treatise in the Dutch language on the doctrine of the communion, both on the Last Supper of Jesus with His disciples and on the communion services as observed in the Christian churches. The author combats the doctrine of transubstantiation as taught by the Roman Catholic Church: the words of Christ, "This is my body," and "This is my blood," do not mean that bread and wine really became His flesh and blood, but that they represented His flesh and blood. Again and again the author emphasizes that "those who go to the communion table to obtain forgiveness of sin" have "a blind doctrine." He also attacks Luther's doctrine of consubstantiation.

Then the author broadly presents his own view: The Christian communion is an analogy to the Jewish Passover. It was not the eating of the Pascal lamb that saved them, nor does the eating of the bread in the communion service redeem Christians. The Jews ate their Passover with thankful hearts that they were freed from the Egyptian slavery; in the same way the Christians eat the bread in gratitude for release from the power of sin and from death and hell. During the first eating of the Passover the Jews in Egypt had not yet actually been liberated, but they praised God for His promise, which would surely be realized. In the same way the disciples of Christ praised God in joyful thankfulness, because they believed in the promise of God, then not yet fulfilled. God's promise was fulfilled at Calvary's cross. Therefore the believers should meet and hold their Lord's Supper in joyful gratitude; "The spirit of the heart must eat and not only the mouth." The author attacks the views of Carlstadt (q.v.) and Campanus (q.v.), who believed that communion services were of little value.

The author also deals with the question of who should be called to the communion services and who is allowed to eat the bread and to drink the wine. In Israel, he says, only those were admitted to the Passover lamb who bore the token of circumcision. Among the Christians only those should approach the communion who are "inwardly circumcised, i.e., who believe in Christ and who are baptized." It is not clear, however, whether the author means here baptized by water or by the Holy Ghost. But one thing is evident: all those, who are still living according to the flesh, are not allowed to draw near to the table of Christ. The communion should be held in the congregation of believers, which is identical with the body of Christ. Those who wish to take part in the communion must be "alive" (i.e., faithful), not "sick" (i.e., doubting the grace of God). They must be "hungry" (i.e., desiring to proclaim the glory of God) and "thirsty" (i.e., longing for salvation).

There is not much uncertainty as to the author of Die Slotel van dat Secreet des Nachtmals. Though the treatise is anonymous, a number of old witnesses, e.g., Kloppeis (q.v.) and de Zuttere (q.v.), have ascribed it to Henric Rol (q.v.). Samuel Cramer believes it to have been written between 1531 and Nov. 8, 1533. The first and second editions have been lost; a third edition appeared without date about 1563. This edition, also containing Eyne rechte Bedijnckung hoe dat Lichaem Christi van onsen lichaem tho onder-scheyden isz, probably by the same author, was edited by Pieter de Zuttere (Petrus Overd'hage, q.v.). It was republished from this third edition, copies of which are very rare, in Bibliotheca Reformatoria Neerlandica V (The Hague, 1909) and provided with introduction and notes by Samuel Cramer. vdZ.

Sloten (Slooten), a town in the Dutch province of Friesland (1947 pop. 711; 20 Mennonites), formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation. This congregation was founded in the 16th century, likely by the activity of Elder Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.), who between 1551 and 1582 repeatedly visited Sloten, baptizing 59 or perhaps 62 persons, a number of whom may, however, have lived in surrounding villages. Of the history of the Sloten congregation there is not much information. In later times it belonged to the more progressive Waterlander branch. In 1695 it numbered about 50 members (there were 47 members who did not receive financial support from the deacons). In the Naamlijst of 1731 it is called Sloten and Lemmer, but this is not quite correct; the Lemmer (q.v.) and Sloten congregations did not merge until 1748. In 1731 there were three lay preachers; one of them was Ruurd Douwes Kooyma, who served 1720-65. After 1781 the pulpit remained vacant. The Naamlijst states that the Sloten congregation was united with that of neighboring Legemeer (q.v.); but this union did not save the congregation, for in 1789 the Sloten congregation was dissolved, the few remaining members joining the Balk congregation. vdZ.

Slovakia, formerly the northwestern section of the Kingdom of Hungary (called Upper Hungary), now part of the Czechoslovakian Republic. It is situated between Danube in the south and the Carpathian Mountains in the north, between the March River on the west (Austrian border) and the Gran River on the east; it is rich in mineral ores (gold, silver, etc.) and warm springs. Its capital is Bratislava (German Pressburg, Magyar Pozsony). It was here that the kings of Hungary (Hapsburgs) were crowned and the Diet met until, after the defeat of the Turks (c1700), the center shifted back to Budapest.

In the 16th-18th centuries this country was occupied mainly by manorial lords called "magnates," most of whom were of the Hungarian Reformed faith (Calvinists), strongly independent of the Hapsburg government in Vienna. They were organized under a Palatine or viceroy who represented the king in Hungary but frequently refused to accept orders from Vienna. The country bordered on that part of Hungary which was occupied by the Turks (1526-1700), and consequently suffered much by the numerous Turkish invasions, although the more remote mountain areas were less molested than the area along the Danube road. The lords were for the most part as tolerant as the Moravian nobles and were glad to receive Anabaptists as their tenants or "neighbors" (the Anabaptists always tried to buy land rather than to rent it; everywhere they were independent and free).

From 1546 on Slovakia was a refuge for Moravian Anabaptists (Hutterites), although the number of Bruderhofs in Slovakia never exceeded 14 or 15, as compared with the 80 to 90 in adjacent Moravia. (ME II, 859 f., lists all the known Bruderhofs of Slovakia, and gives a map showing their locations.) In the 18th century, when the Hapsburgs eventually gained the upper hand also in Hungary (the Turks had been driven out by Prince Eugene of Savoy, the imperial generalissimo, by 1700) and the independence of the Hungarian magnates was broken, the Jesuits entered this former Calvinistic sanctuary and the Anabaptists were doomed. Those who accepted Catholicism could remain (see Habaner); the rest had to leave as best they could, migrating to the Ukraine (see Hutterites).

The story of the Slovakian settlements of the Hutterites is closely related to their story in Moravia (q.v.) and is in part understandable only in the total context. Though somewhat more sheltered than Moravia, the new Bruderhofs did not produce any great spiritual leader; thus Slovakia became a place for the preservation of the faith and ways of the fathers rather than aggressive new ideas. All the outstanding Hutterite personalities are intimately connected with Moravia, the only exception being the great Vorsteher Andreas Ehrenpreis (q.v.), active in 1630-62. He could be called "the second founder of the brotherhood" inasmuch as the Hutterites of today are to a much greater extent Ehrenpreis's people than Hutter's people.

In 1546 Sobotiste (German, Freischütz), in the northern part near the Moravian border, became the first settlement of the Hutterites in Slovakia; some of the old houses still exist at this place, though the unique clock tower dates back only to 1753. The brethren were invited by the lord Franz Niary of Bedek, lord of the Branc castle (in the Geschicht-Buch phonetically written as Bränitsch, Brainisch, or Präntsch; Magyar, Berencs), but the area belonged actually to not less than thirteen manorial estates, and it was certainly not easy to satisfy all these self-willed lords. Great hardship began in 1548 when King Ferdinand (q.v.) prevailed upon the lords, at least temporarily, to expel the Anabaptists. Now they had to find other places, wandering from Slovakia to Austria, thence to Moravia and back again to Slovakia. At times they had to live in underground tunnels (called Lochy, q.v.). But by 1554 the Hapsburgs had so many other tasks on hand that they had to leave Slovakia (then a part of Hungary) to itself again. Thus the "Golden Period" set in—1554-1600. In 1588 the lord of Gross-Schützen (Slovakian, Veľké Levary), Hans Bernhard von Lembach, imperial cupbearer, invited the brethren to start a Bruderhof on his estate, not too far from the Austrian border, and gave them a charter (Stiftungsbrief, the text of which Zieglschmid published in 1940) containing all the needed protection.

But peace did not last. In 1605 Turkish and Hungarian satellite armies (under Bocskay) invaded the area, killing and plundering everywhere. The Sobotiste Bruderhof remained uninhabited for eight years; then in 1613 the lords urged a resettlement, giving the brethren a new and stronger charter (Hausbrief, excerpts of which are given in Beck, 364 note), which was renewed once again in 1640 (text in Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 128 note). The Brethren were granted full liberty of conscience, the right to withdraw from the land at their pleasure, but with financial compensation, freedom from payment of taxes and tithes, compulsory labor only every third year, etc. The lords were to buy all their wares, yet at reduced prices; otherwise the brethren were free to carry on their trades as they wished. It was also understood that the Brethren would not take refuge in litigation, which meant that friendly arbitration should replace manorial court procedure.

In 1621 an exodus took place, in which some of the Hutterites in Slovakia moved on to Transylvania, invited by the prince of that land, Bethlen Gabor, who at that time lived under the suzerainty of the Turkish sultan. On April 1, 1621, the preacher Franz Walter (see Walter family, the oldest living Anabaptist family on record) together with 185 persons moved to Alwinz (q.v.), where the settlement soon made remarkable progress, perhaps due to Walter's aggressive leadership (see Transylvania). The Thirty Years' War (1618-48), though fought mainly on German and Bohemian land, was strongly felt also in Slovakia. In 1626-27 great sufferings are reported all over the country, caused mainly by marauding soldiers. Since Moravia had expelled all its Anabaptists without exception by 1622 (though Lotherth claims that hidden nests of Hutterites were found in Moravia as late as 1650), newcomers to near-by Slovakia swelled the Anabaptist settlements. The Archbishop of Esztergom (Gran) tried to stem this tide by a sharp letter to the royal court in Vienna (1629, text in Beck, 436), complaining among other things about the success which these simple Christians had among the rural population of the area. But since the Catholic clergy had but little power in this part of the Hapsburg land, the Brethren remained by and large unmolested.

Time of Andreas Ehrenpreis (1630-62). Concerning this period there is much material in both the Great and the Small Chronicle of the Hutterites. Surprisingly it is also described in the great contemporary novel Simplicissimus by Grimmelshausen (q.v.), who draws a glowing picture of these people, their peace, thrift, and inner happiness; in short, he confesses that, were it not for their faith, he would not hesitate to join their community. In 1633, an unpleasant incident happened in Sobotiste, when Brethren used brute force to prevent the taking away of horses by a haughty manorial lord. Much misery followed, but what really matters is a model ordinance by Ehrenpreis in 1633 concerning the nonresistant attitude of a genuine Christian, even if that should involve loss of property (Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 168-72, translated by Friedmann in MQR, 1951). As far as Hutterites are concerned this was the only known case of "self-defense" ever recorded. Ehrenpreis's strong leadership became noticeable at once. In 1639 when he was elected Vorsteher, he at once set about reviving and amplifying the old regulations of the church, called Gemeindeordnungen (q.v.). A large handwritten book (codex), most likely written by Ehrenpreis himself, has been preserved (now in Esztergom, q.v.) in which all these ordinances are collected and supplemented. The Klein-Geschichtsbuch (519-32) also contains at least one of these ordinances (of 1651), all of which greatly strengthened the inner discipline of the now rather static brotherhood.

Not insignificant was also the attention given to the medical needs of the group: there were a number of excellent barber-surgeons and even a physician among the Brethren during this period, one of these men practicing in the mineral bath of Trenčín-Teplice. A medical codex of that time has also been preserved. Another characteristic feature of the Ehrenpreis period was the new custom of writing down the sermons for all the services throughout the year and for special occasions (see Sermons, Hutterite). Henceforth sermons were read, and the preacher who dared to extemporize a new sermon was frowned upon. The Bruderhof at Kesselsdorf (q.v.) was apparently a particular center of such sermon writing, and the brother Küntsche (q.v.) seems to have been the most productive of all these sermon writers. Some Ehrenpreis sermons, written with pencil in small notebooks, are still preserved by the brethren in Canada; in fact the entire collection of 300-500 sermons of the Ehrenpreis era has been copied and recopied up to the present and represents a most influential element in present-day Hutterianism.

It was also under Ehrenpreis that the last attempts were made at mission work in foreign lands. Brethren were sent to Danzig on the Baltic Sea where contacts were made with a Socinian group. One of this group, Dr. Daniel Zwicker (q.v.), a physician by profession and a humanist, even came down to Slovakia in the early 1650's to see for himself what the Anabaptist life was like. Eventually he joined the group (though with some mental reservations), only to leave soon again for Danzig, giving up his pledge and other ties.

Since the Brethren were not permitted to start new settlements in Slovakia, they experimented with a new Bruderhof in Germany, setting up a small unit in Mannheim (q.v.) in 1654, which however never showed much inner life and was soon abandoned, most likely due to lack of leadership (the charter of the Hof in Beck, 492).

In 1650 Ehrenpreis put together for the last time all the essentials of the ancient Hutterite faith in a booklet (printed in 1652) entitled, Ein Sendbrief . . . brüderliche Liebe . . . betreffend. One more positive event of this period deserves mention. When Leopold I became Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire in 1657 and at the same time King of Hungary (though only of a rump of that realm), he showed a certain willingness to protect even his non-Catholic subjects. The fervor of the Counter Reformation (q.v.) and of the Thirty Years' War was over, and peace and prosperity were at this time of prime importance for Austria's recovery. Thus, on Jan. 29, 1659, Leopold issued an Imperial Privilege which specifically placed the Hutterites under royal protection, "that all brethren should receive protection (Schutz und Schirm) against violence and persecution" (Beck, 496; see Leopold I). This Privilege covered the Anabaptists of three Hungarian districts (comitats), Bratislava, Neutra, and Trenčín. It is certainly a unique document in the entire history of the Hutterites, but unfortunately, it was soon forgotten, discounted, or disregarded.

The great time of Anabaptism was now over, and a decline set in soon after the death of Ehrenpreis. Poverty and misery of all sorts prompted the Brethren to send a delegation to the Mennonites in Amsterdam asking for material help (the letter of 1665 to these Mennonites closes the Great Chronicle; Wolkan, 666-71). Apparently this action was successful, for the Mennonite Archives in Amsterdam contain a letter of thanks for the generous help received, dated Nov. 24, 1665 (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, 419). This help, however, could not stop the decline (Verfließen) of Hutterite life. The principle of community of goods was in part abandoned in the later years of the 17th century, and the old discipline began to wane. At the same time the power of the Jesuits began to grow, and after 1700 the Anabaptist Brethren faced a challenge to which their spirituality was no longer a match. Already in 1688 Cardinal Kolonitch tried to insist that from now on infants in Velke Levary, his estate, must be baptized, an order obeyed by the more timid members. In 1733 another order or mandate was issued likewise requiring general infant baptism on the threat of severe penalties for the nonconforming parents. The details of the ensuing bitter struggle are recorded by Johannes Waldner in his Klein-Geschichtsbuch (197-239); as a whole it is a pathetic story of suffering and agony though of a different nature from the 16th-century martyrdom. Only a small fraction managed to leave Slovakia for the Ukraine; the majority eventually succumbed to the pressure and accepted Catholicism, though with much resistance and inner reservation. It was then that mass confiscations of their codices began (30 today in Bratislava, another 30 in Esztergom, 10 in Budapest, and many more simply destroyed), while here and there books were hidden behind walls or under the floors (see Habaner). Even the Edict of Toleration of the enlightened Emperor Joseph II in 1781 was of no help; Brethren from Slovakia went to Vienna for an audience with the Emperor, but he had little understanding for their way of life (though he permitted Mennonite settlers to locate in Galicia at the same time; see Galicia). Thus nothing was achieved. As soon as the Brethren turned Catholic, the Jesuits allowed them all the rest of their time-honored ways of life; the Bruderhof institutions remained unchanged, a common treasury was kept (almost up to 1914), and to this day people continue to live in the old Hofs. Also their most treasured craft, ceramics (Habaner fayence), was practiced far into the 19th century, creating some particularly beautiful pieces before and after 1800. When two American Hutterite Brethren revisited the old Slovakian homesteads in 1937, they joyfully recognized the familiar patterns of life as their own. But the genius had faded away and after a few hospitable days they parted, conscious that Hutterite life was no longer at home in Slovakia, Transylvania, or the Ukraine, but was to be found only in the far away prairie areas of Canada and the United States.

Sluys, van der (Versluys, van Sluys), a Dutch Mennonite family, whose ancestors lived in Belgium. Guillaume Versluys (d. c1628) was a burgomaster of Waerschoot, Flanders; his widow with three sons and one daughter, all Mennonites, moved to Cadzand in Zealand-Flanders, Netherlands, in 1629. Among them was Guillaume van der Sluys, called de Oude, who later lived at Aardenburg as a wool and cloth merchant, and died there about 1675, whose son Maerten married Maria van Eeghen. Jan Versluys, a farmer at Zomergem (q.v.), Belgium, moved to de Biezen near Aardenburg with his family, all Mennonites, about 1620. Another Guillaume van der Sluys, called de Jonge, lived about 1667 at Zierikzee, Dutch province of Zeeland, where he owned a thriving textile business. Martin van der Sluys, the husband of the martyr Grietgen van Sluys (q.v.), probably belonged to the same family. Another member of this family was Guillaume van der Sluys, of Rotterdam, a member and deacon of the Flemish Mennonite congregation, who in 1661 with others signed the letter of Dutch Mennonite congregations to the city of Bern, to intervene with the Bernese government in behalf of the oppressed Mennonites, and who signed the Verbondt van Eenigheydt (q.v.) in 1664 for the congregation of Rotterdam. In 1663 he was present when Tieleman Jansz van Braght (q.v.) disputed with Pastor Aemilius (q.v.) at Oud-Beyerland. Most members of this family left the Mennonite Church to join the Reformed in the 18th century. vdZ.

Smalcus (Schmalz), Valentinus (d. 1622), was a preacher of the Polish Brethren (Socinians, q.v.) at Rakov, Poland. In 1610 Smalcus and the Socinian elder Moscorovius (q.v.) had a conversation at Lublin with three Mennonite leaders of Danzig and the surrounding congregations. Thereupon Smalcus drew up a confession of faith, which was widely spread among the Mennonites of Poland. The Socinians wished to have closer contacts and even a merger with the Mennonites, since they held that there were only slight differences between their doctrines; but the Mennonites opposed this union. Smalcus and other leaders of the Brethren, including Ulrich Pius Herwarth, a preacher of the Brethren at Danzig, insisted that Jan Gerrits van Emden (q.v.), a Mennonite preacher at Danzig, and other Mennonite leaders in Poland have a debate with them in order to prepare the merger. Jan Gerrits wrote a number of letters to Hans de Ries (q.v.), Leenaert Clock (q.v.), Reiner Wybrands (q.v.), and other Mennonite leaders in Holland, urgently asking them to come to Danzig to dispute with the Brethren leaders, because they felt unequal to the theologically well-trained polemical Smalcus and other Socinian leaders. The Dutch elders, however, declined, de Ries writing a letter to Jan Gerrits. The union of Mennonites and the Brethren did not come about; in 1628 the Polish Brethren church was dissolved by order of the Polish government. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2928-36.) vdZ.

Smid (Smit), a Mennonite family at Balk (q.v.), Dutch province of Friesland, found there from at least 1672. Many of its members served as deacons, preachers, and elders in the Balk congregation, which more than other Dutch congregations held to the old Mennonite principles and practices—ban, nonresistance, lay ministry, difference of the functions of elder and preacher, plain dress, Biestkens (q.v.) Bible. From 1800 to his death in 1844 Meine Ob(b)es was at first a preacher and then an elder of this church. Of great significance and blessing was Johannes Obes (c1765-1828), who assumed the family name of Smit (Smid), being a blacksmith. In 1814, at his own expense, he reprinted for the congregation the Klein Hoorns Liedboek (q.v.), a 17th-century Dutch Mennonite hymnal which was used at Balk until 1848, when the Uitgezochte Lieder were adopted to be used together with the Hoorns Liedboek. In 1824-25 he reprinted Tieleman van Braght's Schole der Deugd and Pieter Boudevijn's Onderwijzinge des Christelijken Geloofs. In 1828, after Johannes' death, his eldest son Obe Smid (1802-50) became a preacher of the congregation. He was a good leader with great gifts of heart and head. He diligently studied the writings of Menno Simons, Dirk Philips, and Pieter Jansz Twisck. Besides a diary he wrote a number of doctrinal and devotional tracts, one of which, entitled Verklaring van 't groote gebod Gods, was published at Sneek in 1848. A list of the manuscripts he left behind is found in MQR XXX (1956) 130 f. Obe Smid, who was unmarried, died in 1850, apparently somewhat disappointed in the spiritual development of the congregation, which had partly left the old paths.

Ruurd Johannes Smid (1814-93), the third son of Preacher Johannes Smid, was appointed preacher in 1847 and elder in 1849. On May 9, 1853, together with Preacher R. J. Sijmensma (q.v.), he led the emigration of a large part of the Balk congregation to the United States. For this exodus (19 of the 30 Balk members, with their children 52 souls, emigrated) there were different reasons: not only, though predominantly the desire to maintain the old Mennonite principles and practices, particularly that of nonresistance, but also because economic conditions had become difficult for them. In five letters, three by Smid and two by Sijmensma, they informed the part of the Balk congregation which had not joined the emigration, of their trip and their first experiences in America. (These letters were published in Gorter's Doopsgezinde Lectuur, 1854.) The Balk group first moved to Dover, Ohio, from where some pioneers, including Smid, moved to Indiana where they found farm land near Goshen. The group, apparently because of its small size, did not organize a church here, but worshiped with some German-speaking Mennonites (MC) in

"the Christophel Meeting House" (Yellow Creek church). Ruurd Smid (he soon Americanized his name as Smith) preached sometimes in this church as he did later in the Salem church. In 1874 "the Christophel Church, including the Holland brethren" was "under charge of R. J. Schmidt" (Smith). During the first years after the immigration, when the Balk people were not yet well acquainted with the English language, Ruurd Smid often preached in the homes of the members. Mrs. Smith's diary relates that Ruurd Johannes Smid became sick on April 20, and died on April 26, 1893. Mrs. Smith, nee Grietje (Margaret) Sijmensma, was a sister of Preacher R. J. Sijmensma (1820-1911). vdZ.

Smidt, Petrus (Pieter), b. Nov. 10, 1707, at Amsterdam, d. there Aug. 12, 1781, whose great-grandfather was Gerrit Smidt, a Mennonite preacher of Hamburg-Altona, was an elder of the Amsterdam Zonist (q.v.) congregation from 1728 until his death. When the Amsterdam Lamist congregation started a seminary for the training of Mennonite ministers and some Zonists desired a good training for their ministers too, the Amsterdam Zonist congregation decided to open a Zonist seminary, appointing Petrus Smidt as theological professor in 1753. Smidt taught until 1780, when the Zonist seminary was closed; the number of students had always been very small. Smidt did not publish any writings except a sermon in 1728.

Petrus Smidt seems to have been a man of means. Besides a stately home at Amsterdam, first on the Singel, later on the Heerengracht, he owned a country home at Uithoorn. He married Sara de Koker (1702-58). His daughter Maria Smidt was married to Pastor Hendrik van Gelder (q.v.), whose descendants, still numerous in the Netherlands, bear the family name of Smidt van Gelder. vdZ.

Smissen, van der, a Mennonite family which has played a significant role in the church and community life. The origin of the family has been traced to Brabant, Belgium, where it was also called Bogaard; during the 15th century it was a patrician family of Brussels. Gysbert I van der Smissen escaped from Belgium around 1576 during the days of the Inquisition and lived in Goch, on the Lower Rhine. When he joined the Mennonites is not known. After 1583 he resided in Haarlem, Holland. His son Jan was a Mennonite minister in Haarlem. Another son, Daniel, settled in Friedrichstadt, Holstein, which became a Mennonite refuge. His son Gysbert II (b. April 8, 1620) settled in Glückstadt in 1644 and founded a bakery and a whaling company. In 1677 he moved to Altona and established a bakery. His oldest son, Daniel (b. 1646), continued his father's enterprise. The ninth child of Gysbert II was Hinrich I (q.v.; Jan. 24, 1662-1737), who followed his father to Altona in 1677. He was a successful businessman and occupied a significant position in the growing city. He has been given the name "city builder" because he laid the foundation for Altona's prosperity. He was also an active supporter of the Altona Mennonite Church (q.v.). His two sons, Hinrich II (b. 1704) and Gysbert III (b. 1717), continued the father's business. During this second generation the business reached its peak. During the third generation Hinrich III (b. 1742) and Jacob Gysbert van der Smissen (q.v.) (b. 1746) were the outstanding representatives of the family. Jacob had strong pietistic leanings. Toward the end of his life the firm collapsed.

Münste states that there was a certain degeneration noticeable in the fourth generation partly because of intermarriage in the family. Johann W. Mannhardt (q.v.), who married Anna van der Smissen, and some of his descendants are significant representatives of the family. A detailed study of the ups and downs of the van der Smissen family and their enterprises is found in Münste's book Das Altonaer Handlungshaus van der Smissen 1682-1824 (Altona, 1932). Seldom have Mennonites had such influence in the affairs, growth, and prosperity of a city as was the case in Altona.

Some of the van der SmisSENS, e.g., Jacob Gysbert, turned from their interest in business to religious work and had strong pietistic leanings. Carl Justus van der Smissen (q.v.) was a minister in Glückstadt and one of the first of the Mennonites of Germany to receive a full theological training. He migrated to America in 1868 and was a teacher of Wadsworth Seminary (q.v.). His son Carl H. A. van der Smissen (q.v.) made an outstanding contribution to the Mennonites of America as an editor and minister. (See Germany.) C.K.

Among the writings on the family may be listed an original genealogy entitled 1743 Stam Boom ende Geslagt Register der Van der Smissen in de Linie van Daniel Van der Smissen Voort Stammende of den Stamhouder Gysbert van der Smissen (BeCL). In addition to the book by Münste, see W. Oesau, Hamburg Grönlandfahrt auf Walfischfang und Robbenschlach vom 17.-19. Jahrhundert (Hamburg, 1955) and R. Dollinger, Geschichte der Mennoniten in Schleswig-Holstein, Hamburg und Lübeck (Neumünster, 1930). BeCL has Jacob Gysbert van der Smissen's original Journal and correspondence, as well as other early material brought to America by the van der Smissen family, all of it in the "Van der Smissen Collection."

Smissen, Carl Heinrich Anton van der (1851-1950), a Mennonite (GCM) minister and editor, was born at Friedrichstadt, Schleswig-Holstein, Germany, on Dec. 4, 1851, the son of the Mennonite preacher Carl Justus van der Smissen (q.v.). He attended the local elementary and high schools, the universities of Basel (1870-72), Tübingen (1872-73), and Halle (1873-74), and the Wadsworth (Ohio) and Haysville (Ohio) academies (1875-80). In 1874 he came to America to join his parents. He served churches while a student and taught public school at Coshocton, Ohio (1880-81). He served the Upper Milford and Hereford Mennonite churches of Zionsville and Bally, Pa. (1881-90), and the Summerfield Mennonite Church, Ill. (1890-1911). He was the editor of the Bundesbote and the Bundesbote-Kalender 1911-29, of the Kinderbote 1911-36, of the Mennonite 1912-14, and of the German Sunday-school quarterlies 1920-43. In 1911-32 he lived at Berne, Ind. He served as the secretary of the Eastern and Middle district conferences and the General Conference (1896-1902) and was a member of the General Conference Board of Education and Publication (1887-90) and the Board of Foreign Missions (1890-96, 1902-11). He preached in many churches and held many other offices. He and his father were the first American Mennonite teachers and ministers with a full standard theological training.

In 1881 he married Mary E. Knight, who died in 1892. From this marriage were born two children. In 1892 he married Elizabeth B. Ruth. To them were born six children. In 1932 he retired from his active duties and resided in the Home for the Aged at Newton, Kan. On June 30, 1950, he died, having nearly attained the age of one hundred years of an active life. He was the author of Kurzgefasste Geschichte und Glaubenslehre der Altevangelischen Taufgesinnten oder Mennoniten (Summerfield, 1895) and Der Eid. (Elkhart, 1894). C.K.

Smissen, Carl Justus van der (1811-90), a Mennonite (GCM) minister and educator, was born at Altona, Germany, on July 14, 1811, the son of Jacob van der Smissen (q.v.). He attended school at Friedrichstadt and Ratzeburg. He was baptized in 1826, in which year he went with his parents to Danzig where his father received a call as a minister. There he learned the trade of bookbinding. With the mediation of Johann E. Gossner he spent some time in this line of work in St. Petersburg, Russia. In 1832 he began his study at the Missionshaus of Basel, preparing for the ministry. After three years he spent two years at the University of Erlangen. In 1837 he accepted the call of the Mennonite church of Friedrichstadt, and married Sarah van der Smissen. Among the eight children born to them were Carl H. A. (q.v.) and Hillegonda Jacoba (q.v.). Under the influence of such pietists as Gossner, van der Smissen caused a revival in the congregation. In 1850 the war compelled the family to go to Hamburg. The following year he returned to his work.

In 1867 the General Conference Mennonite Church extended a call to van der Smissen to become the teacher of theological subjects at the Wadsworth School (q.v.) in Ohio. The family moved to Wadsworth in 1868. For ten years he taught at this school. Many leaders and ministers of the General Conference received their training under him, the first American teacher and minister with a formal theological training. After the close of the school, van der Smissen became the minister of the Salem Mennonite Church at Haysville, Ohio, in 1879. He served for many years as secretary of the Board of Missions (1872-90) and edited the mission paper, Nachrichten aus der Heidenwelt (1877-81). He remained active in his pastoral work almost to the close of his life, which occurred on May 29, 1890. His sermons have been preserved in the van der Smissen Collection (BeCL). C.K.

Smissen, Dominicus van der (1704-60), an artist, was born at Altona, Germany, in 1704, a son of Hinrich van der Smissen. He was a pupil of Balthasar Denner (q.v.), whose sister Catharina he married in 1730. Little is known about his life. He was active as an artist at Dresden, Braunschweig, Amsterdam, and London, in addition to Hamburg-Altona. He died in 1760. Lichtwark says that a generation ago a number of his works of art were in the possession of families in Hamburg: some landscapes, portraits, and still lifes, which have become very scarce. The Kunsthalle of Hamburg possesses a considerable number of his works, including a Self Portrait (Catalog, No. 432), Portrait of the Senator and Poet B. H. Brockes (34), Portrait of the Poet Hagedorn (41), Portrait of Dr. Vincent Rumpf (165), Portrait of a Hamburg Mayor (167), Portrait of the Wife of the Mayor (166), Portrait of a Captain (433), Still Life (434), and Hinrich I van der Smissen, "The City Builder." Dominicus also painted Meta Moller, Klopstock's first wife. All the above are oil paintings. As a rule van der Smissen closely followed Denner's style, although he portrays forms of the body in greater detail. Additional paintings of his are found in Braunschweig and in private possession. The Bethel College Historical Library has colored slides and black and white reproductions of most of his works. C.K.

Smissen, Hillegonda Cornelia van der (1848-1949), was born at Friedrichstadt, Schleswig-Holstein, Germany, on June 30, 1848, a daughter of Carl Justus van der Smissen (q.v.), and came to the United States with her parents in 1868 where they resided at Wadsworth, Ohio. Ten years later her parents moved to Haysville, Ohio, and in 1890 she followed her mother to Summerfield, Ill. In 1908 she became the supervisor of the household of the Bethel Deaconess Hospital at Newton, Kan. On Sept. 16, 1909, she was consecrated as a deaconess, continuing her service to the hospital. She wrote Unsere Arbeit in den Missionsvereinen (n.d.), pp. 30; The History of Our Missionary Societies (n.d., pp. 72) translated by Mrs. J. Quiring; Bilder aus meinem Leben (Bethel Deaconess Hospital, Newton, n.d.), pp. 86; Sketches from My Life (Bethel Deaconess Hospital, n.d.), pp. 54. During her last years of a long and fruitful life she was a resident of the Home for the Aged where she died on Sept. 29, 1949, being more than 101 years old. C.K.

Smissen, Hinrich I van der (1662-1737), known as "City Builder," was born Jan. 21, 1662, at Glückstadt, Holstein, where his father, Gysbert II, had a bakery and a business. In 1677 his father moved to Altona. In 1679 Hinrich I finished his apprenticeship as a baker and in 1684 he took over his father's bakery in Altona. He started a transport business in addition to the bakery and purchased land including the present "Van der Smissen Allee," where he built numerous houses. In a short time he became a prosperous and respected man. He became a member of the committee to rebuild Altona when it was destroyed by the Swedes in 1713, through which he earned the name "City Builder." He was generous in his support of the city as well as the Altona Mennonite Church (q.v.). He was one of the most successful businessmen of the van der Smissen family. He was married to Marie de Voss, May 14, 1693. Of his six children the two youngest, Hinrich II and Gysbert III, inherited his business. He died on June 1, 1737. C.K.

Smissen, Hinrich van der (1851-1928), a German Mennonite leader, was born at Altona (q.v.), Germany, on Dec. 14, 1851, attended the local Gymnasium, studied at the universities of Halle and Göttingen until the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian War in 1870. As a volunteer in the medical corps of Hamburg he took part in the entire campaign. In September 1872 he was chosen to the ministry by the congregation of Ibersheim, Eppstein, and Friesenheim. For ten years he served the congregation faithfully and was a leader in the work of the conference of the Palatinate and Hesse, the board of the school at Weierhof (q.v.) as secretary (1875-79) and president (1879-85); in 1875-79 he was coeditor of the Mennonitische Blätter with his cousin Johannes van der Smissen (q.v.) and in 1879-1923 he was sole editor. In 1880 it was he who brought about the establishment of the General Central Relief Fund, which later became the Mennonite Relief Treasury (Mennonitische Hilfskasse, q.v.). In 1882 he became assistant preacher of the Hamburg-Altona congregation (q.v.) and in 1885 the pastor of the same congregation. Here again his service and influence were extensive. For many years he was chairman of the Vereinigung der Mennonitengemeinden im Deutschen Reich, which he helped to found. He made extended journeys, visiting nearly all the Mennonite congregations in Germany, Switzerland, Holland, Russia, and some in America. He died March 3, 1928. His father was Hinrich T. van der Smissen.† NEFF.

Smissen, Jacob II van der (1785-1846), a son of Jacob Gysbert van der Smissen (q.v.), was born at Altona, Germany, in 1785. After his training under J. W. Mannhardt, in the Ritterakademie in Uhyst, and in Rotterdam, he was engaged in business and agriculture. He lost most of his property in 1812 and lived at Hanerau. He married Sophie W. F. Weihe in 1805. In 1813 he purchased a bakery in Hanerau, tutored, and was engaged in home mission work. He served as pastor of the following Mennonite churches: Friedrichstadt 1818-26, Danzig (the first salaried minister) 1826-35, Neustadt-Gödens 1836-42. He retired to Ottensen and died at Altona in 1846. He was a gifted speaker and perpetuated the pietistic heritage of his father. Carl Justus van der Smissen (q.v.) was his son. C.K.

Smissen, Jacob Gysbert van der (1746-1829), an outstanding member of the van der Smissen (q.v.) family during the 18th century when there was a turn in the family from successful economic enterprise to a pietistic emphasis. He was born on Jan. 1, 1746, the son of Gysbert III van der Smissen. For five years he was an apprentice in Rotterdam, after which he worked in his father's business in Altona, becoming a shareholder in 1781. He was married to Helena Linnich in 1770, who was a niece of his mother. Their children were Gilbert (Gysbert IV), Hinrich II, and Jacob II. Jacob II (q.v.) later became the Mennonite minister at Friedrichstadt. His wife died in 1790. In 1796 he married Hillegonda Jacoba Deknatel, the daughter(?) of Johannes Deknatel (q.v.) of Amsterdam.

Van der Smissen was deeply influenced by Pietism and the Moravian Brethren. His correspondence with a large circle of friends far beyond the Mennonite fold, which has been preserved, is an unusual source of information on not only the religious development and views of the writer, but also those of his day in general. Many of his letters as well as those written to him were preserved in the original form or copied. Among his friends were the Moravian minister Briant, Jung-Stilling, Lavater, Matthias Claudius, Perthes, Gossner, and other leaders of the pietistic movement. He was a member of the organization "Deutsche Gesellschaft zur Beförderung reiner Lehre und Gottseligkeit," of Basel, and cofounder of the paper Basler Sammlungen. He wrote for this paper and promoted it. He was active in promoting other religious organizations. He was particularly interested in promoting Pietism in opposition to the Rationalism of his day, not stressing denominational lines. Purely cultural questions and organizations did not interest him.

In 1810 he suffered a stroke from which he never recovered fully. In 1824 the large van der Smissen business enterprise suffered a collapse, partly because of the post-Napoleonic developments. On March 3, 1829, he died, a relatively poor man, although he had some income from the Deknatel estate. His wife had died in 1817. His children received a very good education. Johann Wilhelm Mannhardt (q.v.) was their private tutor. Later some attended the Moravian educational institute at Christiansfeld. As a deacon of the Altona Mennonite Church Jacob Gysbert was active in upholding the Mennonite traditions and rights within the environment in which they lived. C.K.

Smissen, Johannes van der (1808-79), a German Mennonite leader, was born on July 17, 1808, at Altona in Schleswig-Holstein, Germany, studied mathematics and the natural sciences at the universities of Copenhagen and Berlin, also attending lectures in theology. After completing his course he held positions as private tutor in Altona, the Baltic provinces, and in Danzig; here he was persuaded by Jakob Mannhardt (q.v.) to make further preparations for the ministry. In 1856 he accepted the very difficult position of minister of the Kiernica (q.v.) congregation in Galicia and there married Elisabet Vlaar, of the Altona congregation, on April 18, 1858. In 1868 he accepted the call to Sembach (q.v.) in the Palatinate, to occupy the Mennonite pulpit left vacant by the death of Johannes Risser (q.v.). He was an energetic worker for the Mennonitische Blätter. In 1875-79 he was its coeditor with his cousin Hinrich van der Smissen (q.v.). He also performed an important service as chairman of the board of the school at Weierhof and in reviving the conference sessions of the Palatinate and Hesse. On April 28, 1879, he died, deeply mourned by his congregation. (Menn. Bl., 1879, 33, 42, 44; ML IV.) NEFF.

Smit (Schmidt), Hilchen, was an elder of the Frisian Mennonite congregation at Montau, West Prussia, in the second half of the 16th century. About this leader there is only scarce information. He was probably of Dutch descent (his Christian name Hilchen may have been a corruption of the Frisian name Hylke), but he was not among the first Dutch Mennonites who settled at Montau in 1568. The years of his serving are unknown. In 1588, at Danzig, Hilchen Smit, being authorized by the Frisian congregation of Haarlem, Holland, banned Cryn van der Meulen (q.v., Vermeulen) and Hans von Schwindern (q.v.), an elder and preacher of the Danzig Frisian congregation, who were planning a union with the moderate Waterlanders. After 1588 nothing more is known about Smit. vDZ.

Smith, C. Henry (1875-1948), an outstanding American Mennonite historian, was born June 8, 1875, at Metamora, Ill., one of the eight children of Bishop John (q.v.) and Magdalene Schertz Smith, his grandfathers Schertz and Smith having immigrated from Alsace-Lorraine c1829. He married Laura Ioder Dec. 26, 1908; there were no children. He was educated at Illinois State Normal University, 1896-98, University of Illinois (B.A., 1903), and the University of Chicago (B.A., 1903, Ph.D., 1907), the first known American Mennonite to secure the Ph.D. degree and continue in the church. His chosen career of teaching included three years of elementary school near home (1893-96), Elkhart Institute 1898-1900, Goshen College 1903-5 (also librarian) and 1908-13 (first dean of the college 1909-13), and Bluffton College 1913-48. His major field was history, in which he did outstanding work at the University of Chicago (Phi Beta Kappa), and which he taught well for almost 50 years. He taught for one year (1922-23) at Bethel College. He also entered the banking business, serving for years as president of the Citizens National Bank of Bluffton and vice-president of the First National Bank of Pandora. With ample private means he could devote himself to research and writing in his special field of interest, Mennonite history. In his church he was a member of the Board of Publication of the General Conference Mennonite Church 1940-48, and in the district conference a member of the Peace Committee.

Smith's interest in Mennonite history continued throughout his life. His doctoral dissertation (1907) was Mennonites of America, published by the author in 1909. His outstanding work was The Story of the Mennonites (Berne, 1941), an enlargement of his earlier work The Mennonites: A Brief History of Their Origin and Later Development in both Europe and America (Berne, 1920). Two other larger monographs came from his pen: The Coming of the Russian Mennonites: An Episode in the Settling of the Last Frontier 1874-1884 (Berne, 1927), and The Mennonite Immigration to Pennsylvania in the Eighteenth Century (Part XXXIII of A Narrative and Critical History of the Pennsylvania German Society, Norristown, Pa., 1929). He shared in the writing of The Story of Bluffton College (Bluffton, 1925, edited by E. J. Hirschler and C. Henry Smith). Smaller sketches and booklets include: Mennonites in History, an address delivered in Philadelphia (Scottsdale, 1907); Menno Simons, Apostle of the Nonresistant Life (Berne, 1936); Christian Peace: Four Hundred Years of Mennonite Peace Principles and Practice (Newton, 1938); One Hundred Years Ago, an address delivered at the first Home-Coming celebration of the old Partridge congregation near Metamora in 1940; Mennonites in America (Akron, 1942, number II in the series Mennonites and Their Heritage, published by the Mennonite Central Committee for use in CPS camps); and Metamora (Bluffton, 1947). His autobiographical book, The Education of a Mennonite Country Boy, was written in 1925, but published in 1943 at Bluffton in 15 mimeographed copies. He wrote some 15 articles for the Mennonitisches Lexikon and a similar number for the MENNONITE ENCYCLOPEDIA. He was a central figure in the planning of the ENCYCLOPEDIA, serving as coeditor until his death, and in this connection was first president of the Mennonite Research Fellowship. He wrote numerous articles in some 16 Mennonite periodicals and yearbooks. A complete bibliography appears in MQR XXIII (1949), "A Bibliography of the Writings of C. Henry Smith," by N. P. Springer.

His work will remain a challenge to complete objectivity, to scrupulous fairness and justice, and to effective and winning presentation of insights gained. Mennonites owe to him a great debt for his pioneer and creative work, particularly in the field of American Mennonite history. He was a valiant fighter, not only for historical truth, but for the best in the Mennonite heritage, particularly the testimony for peace and nonresistance. With malice toward none, and charity toward all, he hoped for and worked toward a better understanding and eventual reunion of the divided Mennonite brotherhood. As a historian, Smith was unquestionably the greatest of the historians produced by the Mennonites of America and the peer of any of the European Mennonite historians. With his five major works, written over a period of thirty-five years, he published more full-length historical works than any other Mennonite historian. His particular gift was that of synthesis of masses of material into well-written, interesting, integrated accounts. He was pre-eminently the general Mennonite historian who took the great sweep of our history in both Europe and America and put it into clear, easily read volumes that will remain standard works for years to come.

C. Henry Smith was a member of the Mennonite Church (MC) until his withdrawal to Bluffton, when he joined the General Conference Mennonite Church. The initial "C" has been erroneously assumed to stand for "Christian." It was simply an initial adopted by Henry himself.† H.S.B.

Smith Corner Mennonite Church (GCM), located 3 miles west of East Freedom, Blair Co., Pa., a member of the Eastern District Conference, was started in 1908 by Jacob G. Snyder and Herman Snyder, of Roaring Spring, Pa., formerly ministers in the Mennonite Church (MC), with a nucleus of members from that community. The church was built in that same year. The pastor in 1957 was Walter D. Fry, and the membership was 61. W.T.S.

Smith, Jacob Brubaker (1870-1951), a leading minister and educator in the Mennonite Church (MC), was born at St. Jacobs, Waterloo Co., Ont., the son of George and Mary Schmidt. His education included work at Elkhart Institute and Ohio Northern University at Ada, Ohio, and Temple University. He was ordained preacher in 1897, serving several years as pastor of the Bethel (MC) congregation of Garden City, Mo., then 1901 ff. in the Bethel (MC) congregation of West Liberty, Ohio. In 1922 he moved to Elida, Ohio, where he served as minister in the Salem Church for many years. He died at Elida on Sept. 23, 1951.

Smith's greatest service was in the field of teaching and writing. He served on the faculty of Hesston College 1910-17 and 1927-29, and as the first president of Eastern Mennonite College 1917-22. He was the author of One Thousand Best Bible Verses (Chicago, 1924) and Greek-English Concordance to the New Testament (Scottsdale, 1955). On March 17, 1901, he was married to Lena Burkhardt. Among their seven children were Mrs. Truman Brunk and J. Harold Smith, formerly a professor at Hesston and Goshen colleges. H.S.B.

Smith, John (1843-1906), a Mennonite (MC) leader and bishop, was born near Metamora, Woodford Co., Ill., Nov. 27, 1843. His parents, Christian and Catrina Smith, both born in Alsace, came first to Pennsylvania and then in 1833 came to the pioneer settlement in the Black Partridge Creek area the year the Partridge Amish congregation was organized. In 1865 he married Magdalena Schertz. Ten children were born, seven of whom grew to adulthood. His son Joseph D. Smith was for many years superintendent of the Home for the Aged at Eureka, and another son, C. Henry Smith (q.v.), was a pioneer historian of the Mennonites in America.

John Smith was ordained to the ministry in 1887 at the Roanoke Mennonite Church (MC) by Christian Ropp, and a few years later was ordained bishop. He served the Western Conference six times as secretary and three times as moderator.

He was a person of more than ordinary ability and was recognized as a leader in secular as well as in spiritual affairs. He was considered broad-minded but was one of the first to speak from the pulpit against the evils of tobacco and alcohol. He was conservative but willing to accept changes which would promote the welfare of the church. He actively supported the infant mission and educational interests of the church. His last years were given over almost entirely to the work of the church. He was one of the first in his area to use the English language in preaching. He died of a heart attack at his home on July 6, 1906. T.R.S.

Smithville, Ohio, is a town (pop. 800), located in Wayne County, northeast quarter of the state. Probably 1,500 Mennonites live within a ten-mile radius, mostly of the M.C. group, with some Conservative Amish, Old Order Amish, Old Order (Wisler) Mennonites, and General Conference Mennonites included. Chief settlements are north, east, and south, with about thirty Mennonite families living in Smithville. Amish Mennonites were among the first settlers in the area, coming from Pennsylvania about 1817. Three Mennonite (MC) churches in the immediate vicinity (Oak Grove, Smithville, Salem); Rittman Mennonite Home for the Aged is five miles northeast. Smithville is in Green Township, one of the most productive agricultural regions in the nation. V.M.Ge.

Smithville (Ohio) Mennonite Church (MC) is the former Pleasant Hill Mennonite Church (q.v.). In 1958 the congregation built a new meetinghouse at the eastern edge of Smithville village, leaving its old meetinghouse unoccupied. H.S.B.

Smucker (Schmucker, Smoker, Smuker, Smooker). Records show this family living in Switzerland and near Heidelberg, Germany, in the 18th century. Christian Schmucker emigrated from Switzerland to Berks County, Pa., in 1752. He is the ancestor of approximately 8,000 descendants living in Mennonite communities, chiefly in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. The first Smucker pioneer to push westward from Pennsylvania was Christian Schmucker, grandson of the immigrant ancestor, who settled in Wayne County, Ohio, about 1819. In 1841, Isaac Schmucker, an Amish preacher, moved from Ohio to Elkhart County, Ind., and conducted the first Amish Mennonite service in Indiana. In 1843 he was ordained bishop. His son Jonathan P. Schmucker (q.v.) was ordained bishop in 1878. The latter was active in promoting Sunday schools among the Amish Mennonites, and was one of the originators of the Indiana-Michigan Amish Menn. Conference. Four ministers living today and well known in Mennonite circles are Ralph Smucker (MC), a former missionary in India, George R. Smoker (MC), a missionary to Africa, Don. Smucker (GCM), a former professor in the Mennonite Biblical Seminary, and Jesse N. Smucker (GCM), editor of The Mennonite and former president of the General Conference Mennonite Church. S.J.S.

Smucker, Jonathan P. (1834-1903), a leader in the Indiana-Michigan Amish Mennonite Conference (now MC), was born in Wayne County, Ohio, May 8, 1834, the son of Bishop Isaac Schmucker (1810-93), the first Amish bishop in Indiana, and the great-grandson of Swiss immigrant Christian Schmucker from Bern and Barbara Stoltzfus of Zweibrücken. Jonathan moved with his parents to Knox County, Ohio, in 1838, where his father was ordained preacher. In November 1841 Isaac Schmucker and family located in Elkhart County, Ind., where two years later he was ordained bishop. Jonathan Smucker's first wife was Salome Pecht (d. 1893). To this union eleven children were born. In 1873 Jonathan Smucker joined the small Amish Mennonite settlement at Grovertown in Starke County, Ind., where he was ordained deacon and later preacher that same year by Bishop Jonas D. Troyer. (Troyer was the leader of the progressive Amish Mennonite schism from the Old Order Amish in Elkhart County in 1854.) In 1875 Smucker moved to west of Nappanee and took charge of the small Amish Mennonite congregation which worshipped on West Market Street in Nappanee. In 1878 he was ordained bishop in this congregation by bishops Joseph Stuckey and Isaac Smucker. In 1895 he married Mary Stutzman Kauffman, and then located east of Goshen, where he died Nov. 23, 1903. He was active in Amish Mennonite circles from Pennsylvania to Oregon, and was a strong promoter of church unity. He was buried in the Union Center Cemetery northeast of Nappanee. J.C.W.

Smyth (Smith), John (c1565-1612), was born in East England. He studied theology at the University of Cambridge in 1586-93, and probably also medicine, and became a minister in the Church of England at Lincoln. In 1602, after nine months of doubt and deliberation, he left the state church. About this time or shortly before he was won to the principles of the Puritan Brownists (q.v.), whom he had previously attacked in a polemical tract. After leaving the state church he seems to have traveled and preached for some months. Early in 1603 he was invited by a number of Puritan manufacturers of Gainsborough to be their preacher, and for nearly four years he served as the leader of the Gainsborough Brownist congregation. But the oppression of the Nonconformists was becoming more and more severe during the reign of King James I; Smyth left England, and with a number of adherents went to Amsterdam in October or November 1607. Here he found a Brownist congregation led by Francis Johnson (q.v.) and Henry Ainsworth (q.v.). Smyth and his followers, however, did not join this congregation, but founded a second English (Brownist) church, apparently because he did not agree with Johnson's views, who leaned toward Calvinist doctrines, such as predestination. While serving this congregation as minister, Smyth made his living by the practice of medicine. The Smyth congregation, at first rather small in membership, increased, particularly in 1607 when the Brownist congregation of Scrooby, of which John Robinson (q.v.), "the father of the Pilgrims," had been the preacher, also moved to Amsterdam. Some of its members, including Thomas Helwys (q.v.), joined the Smyth group. In the meantime Smyth had come to a deeper understanding of the nature of the church, and believed that the church should be a church of believers and only those should be admitted to the church who were converted to the faith, infant baptism being unscriptural. He severely attacked the Johnson group, accusing them of idolatry while they maintained the legality of infant baptism and ministers' ordination received in the state church, and reproaching them with accepting money from unbelievers. Smyth's reproofs were not all fair, and caused a sharp paper war with Johnson, Robinson, Clyfton, and others.

Smyth, convinced of the truth of his newly acquired views, and with the approval of his congregation, step by step turned to Anabaptism, and finally, holding that the baptisms he performed were not valid because he himself had not received the right baptism, in the fall of 1608 "in the solemn divine service, before them all (i.e., the members), baptized himself on confession of faith." This baptism was severely censured by the Johnson leaders, and even in his own group some did not agree and left the Smyth congregation. Soon Smyth himself came to the conclusion that his baptism was un-Biblical and repented it. About the same time, Smyth with some 40 followers acquired Jan Munter's (q.v.) bakehouse for their meetings. Repenting his self-baptism and trying to bring his congregation to a more Biblical pattern, he sought to contact the Waterlander Mennonite congregation of Amsterdam, of which Jan Munter had informed him. As an introduction he sent a letter to this congregation, where Lubbert Gerritz (q.v.) was the elder at this time. In this letter he included a list of members, signed by 14 men and 17 women, all of whom declared that the self-baptism of Smyth was wrong; he added a confession of faith of 20 articles in Latin. (Later Smyth delivered a still more detailed confession in 102 articles.) It was obviously the intention of Smyth to form a union or even a merger between the Waterlander Mennonite congregation and his own. But not all of Smyth's followers agreed; about ten of them, including Helwys, refused to sign the letter to the Mennonites. Though they wished to be on friendly terms with the Waterlanders and sharing the Mennonite views concerning baptism, they did not favor a merger. Helwys, in the name of the dissidents, wrote a letter to the trustees of the Waterlander congregation, asking them not to consent to Smyth's proposal. Helwys also drew up a confession of faith (19 articles) pointing out that the Brownists in many respects agreed with the Mennonites, but differed on the nonswearing of oaths and nonresistance. Helwys severely attacked Smyth, charging him with apostasy and sin against the Holy Ghost, and soon after excommunicated Smyth and his followers.

The letter by Smyth was cordially received by the Amsterdam Waterlanders, though they hesitated to take Smyth's outstretched hand; the warning of Helwys as well as the objections raised by some Waterlander country churches in Friesland deterred them from precipitate action, though both Lubbert Gerritsz and the preachers of Amsterdam as well as Hans de Ries (q.v.), the outstanding Dutch Waterlander leader, urged a union with "the English." Lubbert Gerritsz and de Ries together drew up a confession of faith of 38 articles, an English translation of which was sent to the Smyth group. After a number of debates and negotiations, the union finally came about in 1615. By this time both Lubbert Gerritsz and Smyth had died.

Smyth published a large number of writings; besides two confessions of faith and a volume of sermons, The Bright Morning Starre . . . (1603), he is the author of many polemical tracts, including The Character of the Beast (1609), in which he explains his motives in his baptism and his proposal to unite with the Mennonites against Helwys. Most of these tracts by Smyth give the impression that in accord with the fashion of his time he was a disagreeable theological polemicist, but this view is one-sided, because this man, successively an Anglican divine, a Puritan, a Brownist, an Anabaptist, a Mennonite, through his whole life passionately sought after the truth of God. At the end of his life he found peace. Overwhelmed by the bitter polemical writings of his opponents, he kept silent. A few years before his death he wrote, "If any man say, why then do you not answer the books written in opposition? my answer is, my desire is to end all controversies among Christians rather than to make and maintain them, especially in matters of the outward church and ceremonies; and it is the grief of my heart that I have so long cumbered myself and spent my time therein. . . . And now from this day forward do I put an end to all controversies . . . and resolve to spend my time in the main matters wherein consisteth salvation." vdZ.

Sneek, a town in the Dutch province of Friesland (1952 pop. 19,530; 640 Mennonites), the seat of a Mennonite congregation. Little is known of its early history. Elder Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 54 or 55 persons at Sneek during several visits in 1551-82. In the early 17th century there were here three congregations: a Flemish, a Groningen Old Flemish, and a Waterlander congregation. Of the Flemish and the Groningen Old Flemish there is no further information; the Flemish united with the Waterlander church likely about 1620, the Groningen Old Flemish died out before 1731. The Waterlander (sometimes also called Flemish and Waterlander) congregation steadily increased in membership and in general could meet undisturbed except in the years 1600-1. Shortly before 1600 the Reformed ministers of Sneek, G. Geldorp and Johannes Bogerman (q.v.), tried to destroy the Mennonite congregation; they several times entered into the meetinghouse during services in order to address and "to convert" the Mennonites; they repeatedly held debates with the noted Mennonite leader Pieter van Ceulen (q.v.), who was living at Sneek. But all their efforts failed. Thereupon they made a petition to the city magistrates, asking them to forbid the Mennonite meetings, and even to expel the Mennonites on the ground that there should be only one church and one confession in the state, namely, the true Reformed church and confession. The magistrates, more intimidated by their audacity than convinced by their arguments—they were afraid of losing a good number of substantial merchants and skillful and industrious artisans—refused to expel the Mennonites as in particular Bogerman had demanded, yet resolved in 1601 to proclaim a mandate forbidding the Mennonites to hold meetings either in their meetinghouse or in private homes, on pain of heavy fines. Barend Jacobsz, however, one of the Mennonites, braving the mandate, organized a meeting in his home, and being fined, refused to pay the fine; thereupon some of his furniture was publicly sold. The mandate was, however, in the course of the year not strictly enforced and the Mennonites could meet again rather freely.

At first the Waterlander congregation held its meetings in a large room of a private quarter near the city wall, but in 1654 a meetinghouse was erected on the Singel, which held 600 persons. This meetinghouse, being rather uncomfortable and moreover in a dilapidated condition, was rebuilt in 1842 (dedicated on April 10) and in 1855 provided with a beautiful entrance hall. It is still used by the congregation. A large hall, called "Mennozaal," used for all kinds of congregational activities, was built in 1927 close to the church. A parsonage next to the church was built in 1900-1.

In 1695 (earlier figures are missing) the membership numbered about 200; 392 in 1796; 310 in 1838; 347 in 1861; 434 in 1900; 452 in 1958.

During the 18th century not all Mennonites living at Sneek belonged to the Waterlander congregation; a small number, more conservative in maintaining the old Mennonite doctrines and church discipline as well as in simplicity of dress, were members of the Groningen Old Flemish congregation at neighboring IJlst (q.v.). In 1746, however, the 17 members of this congregation who lived at Sneek, particularly it seems on the instigation of Wouter Berends, a wealthy brother of advanced age, separated from IJlst and founded an independent Groningen Old Flemish congregation at Sneek. A house on the Kleinzand belonging to Wouter Berends was adapted as a meetinghouse, and Yde Rienks was called as their pastor, serving 1746-d.63. The membership soon increased: 34 in 1754, 43 in 1767. Such outstanding families as ten Cate and Veen belonged to the Kleinzand congregation. Pastor Rienks was followed by Hidser S. Hoekstra, serving 1764-72, and J. U. Siedsma 1775-d.1838, from 1831 assisted by the preachers of Kromwal and IJlst. In the course of time, particularly from about 1790, most members of the ten Cate and Veen families and some others left the Kleinzand church to join the "Groote Huis" or Singel congregation. In 1839 the Groningen Old Flemish group merged with the Singel congregation, after an attempt at such a merger in 1813 had miscarried.

The congregation meeting on the Singel had always been served by ministers chosen from the brethren until the early 18th century. In 1746 Klaas Bruin, called from the outside, was the first salaried preacher, serving until about 1773; he had not been trained at the Amsterdam Mennonite seminary. The first minister from the seminary to serve here was Albertus van Delden 1773-97, followed by Pieter Wepkes Feenstra 1797-1842, Izaak de Stoppelaar Blijdenstein 1842-57, J. A. J. Verstege 1858-88, L. Hesta 1889-90, V. Loosjes 1890-1912, H. Schuurmans 1912-33, W. Mesdag 1934-46, and M. van der Meulen 1946-.

Church records have been preserved since 1667. Church activities now include a ladies' circle, men's circle, and a Sunday school for children. vDZ.

Snep, a former Mennonite family at Haarlem, Holland. Jan Snep in the early 17th century settled at Haarlem, probably coming from Goch (q.v.), Germany. In Haarlem he joined the High German-Frisian Mennonite congregation, but during the troubles in this congregation he left it to join the Flemish congregation of "den Blok" (q.v.). His son was Isaac Snep, b. at Goch in 1612, d. at Haarlem 1681, married to Grietje Teyler (d. 1681), who was from before 1649 an elder of the Flemish Den Blok congregation. Serving in a period in which the Flemish Mennonites partly became more progressive, Isaac Snep was throughout life a champion of the old Mennonite doctrines and practices. In June 1660 he attended the "Leydse Synode" (q.v.), a Flemish conference of conservative leaders who wished to face the growth of liberalism, which under Collegiant (q.v.) influences was propagated by such ministers as Galenus Abrahamsz (q.v.) of Amsterdam and Willem van Maurik (q.v.) at Utrecht. At this meeting in Leiden Snep and three other preachers were appointed to draw up a new confession of faith out of the four outstanding Dutch Mennonite confessions; this new confession, however, never appeared. In 1661 Snep was among the "buitenmannen" (ministers from elsewhere) who took measures to suspend four progressive preachers at Utrecht (q.v.). When in 1664 (see Lammerenkrijgh) a part of the Flemish congregation bi't Lam in Amsterdam led by the preacher Samuel Apostool left this church, Snep conducted the first service of this group on June 22, 1664, at the Oude Teertuinen. They were then called "Apostoolsen," but the name was soon changed to "Zonists" (q.v.). In his own congregation at Haarlem Snep also became involved in complications with a progressive group; he and Preacher Pieter Marcusz, defending the old principles and the authority of the Mennonite confessions, were opposed by two other preachers of the church, viz., Koenraad van Vollenhoven (q.v.) and Jan des Rameaux, who were followers of Galenus. After a few years of mutual reproaches and accusations the conflict exploded; in vain the burgomasters of Haarlem tried to reconcile the embittered opponents. Finally in 1670 the conflict ended in a schism; most of the members (1360) sided with Snep, while 508 took the part of van Vollenhoven. A brick wall was built in the meetinghouse, dividing it into two separate meeting places. Isaac Snep seems to have been a popular preacher, and often conducted services in other congregations, some as far away as Hamburg in Germany.

His son Thomas Snep (Haarlem, 1636-92), married in 1655 to Magdalena Bontemps, served the church of his father as a preacher. In 1680 he had some difficulties with his co-preacher Jan Evertsz (q.v.), who with the majority of the members separated from the main body and began to hold meetings on the Bakenessergracht, later at the Kruisstraat. Though Jan Evertsz seems to have been a troublemaker, Snep's conduct was not the best either; it seems that Snep, who was well-to-do and had influential business relations, played up Evertsz' financial weakness. Thomas Snep also preached at times at Hamburg.

In the 18th century some members of the Snep family at Haarlem were deacons of the church and trustees of the Mennonite orphanages. vDZ.

Snyder (Snider), a Mennonite family of Swiss origin, found today in Germany solely in Baden-Württemberg in the form Schneider, where Daniel Schneider is elder in the Reutlingen congregation and Fritz Schneider is elder in the Heilbronn congregation, while Heinrich Schneider is preacher in the Karlsruhe-Durlach congregation and a well-known Mennonite printer and publisher with a shop in Karlsruhe. In North America the name was Anglicized to Snyder or Snider, and is found almost exclusively in the Mennonite Church (MC) and largely in Ontario, where a number have served in the ministry. Among them were the bishops Jonas B. Snider (1858-1944) at Waterloo and Oliver D. Snider (1878-) at Elmira, and the preachers Elias Schneider (1815-90) at Waterloo, Absalom B. Snyder (1861-1936) at Wanners, his grandson John W. Snyder (1925-) at Bloomingdale, Elvin Snyder (1900-), a missionary from Ontario in Argentina and Puerto Rico, his son Mario (1931-) in Chicago, and Howard W. Snider (1923-), formerly of Saskatchewan, now Edmonton, Alberta. In Lancaster County, Heinrich Schneider (1722-62) was the ancestor of numerous Mennonite descendants. In 1758 John Schneider, a Virginia Mennonite, made a trip to Holland to secure aid for needy Mennonites in Virginia. Of the Snyders in Juniata County, Pa., a Christian Snyder (1819-74) moved to Freeport, Ill., where he was ordained minister in 1869, while Jacob Snyder (1793-1865), who was ordained preacher in 1816, moved to Huntingdon County and became a leader in the Morrisons Cove (Blair Co.) district. Four of his five sons were ordained to the ministry, Christian, Abram, Herman, and Jacob Snyder, the latter two also as bishops. Jacob Snyder led his small congregation at Roaring Spring into the G.C.M. Church about 1908. His son William Snyder has been executive secretary of the MCC since 1958. A branch of the Snyder family (MC) has been represented in the Midwest at Alpha, Minn., Plainview, Tex., and Kalona, Iowa. H.S.B.

Snyder County (Pa.) Amish settlement. Several families of the "Zook Church" in Mifflin County, Pa., moved to Selinsgrove in Snyder County, in 1948, when the majority voted to permit electricity. Among them were Bishop Jacob S. Peachey and two preachers, Jess and Jonathan Peachey. In 1956 the Snyder County group divided. Jonathan Peachey, with assistance from the "Zook Church" (which in 1954 affiliated with the Beachy Amish), led a separate congregation that permitted automobiles. The membership of the O.O.A. group in 1958 was 30, and in the Beachy group 21. J.A.H.

Snyder Mennonite Church (MC), located one mile west of Bloomingdale, Waterloo Co., Ont., a member of the Ontario Conference, was organized about 1824 when Henry Weber was chosen as the first minister. The first meetinghouse was erected in 1826, when Jacob Snyder (settled here in 1806 and owned 3,000 acres including the site of the present village of Bloomingdale), after whom the church is named, granted the land for the building. So many of the members followed the M.B.C. movement in the 1870's that the congregation was in effect suspended until about 1882. The present brick building, erected in 1878, was used by the M.B.C. group. Menno Bowman, at that time a deacon in the Snyder congregation, left to become a leading minister in the M.B.C. Church. In 1957 the congregation had 61 members, with John W. Snyder as pastor. H.S.B.

Soblahof(f) (Soblahov, Zobelhof), a Bruderhof of the Hutterian Brethren near Trentschin (Trencin) in Hungary (q.v.) (now Czechoslovakia). The household was purchased for 150 Talers from Hieronimus Thaus on Dec. 6, 1622, by Hutterites who were expelled from Stiegnitz (q.v.). On Oct. 23, 1623, Count Caspar von Illésházi received the refugee Brethren and gave them permission to furnish the Bruderhof according to their requirements and gave them a piece of wasteland in addition to all sorts of rights and privileges. In 1626 the Brethren acquired two more barren fields. In 1630 Caspar released the Brethren from the payment of fees which the Lutheran Church had required. In 1651 his sons, Gabriel and George Illésházi, confirmed the contract and all the liberties which Caspar had granted them, and in 1652 George gave them half the "Session" Holgasovska there (Beck, 484). On Oct. 5, 1652, Turkish troops plundered the Bruderhof and set it afire. Twelve persons were abducted or killed. It was abandoned in 1688. HEGE.

Sobotiste (German, Freischütz; in Hutterite sources Sabatisch), a town in Slovakia near the Moravian border, the site of a large Hutterite Bruderhof which is still inhabited by descendants of the Hutterites, the only Bruderhof which continued in existence throughout the entire period of Hutterite history in Central Europe (1546-1762). In the 16th century this market village belonged to the manorial nobleman Franz Niary of Bedek, lord of the castle of Branc (in the Chronicle Brämsch). Since he needed good tillers of the soil and tenders of the vineyards he invited the Hutterites from near-by Moravia to settle on his estate in 1546. Soon times of great hardship set in (see Slovakia), but in 1554-1605 the peace was not disturbed. Then followed a Turkish invasion, and it was not until 1613 that the brethren began anew to build a Bruderhof. From then on until today this Bruderhof has existed nearly unchanged. All the Vorsteher or "bishops" of the Hutterite brotherhood lived here, including particularly Andreas Ehrenpreis (q.v.). The lords gave the brethren a charter of privileges (Hausbrief) in 1613 and another in 1640 (see Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 128 n); the latter is still in the possession of the Hof and was reported in 1937 and 1938. In 1621, Franz Walter started an exodus of some 180 Brethren from here in Transylvania (see Alwinz). The best time was the Ehrenpreis period, 1630-62, which might be called the high point of the Sobotiste congregation.

In 1665 a marked decline set in. A delegation was sent to the Mennonites in the Netherlands for material help, but even though this was granted it could not stop the rapid deterioration of the Sobotiste group, both economically and spiritually. Eventually the practice of complete community of goods was given up, although many elements of it still remained. The 18th century saw the coming of the Jesuits (q.v.) and with it a real crisis set in. The brotherhood was no longer strong enough to resist the aggressive manipulations of both the Jesuits and the governmental authorities (details in Beck, Geschichts-Bücher, and in the Klein-Geschichtsbuch). The last Vorsteher was Zacharias Walther, a descendant of the oldest still living Anabaptist family (see Walter family). In his days the congregation numbered about 220 souls, and in 1753 they built a clock tower (Beck, 574; a picture of it in Friedmann, Habaner) and in 1754 a "Bet-Haus" (i.e., a meeting-house; picture in Lydia Müller). Beck found records of these years showing that Hutterite, or more correctly now Habaner, midwives were very popular and much in demand with the local population. In 1748 and again in 1752, Walther wrote to the Mennonites in Amsterdam, apparently hoping again to receive both material and moral support in the hard struggle of the time. (All the correspondence both of 1665 and of 1748 and 1752 is found in the archives of the Mennonite Church of Amsterdam.) But in 1761 the Jesuits decided to act: a number of brethren were taken into custody, including Zacharias Walther, who was sent into a monastery in Budapest where eventually he yielded and became Catholic in 1763, Heinrich Kuhn who turned Catholic in 1762, and Tobias Pullman (or Polman) who did the same in 1763 in the city of Neutra (Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 238, note; Beck 606, 610, 613, 617).

These conversions, however, were of little value. Privately these Sobotiste people continued in their old Hutterite faith as far as possible (infant baptism was obligatory now), and thus much hypocrisy developed. The brethren knew of course of the new settlements in the Ukraine which had been started by the Transylvanian group, and there was much discussion about whether or not to leave everything behind and try to join these brethren. One of the strongest in character among the men of Sobotiste was a Jacob Walter, of whom the Klein-Geschichtsbuch relates an interesting story. In 1782 he left Sobotiste alone, and traveled via Herrnhut (the German center of the Moravian Brethren Church, q.v.) to Vishenka (Wischenka), Ukraine, where the new Bruderhof had been started c1770. The next year he came back in order to take his wife and child along to these brethren; one daughter had to be left behind as she had married a Catholic. With the help of several other brethren who were sent back from Russia to assist Sobotiste, eleven families managed to escape the surveillance of the clergy, and some 56 souls eventually reached the new Ukraine Bruderhof, 1782-83 (the Klein-Geschichtsbuch, 373-74, lists all their names; some of them were also from nearby Velke Levary, q.v.). The last visit of these Vishenka brethren in Sobotiste occurred in 1795, but after 1782 no further transfers took place. Those who decided to stay in Sobotiste were resigned in their new religion (Catholicism), glad that the clergy allowed them at least to continue most of their old communal institutions.

In 1937 two American Hutterite brethren visited this place, and from the unpublished diary of David Hofer we learn the following details. The Bruderhof buildings had survived essentially unchanged since 1613, consisting all in all of 39 straw-thatched houses, dominated in the distance by the ruins of the former castle of Branc. Some of the names of the inhabitants were Baumgartner, Pullmann, and Tschetterle (Ceterle, Tschetter), all well-known Hutterite names (see Hutterite Family Names). All in all there were about 40 families who still lived in this large-scale Hof or colony. All of them spoke German besides the native Slovakian. In 1937 the mill, the dye house, the inn, the wine cellars, and the woods were still held as communal property by the present-day Habaner. The mill, erected in 1739, was still working. The Chapel was still standing, but the clock and bells had been removed from the old clock tower during World War I. In the Town Hall the visitors found an old clock of their forefathers. In the cemetery most tombstones had disappeared except one of 1755, for Tobias Seidel. The once famous pottery workshop (producing the famous Habaner fayence; see Ceramics) no longer existed, but some people had started digging and had found in the ground potsherds and a few fine specimens of this lost art. (Most of the Habaner fayence that has survived is found in museums in Bratislava, Budapest, and elsewhere.) In the houses and in the Town Hall the visitors found ancient heavy oak tables of Hutterite origin and other household goods, even old books. The charter of 1640 (Hausbrief) was likewise shown to the guests from America, who were received with warm hospitality by these Catholic Habaner. But, naturally, they showed little interest in their own history and the tradition of a time long gone by. Nothing of the old things described was for sale, hard as the American brethren tried to buy a few souvenirs.

In 1945 in the wave of anti-German feeling following the war, most of the German-speaking people were expelled from Czechoslovakia, and it must be assumed that this fate also hit most of the Habaner of Sobotiste, unless they declared themselves openly as Slovaks.

Social Background of the Anabaptists: General—The Anabaptists of the 16th century represented a radical challenge to the current social order and to the corresponding Catholic and Protestant social philosophies. Where the status quo represented a cultural monism with the whole society and culture grouped around a central religious motif, Anabaptism postulated a cultural pluralism which allowed for spontaneous and restrictive association, on the premise that by the very nature of the case complete homogeneity is not possible.

To the guardians of the social order the voluntary and exclusive assemblies appeared as a stab at social order and unity. Both Catholic and Protestant religious and civic leaders therefore felt that the movement had to be suppressed at all costs, even at the cost of contradicting their own religious professions. Their polemical declarations against the Anabaptists are filled with invectives against men who appear as society's worst enemies. These declarations became the basis for the interpretation of these stirring events until modern scholarship succeeded in placing the struggle into a more valid perspective.

A second ideological attempt to interpret 16th-century Anabaptism in its social development came in modern Marxist and Socialist thought. Marxist writers saw Anabaptism as an early stage of modern class warfare and as part of the Peasant Revolt (Engels). More moderate Socialists likewise saw it as the religious garb of class struggle (Kautsky) or as "the culminating effort of medieval Christian Communism" (Belfort Bax). From a completely different viewpoint Anabaptism became linked to the spirit of the French Revolution (Alexandre Weill), and Christian Socialists became interested in the social passion of this movement (Leonard Ragaz).

In both the 16th-century polemic and the modern social philosophies, interest was directed first of all to the dynamic or motivation of Anabaptism. While the Reformers did not deny the religious concern of the Anabaptists, they saw in their efforts nevertheless a revolt against duly constituted political and religious authority. In Switzerland Anabaptists were thought to have "sucked their poison" from Thomas Müntzer (q.v.). After the Münster (q.v.) uprising (1534-35), it became customary to accuse all the 16th-century dissenting religious parties of clandestine revolutionary intention. In this way the religious aspirations of even the nonrevolutionary dissenters were buried beneath the odium of supposed sedition.

In the hands of the Marxists the alleged revolutionary character of Anabaptism was likewise asserted. But now this became the glory of the movement. Whatever religious coloring it may have had, it was seen as nothing other than the class struggle in the economically determined course of history. The common denominator of the 16th-century Anabaptist bands was simply the proletarian status of their members.

Modern serious scholarship, however, has placed 16th-century Anabaptism into a completely new perspective. On the one hand there were liberal thinkers like Ludwig Keller and Ernst Troeltsch who recognized the genuine religious impulse underlying this movement. On the other hand there were the objective historical inquiries which have made available important historical data which had lain unused in the archives of European cities since the 16th century.

The first result of these inquiries of importance to us here is clear proof of the religious character of 16th-century Anabaptism. While admittedly the movement is quite complex in character, and non-religious factors are also discernible, an examination of the testimonies of the Anabaptists themselves and of their contemporaries shows that the movement can be understood only by understanding their religious experience.

In the second place, it follows from this that their radical social views must be interpreted in the light of their religious outlook and not vice versa. One of the major issues at the time of the Reformation was the payment of tithes to the church. This the Anabaptists rejected, because they repudiated an institutional church such as medieval Catholicism. But the civil tithe or tax they paid because the Scriptures commanded it, even though they rejected the magistracy in the sense of holding government office. They stoutly maintained that governments were divinely ordained and therefore must be obeyed. There are records of Anabaptists under torture addressing the officials under whom they suffered as ministers of God.

Finally, the social composition of 16th-century Anabaptism was far too diverse to allow interpretation in terms of class conflict. The initial communities in Switzerland contained members from all classes, as did those in South Germany and Moravia. The center of the movement lay in the cities in the enlightened intellectual and "middle class" circles, including both clergy and laity. From the outset there were also peasants and occasional members of the aristocracy, though admittedly the latter were few, probably for the reason that these were hostile to all reform efforts.

As to the earliest Dutch Anabaptism, Karel Vos, and in his footsteps A. F. Mellink, tried to prove that in the period 1530-44 with only a very few exceptions the Anabaptists came from the "lower class" and even from the dregs of the population, expecting from Anabaptism the improvement of their material conditions. W. J. Kühler and N. van der Zijpp have shown, however, that the vast majority of the Anabaptists in Holland and Flanders came from the "middle class," for a large part being craftsmen and artisans, and that the movement was purely or at least fairly predominantly of religious character.

In the wake of severe persecution, however, the descendants of the original Swiss Brethren, who today are to be found in Switzerland, France, Germany, and North America, rapidly lost out in the cities and developed a strong agrarian ethos. In the Netherlands, on the other hand, while strong rural communities developed, the city churches were able to perpetuate themselves and today strong city churches are to be found in centers like Amsterdam, Haarlem, The Hague, Groningen, Leeuwarden, Rotterdam, Leiden, and Utrecht.

Having recognized the religious motivation of 16th-century Anabaptism, however, we must note also the important conditioning role of the complex social forces operative at the time. There was the urban ferment of the city state of medieval Europe now caught up in the emergent mercantilistic nation state of the 16th and 17th centuries. There was the impact of modern political, economic, and religious theory on the peasantry. And there was the new learning carried forward by the men of letters and their busy printing presses. All of these helped to pave the way for the tremendous burst of spiritual energy released in the Protestant Reformation, which was then to be divided so tragically as the new wine was forced back into the old skins of the corpus christianum, and the Anabaptists arose to protest.

The motivation of the 16th-century Anabaptist movement was religious, but it did not occur in a social vacuum. Born in a time of intense groping, it brought perspectives to bear on the social struggle which were born of profound religious insights, and which were to play an influential role in modern history.

Anabaptists in the Hapsburg Territory, mainly Austria and Moravia. It used to be a common assumption that Anabaptism was basically a "proletarian" movement, made up in the main of "common people," i.e., laborers and peasants, plus a few artisans, while the upper strata of society everywhere joined the new state churches (Swiss Reformed or German Lutheran) or remained Catholic. This picture is certainly incorrect as far as the earlier period of the movement is concerned, that is, the first and second generations, 1525-70. About 1600 the situation greatly changed, at least for the South German and Swiss area and for Moravia and Slovakia. As the fervor of the beginning waned, the movement became more and more rural, and the economically and intellectually stronger sections of population dropped out. But for the earlier period the picture is by no means uniform: there were priests among the Anabaptists as well as nobility, also a goodly number of citizens of some means; the number of learned men, however, was never large, as the simplicity of the Anabaptist faith did not have much appeal to the "humanists."

As for Austria and the Hapsburg realm (which includes Moravia and Slovakia) our knowledge is based on two brief studies, one by Paul Dedic, which are, however, sufficient to allow certain conclusions.

(1) Clergy—Dedic lists the following names: Hubmaier, Schiemer, Schlaffer, Thomas Waldhauser, Canon Martin Göschl, Oswald Glaidt, Jörg Blaurock (though Swiss he was also active in Tirol), and perhaps Wolfgang Brandhuber. All these men belonged to the first few years of the movement up to 1530. To later decades belong the names of Leonhard Lochmaier, Leonhard Dax, and Virgil Plattner.

(2) Nobility—The best known is Leonhard Liechtenstein, Lord of Nikolsburg, the patron of Hubmaier and of the "Schwertler." He died in 1534. (His nephew Hans Liechtenstein, though sympathetic to the Anabaptists, was never baptized by them.) Of the strong Tirolean nobility there were Helene von Freyberg (q.v.), mistress of the castle of Münichau near Kitzbühel, who joined the Marpeck group; the Barons Anton and Siegmund von Wolkenstein, of South Tirol, who for a while joined the Anabaptists; a Bavarian nobleman, Michael Veldtaler (q.v.), who joined the Hutterites in Moravia in 1555 and became one of the most active members, being imprisoned several times and working as a missionary for many years. Dedic names also the wife of the Imperial Captain Katzian and a Tirolean noblewoman Agnes von Waltenhofen. Perhaps also the von Pappenheim (q.v.) family should be mentioned, supporters of Marpeck, although only distantly related to the Austrian territory.

(3) Burghers, the urban middle class of the 16th century, patricians, scholars, etc. The most outstanding representative of this class was, no doubt, Pilgram Marpeck of Rattenberg, Tirol, a successful mining and water engineer. Ulrich Stadler of Sterzing, Tirol, a mining official, and Onophrius Griesinger, likewise a mining official in Salzburg, belong to the same class; also Marpeck had originally been a mining official. The two brothers Freisleben or Eleutherobios (q.v.) of Upper Austria were outstanding examples of humanists among the Anabaptists (they, however, returned later to Catholicism). (Bünderlin, named by Dedic, was not an Anabaptist in the narrower sense.) Antoni Erfordter was a substantial burgher of the city of Klagenfurt, Carinthia, and a highly educated man. Jeronymus Käls, a schoolmaster of Tirol, was martyred in 1536. Later in the 16th century the apothecary Melchior Platzer (q.v.) suffered martyrdom in Vorarlberg in 1583. The number of physicians and barber-surgeons among the brethren was by no means small (see Medicine among the Hutterites): Georg Zobel (q.v.), a physician; Josef Hause, a barber (c1600); Balthasar Goller, a physician (d. 1619); and Sebastian Dietrich (q.v.), a barber. There is no doubt that a number of well-to-do burghers had joined the brotherhoods here and there, mainly in Tirol (Dedic), but the sources rarely give their names. In Upper Austria Anabaptism centered around urban places like Linz, Steyr, and Wels, also Freistadt (before 1530), which implies that here the movement was predominantly urban.

(4) Artisans, both master craftsmen and journeymen. To this class, no doubt, the majority of Austrian (Moravian) Anabaptists belonged; nearly all the leading men came from this background. Since they belonged to the lower middle class, the Anabaptist movement may sociologically be considered an offspring mainly of this stratum, in spite of certain exceptions. Certainly Anabaptism was not "proletarian" in the narrow sense of the word.

A scanning of the list of the better-known men among the Hutterites and related groups shows names like Jacob Hutter, allegedly a hatter, Hans Amon, a weaver of wool, Peter Riedemann, a shoemaker, Peter Walpot, a warper, Leonhard Lanzentstiel, a ropemaker, Veith Grünberger, a clockmaker, Andreas Ehrenpreis, a miller, Gabriel Ascherham, a furrier, and Philipp Plener, a weaver. One of the noblest crafts among the Hutterites was pottery (see Ceramics), and much fame came to the brethren for their beautiful "fayence." But strangely, not one potter's name ever appears in the sources, just as no cutler is mentioned, another Hutterite trade of high repute.—Every new member of the brotherhood had to learn a trade; even the former nobleman Veldtaler had to comply and learned joinery. In fact the elaborate Gemeindeordnungen (q.v.) are a good indication of their major occupations.

It is characteristic of this class of artisans not to hold too high an appreciation for scholarship. A tract of c1590 inquires "Why no scholars (Hochgelehrte) are found in our midst." Answer: because too much studying is a hindrance to a simple and straightforward faith. But, says Dedic, even though there were no scholars among the brethren, there were no illiterates either. With a few exceptions all the men were literate, and many were truly masters of the art of letter writing. Thus the educational standards of this group were definitely high.

(5) Peasants—In Tirol a great number of free peasants joined the Anabaptists, but again names are rarely given. Dedic thinks that only in Tirol did Anabaptism find response among this less educated class. In Upper Austria the movement took roots primarily in urban centers.

(6) Laborers—The only group to be considered here would be the miners (Bergknappen). It is known that the miners were a most alert and open-minded element of the 16th-century population. In the Inn Valley (Tirol) copper was mined near Rattenberg (q.v.), Schwatz, and Brixlegg, and salt near Hall. All these places quickly became centers of Anabaptism—to be sure, only during the earliest period (up to perhaps 1535-40). Of later decades no information is available. R.F.

Society of Friends, popularly called Quakers (a nickname given in 1650), founded in England by George Fox (1624-91), who began preaching in 1647-48, calling his followers Friends of Truth. His teaching was a vigorous attack on the Christianity of his day, the Church of England and the Presbyterians in particular, calling for a thorough transformation of the ecclesiastical system and the restoration of true Christianity conceived as a simple, completely dedicated following of Christ, under the authority of the Bible and led by the "inner light," a spark of which is in every man. He called for simplicity and brotherhood in all things, high and holy living, and a worship without any sacraments, ordinances, clergy, or liturgy. He held a vision of the ultimate conquest of England for his faith. Accordingly Quakerism was from the very beginning strongly evangelistic and missionary. William Penn (q.v.; 1644-1718), sometimes called "the second founder of Quakerism," was a very effective leader. By the end of the 17th century the Quaker growth was extraordinary; they numbered about 100,000.

Almost from the beginning the Quakers completely repudiated violence and warfare, standing for full nonresistance, and refused the oath. They suffered severe persecution for decades in England and elsewhere, but could not be suppressed. They developed a close-knit effective organization with strong discipline.

So much in the Quaker principles is similar to the principles of the early Anabaptists (not the form of worship or polity) that it seems impossible that there could have been no influence from Anabaptism upon the origin and ideas of the movement. However, the most intense search, by both Quaker and non-Quaker historians, has failed to uncover direct connections. There is a very real possibility, however, that the spirit of Continental Anabaptism, which was transferred to England (q.v.) in 1530 and continued to influence English religious life with results in the earlier Congregationalist (q.v.) and Baptist (q.v.) movements, had an indirect influence upon Fox and the early Quakers.

Although the Quakers of the first two hundred years retained a Biblical and evangelical orthodoxy along with their emphasis on the inner light and ethical matters, the 19th century saw a substantial change, completed in the 20th century, by which a large block, especially in America, adopted liberal theological positions while retaining the Quaker forms of worship and polity, although a majority of the Quakers retained and intensified the evangelical type of theology but surrendered typical Quaker worship and polity to accommodate themselves to American Protestantism. (However, certain groups of Quakers have retained Quaker worship forms along with evangelical theology.) Also, while Christian pacifism has remained fairly strong among English Friends, it has declined relatively among American Friends, even though outstanding individuals are active in Pacifist causes, and even though on both sides of the ocean official statements are uniformly pacifistic. The principle of personal freedom of conscience and the relative abandonment of discipline have opened the door to toleration of relatively any position on pacifism as well as in theology. The social service motive has remained strong, however, and both British and American Quakers have made large contributions in the fields of idealistic social service, social reform, and international good will. Outstanding in this field has been the work and influence of the American Friends Service Committee (q.v.), founded in 1917 at Philadelphia, of which Rufus Jones was long chairman and Clarence Pickett was long executive secretary. Most groups of evangelical American Quakers have also carried on extensive foreign mission work.

The distribution of Friends throughout the world in 1957 was as follows:

In 1937 the Friends World Committee was created which convenes a World Conference every 15 years. Outstanding work in relief, social service, and peace has been done by the Friends Service Committee of England and the American Friends Service Committee of America. The two together were awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1947.

The chief purpose of the rest of this article is to trace relations between Quakers and Mennonites, which fall in general into three periods: (1) Mennonites under Quaker evangelism on the European Continent, 1655-1750; (2) Mennonites and Quakers in Colonial Pennsylvania; and (3) Mennonite and Quaker contacts and co-operation in North America in the time after World War I, especially since 1935.

Mennonites Under Quaker Evangelism on the European Continent, 1655-1750. It is noteworthy that the Quakers in Holland and Germany had missionary success almost only among the Mennonites. This was due in part to the similarities of the principles of the two groups, but also to the fact that attempts to convert members of the state churches in most cases brought severe persecution. The first missionaries came to Holland in 1653—John Stubbs and William Caton, who preached in Middelburg and Vlissingen. William Ames (q.v.) reached Amsterdam in the spring of 1656; John Higgins, Steven Crisp, William Bale, Joseph Cal, and others followed. Ames was the most aggressive and most successful of the group. They succeeded in assembling a small congregation in Amsterdam, composed almost solely of former Mennonites. Among them were the parents of the noted Quaker historian William Sewel (q.v.), both of whom had belonged to the Lamist congregation. Ames and others also went to Rotterdam and Haarlem. Ames went from Amsterdam to Germany as far as the Palatinate, where in 1657 he gathered a small congregation at Kriegsheim, composed of eight former Mennonite families, which lasted, in spite of severe tribulation, until 1685, when it emigrated to Pennsylvania. (William Penn visited them in 1677.) Upon Ames' return to Amsterdam he was expelled from the city and went to Schiedam, Rotterdam, and Gouda, where he won a small group of former Mennonites. His continued success led to the calling of an anti-Quaker synod of the state church in 1657. Ames was imprisoned for a time, but this did not stop him. In 1659 a second synod issued an urgent warning to all the clergy to resist the Quaker inroads. Ames wrote back to England typically that he found the Mennonites "near to the kingdom" and "white unto harvest." (See Hull's Rise of Quakerism for exhaustive details.)

In 1658 Ames went to Friesland and in 1659 reached Hamburg, where he won the preacher of the Flemish Mennonite congregation, Berend Roelofs, and his four adult children. The Quaker mission aroused deep unrest in the city. Because of the Quakers the Mennonites developed serious internal difficulties as well as getting into external trouble. The state church preachers wrote pamphlets of warning against the foreign agitators, as did the Mennonite preacher Gerhard Roosen. On June 24, 1660, the Hamburg city council issued a mandate requiring all Quakers to leave the city within four days, as a consequence of which Roelofs and his group went to Alkmaar in Holland. However, a small group of Quakers persisted in Hamburg.

Ames apparently next went to Friedrichstadt in Holstein, where in 1660 he won a following among the Mennonites. On June 21, 1677, George Fox came to Friedrichstadt. The congregation here grew substantially through transfers from Bremen, Danzig (de Veer family), and Elbing. With the help of financial support from England, it was able to build a meetinghouse in 1678. The plan of the city government to expel the group was blocked by Fox through a written appeal to Duke Christian Albrecht of Holstein-Gottorp. As a result in part of conflicts with the authorities in 1706 and 1711 the group declined sharply in number through emigration and death. By the middle of the 18th century it ceased to exist.

Ames arrived in Danzig in June 1661, apparently seeking out the Mennonites. Although he was expelled from the city within a month, he succeeded in winning a few followers, not Mennonites this time, who were imprisoned for a time in 1663. Fox secured toleration for them in 1677 through a written appeal to King John III, the Polish ruler of the area.

Ames returned to Holland in 1661, where he spent some time working in the provinces of Gelderland and Overijssel, visiting practically all the Mennonite congregations, then moving on to Friesland. Although he had little direct success, a few Mennonites, Socinians, and others began to hold religious meetings patterned on the Quaker style. As a result in 1662 the Frisian government issued a decree forbidding the entrance into the country of "Quakers, Socinians, and immersionists," and ordering a 5-year imprisonment at hard labor for such as might nevertheless venture to come. In the same year Jan Roelofs and William Caton published a defense against the Alkmaar Mennonite preacher Pieter Joosten de Colder, entitled Een rechtvaardigke Verdediginghe der Waerheyt onses Godts (Hoorn, 1662). The number of Quakers in Alkmaar at this time must have been large. In Harlingen unusually severe prison sentences were imposed upon Quakers because of their riotous behavior. They complained bitterly about this, also about the attitude of the Mennonites as well as Reformed in the city (Menn.

Bl., 1854, pp. 55 f.). Among the writings of the Quakers against the Dutch Mennonites at this time and later were: William Caton, De Oorsaeck van de Pest (Amsterdam, 1665); George Keith, Het Decksel gescheurt (Amsterdam, 1670); Stephen Crisp, Uytroepingte tegen de Vervolginge, 2 vv. (n.p., 1670-71); idem, Een Geklanck des Alarms (Amsterdam, 1671); Judith Zinspenning, Eenige Schriften en Zend-brieven (Amsterdam, 1684). The meeting of William Penn and George Fox with Galenus Abrahamz (q.v.) in Amsterdam in 1677 is of much interest (see Sewel's account).

In 1662 Ames succeeded in winning a small following among the Mennonites in Emden which received official toleration in 1686, after much tribulation, but by 1688 there were few Quakers left in the city.

In Crefeld a small Quaker group was organized by former Mennonites, apparently in 1667, as the result of a visit by Stephen Crisp. Crisp visited them again in 1677, when he also visited Wesel and Cleve, where there were interested persons who apparently did not finally become Quakers. The Crefeld Quakers suffered much at various times, and since they never found real toleration, they finally emigrated to Germantown, Pa. Twelve of the original thirteen families who settled Germantown in 1683 were Crefeld Quakers. Stephen Crisp reported on May 6, 1685, that the Crefeld (and Kriegsheim) Quaker meetings had been discontinued, since all members had gone to Pennsylvania.

By the end of the 17th century, the British intensive Quaker mission work on the Continent had come to an end, as had also all Quaker meetings. Many English and American Quakers visited cities across the continent as far as Russia, throughout the 18th and 19th centuries, but these visits seldom resulted in the formation of Quaker congregations. Minden and Pyrmont, Germany, in 1790, were exceptions. But until after World War II there were no significant contacts with Mennonites in Holland or Germany. In Germany Bernhard Brons (q.v.) of Emden was an advocate of contacts with the Quakers (Menn. Bl., 1894 and 1897). Pastor Gustav Kraemer of Krefeld occasionally attended the Quaker Yearly Meetings at Bad Pyrmont in the first third of the 20th century.

In Holland a significant influence of British Quakerism on the Mennonites was the result of attendance of some Mennonites at the Quaker school and center at Woodbrooke, near Birmingham, England, which had been founded in 1903 and had become the channel of a renewal among the British Friends. Among those who attended were T. O. Hylkema, J. E. van Brakel, and C. Nijdam, all of whom became influential pastors in Dutch Mennonite churches. The Gemeentedagbeweging (today called Broederschapswerk, q.v.), which has meant a great deal for the renewal of the Dutch Mennonite brotherhood, was the direct outcome of Woodbrooke influence. T. O. Hylkema was the originator of the new movement, whose first annual conference (Gemeentedag) was held on Aug. 2, 1917.

Later contacts between British Quakers and Dutch Mennonites were almost exclusively in the area of the peace testimony, largely channeled through the European Continuation Committee of the Historic Peace Churches (1947-), which is described below.

The visits of British and American Friends to the Mennonites in Russia in the 19th century, and the substantial aid of British Friends to the Russian Mennonite settlers in the United States in 1874-75 form an interesting story, of which little was known until the appearance of Owen Gingerich's account in the MQR for October 1951, from which the following material is taken. The first visitors were Stephen Grellet and William Allen, British Friends who spent May 13-29, 1819, in both the Chortitza and the Molotschna settlements. A warm letter of appreciation from Elder Jacob Fast of Halbstadt has been preserved. John Yeardley made a visit about the middle of the century, of which little is known.

Very important was the visit of Thomas Harvey and Isaac Robson, official delegates of the London Yearly Meeting for religious service in South Russia, chiefly among the Molokans. After a stop with Mennonites at Neuburg a.D. in Bavaria in August 1867, they reached Berdyansk in the Ukraine on October 9, where they were guests of Cornelius Jansen, who was their guide on a visit to the Mennonite settlements. Correspondence between Jansen and Harvey continued for about ten years, even after Jansen emigrated to the United States in 1873. The interest of Harvey and Robson in the difficulties of the Mennonites with the Russian government which arose in 1870 as well as in the emigration of 1874 ff. ultimately led to the raising of funds from British Friends for the needy Mennonite settlers in the United States. In 1875, for instance, $10,000 was raised and sent to Jansen and others in America. Much informational material was published in the British Friend by Harvey in the years 1873-76. In 1872 Harvey and Robson published a small informational pamphlet, The Mennonites of South Russia, which included strong advice to the Russian Mennonites against accepting hospital service in the army (Sanitätsdienst). In 1879 they wrote another small pamphlet, An die in den Vereinigten Staaten aus Süd-Russland eingewanderten sogenannten Mennoniten, containing words of encouragement, which was published by the Mennonite Publishing Company at Elkhart, Ind.

The last item of interest here is the visit of the American Quaker Barnabas Hobbs, later a president of Earlham College, to St. Petersburg in 1878, accompanied by Charles Taylor, an English Friend from Manchester, England. Hobbs carried a message from American Friends to Czar Alexander on behalf of the nonresistant privileges of the Russian Mennonites. He failed to get an audience with the Czar himself, but presented to a high Foreign Office official his memorial on behalf of the Mennonites together with a historical statement on the policy of the United States toward conscientious objectors.

Mennonites and Quakers in Colonial Pennsylvania. The assertion has often been made that the Mennonites came to Pennsylvania on invitation of William Penn, who is supposed to have visited them in Germany. While it is true that literature advertising Pennsylvania was published in Germany and distributed in Germany (Penn pamphlets of 1681 and 1684, Pastorius' book Umständige geographische Beschreibung of 1700, and other material), and it is also true that Penn was eager to secure settlers from Germany as well as to aid persecuted Christians (Mennonites) everywhere by furnishing them opportunity for a secure haven in his Pennsylvania, there is no evidence that Penn either personally or in writing ever specifically invited Mennonites from Germany to come to Pennsylvania, or that he even thought about German Mennonites as a specific separate group. Certainly he never had any personal interest in the Swiss Mennonites. His agent in Amsterdam, Benjamin Furly, a good land agent, of course, had business dealings with Mennonite land buyers. Penn's journey to Germany, July to October 1677, was made as a Quaker missionary before he came into possession of Pennsylvania (he petitioned for the grant of Pennsylvania June 24, 1680, and received the charter for it March 14, 1681). In any case, although on this trip he visited several places in Holland where he came in contact with Mennonites, he did not visit any Mennonite community in Germany. He did visit the Kriegsheim Quakers and the Frankfurt "Saalhof" Pietists. The contact with the Crefeld Quakers and Mennonites was made through Jacob Telner (q.v.), an Amsterdam and Crefeld Quaker (former Mennonite) merchant of considerable wealth, who had business connections in Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and London, and who in March 1682, with two friends, Dirck Sipman of Crefeld and Jan Streypers of Kaldenkirchen, purchased 15,000 acres of land in Pennsylvania with the purpose of founding a colony (deed signed personally by Penn and executed in London). Even in the absence of direct solicitation by Penn, however, the promised religious tolerance in Pennsylvania with freedom from war and the oath, and enticing economic opportunity was sufficient to move the first fifty or more Crefeld-Lower Rhine Mennonite and Quaker families to leave their homeland between 1683 and 1708. And without doubt the Kriegsheim Quaker emigrants from the Palatinate in 1685 sent favorable reports back to their relatives (some Mennonite?) in their homeland. At least the 1707 forerunners of the great Palatine Mennonite emigration of 1711-56 came from territory near Kriegsheim. The Swiss emigrants of 1709-10, who came to the Lancaster County, Pa., area, were handled by an agent, François Michelle, who found the land for them and negotiated for them with Penn for its purchase, and were not personally responsible for the choice of Pennsylvania. Earlier attempts had been made by the government of Bern to settle them in North Carolina.

Wm. I. Hull (Dutch Quaker Migration to Pennsylvania) has shown that most of the thirteen original families settling Germantown in October 1683 were a group of closely related Quaker families from Crefeld, former Mennonites, of course, but not Mennonites at that time as had long been supposed. Only one at least continued as a Mennonite. The Mennonite group in Germantown was in the minority for some years and was in danger of being swamped by the Quakers. In 1690 it finally began to hold separate meetings, and gradually organized in the traditional Mennonite way, but did not build a meetinghouse until 1708, nor hold a baptismal or communion service until that year. The famous Protest against Slavery of 1688 has often been attributed, erroneously however, to Mennonites, only one of the four signers was a Mennonite, and the protest was actually delivered to a Friends monthly meeting as a protest against Friends holding slaves. The most Mennonites can claim is that three of the signers had once been Mennonites, and that no English Friend was among the signers.

The relations between Mennonites and Quakers in Pennsylvania in colonial times were friendly, largely because of the common stand against war and oaths, and probably also out of sense of gratitude on the part of the Mennonites for their new homeland. Evidence shows that the Mennonites, along with the other nonresistant German groups, gave the Quakers strong support at the polls, and made it possible for them to continue in control of the provincial assembly long after Quaker votes alone would not have been enough. Other German nonresistant groups, such as the Moravians, Schwenckfelders, and Dunkards, no doubt also contributed to this result.

It is also most likely that the well-known position against war and the oath held by the very influential Quaker groups in several of the colonies was the chief reason for the introduction of specific provisions in many of the colonial and later state constitutions guaranteeing freedom of conscience on these points. In fact, where any specific group is mentioned in such provisions, usually Quakers and Mennonites (and Moravians) are mentioned together. Quakers certainly have made the major contribution to the establishment of the strong tradition in American life which recognizes the religious conscience which is opposed to military service and oath-taking.

It is also probable that the Quaker simplicity of costume, which was a principle brought along from England and which established uniform costume for both men and women, had some influence on Mennonite costume. Mennonites did not bring from Europe the principle or practice of a uniform costume, although they did bring the principle of simplicity with them. The great similarity of Mennonite and Quaker "plain" costumes in Eastern Pennsylvania suggests definite Quaker influence.

Good relations between the Philadelphia Quakers and the Eastern Pennsylvania Mennonites have persisted to the present day, without any direct connections. There is one exception: for many years during the 19th and early 20th centuries Philadelphia Quaker representatives made annual visits to a Mennonite Sunday service in Montgomery County, where they were always invited to preach.

Mennonite and Quaker Relations in North America Since World War I. About 50 young Mennonite CO draftees, who were given furlough for this purpose by the United States Army, volunteered for service in the Friends Reconstruction Unit in France under the American Friends Service Committee, which had been organized for this purpose in 1917. These men were largely from the Mennonite Church (MC) and were largely supported by the Mennonite Relief Commission for War Sufferers (q.v.) beginning in 1918, although the workers were appointed directly by the AFSC. There was no direct cooperation between the Mennonites and Friends during World War I in working on CO problems as there was later in World War II.

The Friends initiated the movement which came to be known as the Conference of Pacifist Churches. The first meeting was held in August 1922 at Bluffton, Ohio, where besides the Mennonites, Brethren, and Friends, Schwenckfelders and Moravians were invited. The latter two did not join the movement permanently, but the three other groups continued together in the conferences (1923, 1926, 1927, 1929, 1931). In October 1935, under the leadership of H. P. Krehbiel, a conference met at Newton, Kan., which was called the Conference of Historic Peace Churches. The name HPC was either coined or fixed in connection with this meeting, which resulted in the creation of a Continuation Committee of the HPC to carry on further interrelations in the interest of the historic peace testimony of the three groups, particularly in relation to the prospect of a World War, which actually came to Europe in 1939 (America 1941). This committee is still functioning and has rendered a valuable service, not as an operating committee, but as a contact committee which furnished the stimulus for the administrative agencies to act. It was also the channel for the creation of a similar and identically named Continuation Committee of the HPC in Europe, created in 1947, in which a representative of the British Friends, the Mennonite Central Committee, the Brethren Service Committee, and ultimately also of the International Fellowship of Reconciliation meet occasionally for contact, stimulus, and certain co-operative activities on the European Continent or in England. When World War II came, the Mennonites, Friends, and Brethren organized the National Service Board for Religious Objectors (q.v.) with its office in Washington, D.C., as a common liaison with Selective Service and the United States Congress and other governmental offices. The Friends withdrew active participation in 1946, but have remained in close touch with its work.

Until the MCC was fully ready to operate as a general foreign relief agency on behalf of the Mennonites, it depended upon the aid of the AFSC. For instance, the MCC relief work in France in 1939-41 was carried on through the good offices and administrative channels of the AFSC, as was the relief work in Spain carried on in 1937-41 by the Mennonite Relief Committee (Elkhart). Since then, the AFSC and the MCC have been on friendly terms but each agency has gone its own way.

The AFSC sponsored a series of Institutes of International Relations between the two world wars and beyond, at various centers in the United States. One of these centers was Bethel College, North Newton, Kan., where an institute was held annually in the second half of the 1930's, with co-operation of members of the college faculty in the management. The Institute was moved to Wichita in 1941. The Conference of Historic Peace Churches in Ontario, founded in 1945, has from the beginning included the small body of Canadian Quakers.

The intermingling of a small number of Mennonites and Friends in the ways mentioned above has served as a stimulus to both sides and no doubt served common interests usefully. There has not been, however, any appreciable drawing together of the groups as a whole because of this, either in recent times or earlier.

Socinianism is the theology and the doctrines projected and drawn up by Laelius (Lelio) Socinus (q.v.) and in particular by his nephew Faustus Socinus (q.v.), and taught in the Socinian or Polish Brethren Church. This theology is best known from the Racovian Catechism (first ed. Polish 1605, then German 1608, Latin 1609, Dutch 1659; revised reprints Latin 1665, Dutch 1666). Socinian doctrine differs from the main Protestant theology, both Lutheran and Calvinist, by (a) its anti-Trinitarianism, (b) its rejection of the deity of Jesus Christ, (c) its rejection of the atonement by the blood of Christ (satisfaction), (d) its strong emphasis on the free will of man, his reasonableness and his natural knowledge of God. The center of Socinianism is its denial of the Trinity. This doctrine is rejected by arguments borrowed from the Scriptures (Ex. 20:3; Matt. 24:36; 27:46; Luke 18:19) and from the reason (ratio). There is but one divine Person, not three. Christ is not a person of the Trinity, but a human being, though His birth was supernatural and His resurrection a historical fact. He performed miracles, because God had given Him the ability to prove His godly mission in this way. Much stress is laid upon Christ as a moral teacher; as such, men should be His disciples and followers. Men are sinners, but have preserved liberty to choose the way of righteousness. The justification of man is principally an act of the grace of God. This is, however, to be understood in this way: Christ died for men, to awaken them from sin and (moral) death. Justification is not the direct result of Christ's atonement, but the indirect consequence of His death. The main doctrine of Protestantism, viz., justification by faith, is formally upheld, but essentially undermined by the concept that faith really means obedience to the commands of Christ. Of course it is admitted that man's human good works never are satisfactory, but God by His endless love and goodness attributes complete justification to those who earnestly strive to be obedient to the commandments of the Lord.

The church is a body of believers who are converted; in its strict discipline is to be exercised according to Matt. 18:15-17. Baptism and Communion are not mysteries with sacramental overtones, but merely acts of confession. Though infant baptism was not quite abolished in the Brethren church of Poland, it was not considered strictly necessary to their salvation and baptism (by immersion) was regularly administered to adults.

The Socinians were opposed to taking oaths for the same reasons as the Mennonites. One of their principles was also nonresistance; the members of the Brethren church did not take military service and also refused to take government offices.

These Socinian views have widely influenced modern thinking; their theological and philosophical principles are the common possession of the philosophies of the 18th century; Unitarianism has also borrowed much from Socinianism. Socinian doctrines are the backbone or at least the background of modern Liberalism (q.v.). Yet there are striking differences between Socinianism and Liberalism (Modernism) in particular as compared with present American Modernism. Both Socinus and the Racovian Catechism as well as later Socinian theologians consciously built their dogma within the framework of the Scriptures; they accepted the Bible as the Word of God, His revelation, and did not yet apply subjective criticism, which is fundamental in modern Liberalism and Unitarianism. Moreover religion was limited to and identical with Christianity.

It cannot be denied that in the theological system of Socinianism there is a strong element of intellectual ambition and speculation, which often strains the very heart of religion. This was felt by Socinians themselves at times. The later revised editions of the Racovian Catechism (from 1665) are much less rationalistic and much more orthodox than the first editions; for example, in the 1609 Latin edition, the question why it was necessary that Christ suffer so much is answered, "Because all whom He might save are subjected to such a death and suffering," but in the 1665 Catechism is found the answer, "Christ by the will of God suffered for our sins, and resigned Himself to the shameful death as an expiatory sacrifice." Also in the writings of later Socinian theologians like Sandius (1644-86), Jeremias Felbinger (1616-90), Daniel Zwicker (1612-?), and Andreas Wiszowaty (1608-78) the accent is more that of evangelical piety. All these authors lived in the Netherlands and approached more or less the Remonstrant (q.v.) views.

Yet the strong emphasis in the Socinian writings put upon Christian morals as a fruit of conversion according to Matt. 7:17-23 was wholesome in a period in which the large Christian churches neglected the problem of Christian ethics and usually paid little attention to "good works."

The church of the Brethren in Poland contributed much to education and scholarship; its university at Rakow, Poland, was led by capable and learned professors, and students from every part of Europe attended its lectures in great numbers. There is an important body of literature by Socinian scholars. Among these scholars should be mentioned besides Faustus Socinus: Christoph Ostorodt (q.v., d. 1611), the author of popular theological books, the medical professor Ernst Soner (d. 1612), the systematic theologian and philosopher Johannes Völkel (d. 1618), the polemist Valentinus Smalcus (q.v., Schmalz, d. 1622), Johannes Crell (Crellius) (d. 1631), the author of dogmatic and ethical writings, the Bible exegete Johann Ludwig von Wolzogen (d. 1661), the apologist Jonas Schlichting (d. 1661), the Prussian statesman Samuel Przypkowski (d. 1670), Andreas Wiszowaty (d. 1678), the historian, theologian, and editor of the well-known Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum (1656 ff., 8 vv.), and his son Benedictus Wiszowaty, the historian and man of letters Christophorus Sandius (d. 1686), particularly known as the editor of Bibliotheca Anti-trinitariorum (1684).

There were about 300 Polish Brethren congregations. In 1603-37 an annual synod of delegates was held at Rakow. Until 1638 the Brethren church could meet undisturbed, protected by independent and liberal noblemen. In this year, however, through the machinations of the Jesuits, the parliament of Poland resolved to stop Socinian education by closing the Rakow University and even demolishing its buildings. Also their printing shop was closed. From then the suppression of the Brethren church began. A number of its preachers were banished from the country; others voluntarily went into exile. The congregations only secretly and with great danger could meet for worship. This too came to an end in 1658. Then the parliament forbade the Socinian confession on pain of death. Only those who were willing to embrace the Roman Catholic creed were allowed to remain in the country. Thereupon most of them left Poland, emigrating to adjacent countries like Hungary (Transylvania) and Germany (predominantly to Silesia, but also to Prussia), but also England, where they in spite of much interference prepared the way for an important Unitarian movement, at the same time feeding the 18th-century philosophy of Deism, whereas the Netherlands also gave shelter to the expelled Brethren. The elector of the Palatinate, Germany, permitted them in 1663 to settle at Mannheim, but by 1666 they were forced to leave the country. It was particularly in the Netherlands that most of its scholars and theologians settled. vdZ.

Socinianism in the Netherlands: I. Polish Brethren in the Netherlands. Soon after Socinianism had risen in Poland two of its representatives, viz., the preacher Christoph Ostorodt (q.v.) and Voydovsky, a nobleman, visited the Netherlands in order to look after some Polish students at the University of Leiden, and probably also to make contacts with Dutch theologians. They arrived at Amsterdam in August 1598; soon their books were confiscated and in October of the same year they were banished from the country, though they did not leave until 1599. During their stay at Amsterdam they met the Mennonite elder Pieter Jansz Twisck (q.v.), and visited Hans de Ries (q.v.), the elder of the Waterlanders at Alkmaar. In the course of time some other missionaries from Poland clandestinely stayed in the Netherlands, but they apparently had little success at that time in spreading their doctrines in this country. There was a rather large increase of Socinians when their seminary at Rakov was closed in 1638 by the Polish government. Some of their scholars settled at Amsterdam, and often had their books printed there. Their ideas (see Socinianism) found acceptance with some circles of the Collegiants (q.v.), some of whom—Camphuysen, Joachim Oudaen, Adam Boreel, Daniel de Breen, Joan Hartigveldt, Frans Kuyper, and more or less Johannes Bredenburg—appropriated Socinian ideas; the Socinian practice of baptism by immersion (q.v.) became common among the Collegiants. Among the Mennonites too they had some influence (see II). Also a few Remonstrants (q.v.) were accessible for Socinian concepts, though later on (from about 1650) Socinian theologians, such as Wiszowaty and Sandius, learned more from the Remonstrants than the Remonstrants did from the Socinians. Samuel Crell (1660-1747), a grandson of the early Socinian professor of Rakov, Johannes Crell, was trained for the ministry at the Remonstrant seminary at Amsterdam, and after having served as a minister of a Socinian congregation near Berlin, Germany, returned to Amsterdam in 1727.

From the very beginning Calvinism vigorously fought Socinianism. Repeatedly Calvinist synods expressed their deep horror of "Socinian errors," and "Socinianism" became for more than a century and a half the epitheton of heresy in general, as "Lutheranism" had been a common name for all kinds of deviation from Roman Catholicism in the early 16th century. Calvinist polemicists for more than a hundred years wrote thorough refutations of Socinian doctrines. The Calvinist preachers and synods induced the Dutch government to issue numerous mandates particularly from 1639, forbidding their teaching and the printing and sale of their books in 1651, 1654, 1659, 1662 (Friesland), 1674, 1685 (Friesland). Yet Socinians could live in the Netherlands rather freely; for example, Andreas Wiszowaty (b. 1608 in Poland, d. 1678 at Amsterdam), a grandson of Faustus Socinus (q.v.) and editor of the revised Racovian Catechism (1665), who lived in Amsterdam from 1666 until his death, and Christophorus Sandius (b. 1644 at Königsberg, Prussia, d. 1686 at Amsterdam), who lived at Amsterdam 1668-80, where he had his Bibliotheca Anti-trinitariorum printed (1684). Numerous other Socinian books were printed at Amsterdam, though rather secretly. The places of publication named in the books, Irenopolis, Eleutheropolis, Freistadt, Staupopolis, all mean Amsterdam. The most important of these publications was Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum (8 vv. from 1656), edited by Wiszowaty, containing the theological, ethical, and philosophical writings of Faustus Socinus, Johannes Crell, and other Socinian leaders. Socinian books were secretly sold in the noted Mennonite bookshop of Jacob Aertsz Calom (q.v.).

During the 18th century Socinianism in the Netherlands disappeared from the scene, but left a distinct trace in the philosophy of the Enlightenment and in the theology of the non-Calvinist churches and groups, such as Remonstrants, Mennonites, and Collegiants.

II. Socinianism Among the Mennonites. Socinianism undoubtedly had some attractions for Dutch Mennonites: its emphasis on practical Christianity and Christian morals was in the spirit of Mennonites, and they liked the Socinian doctrine of the freedom of the will. Moreover their practice of adult baptism, nonresistance, nonswearing of oaths, and their reluctance or even refusal to accept government offices—none of which were found in the surrounding Christian churches—deeply impressed the Mennonites. Though the conservatives like the Zonists and the "fijne Menisten" all rejected Socinianism because they wanted to hold Trinitarianism and the deity and satisfaction of Christ, the more progressive groups, the Waterlanders and particularly the Flemish and later the Lamists (q.v.), were in sympathy with some (not all) of the Socinian doctrines. They usually did not adopt the Socinian anti-Trinitarian views; they mostly did not deny the deity of Christ, though they emphasized His commandments as the Polish Brethren did. And as to the doctrine of satisfaction (atonement by the blood of Christ), which dogma was rejected by the Socinians, this doctrine was not expressly denied by the progressive Mennonites, even not by Galenus Abrahamsz, but the idea that "good works" are necessary to obtain the grace of God largely undermined the strictness of the doctrine of the satisfaction of Christ. As a whole, Socinianism was never accepted by the Mennonites, probably partly because they wished to avoid the punishments threatened by the mandates issued by the government against those "who were infected with the errors of Socinus"; but mainly for these two reasons: (a) The Mennonites did not want and did not like to have a theological system of any kind; Socinianism was a system, a dogmatic creed, and Mennonite spiritualism conflicted with every kind of dogmatic theology; (b) Socinianism, being largely intellectual and rationalistic, generally lacks the real piety and devoutness so much honored by the Mennonites. Granting these facts, Joh. Hoornbeek's statement in Summa Controversiarum (1650) can be admitted: Anabaptista indoctus Socinianus, Socinianus autem doctus Anabaptista (A Mennonite is an unlearned Socinian; a Socinian, however, is a learned Mennonite). This, of course, concerned only the more progressive liberal Mennonites.

The first Polish Brethren leaders who visited the Netherlands in 1598, Ostorodt (q.v.) and Voydovsky, made contact with some Mennonite leaders; e.g., Hans de Ries (q.v.), Pieter Jansz Twisck (q.v.), and probably also Jaques Outerman (q.v.). Twisck at once and completely rejected their teachings; de Ries, though politely and discreetly, rejected them too; only Outerman (according to Kühler's view) was open at least to some aspects of Socinianism. Charged with Socinianism by the Reformed synod in 1625, he was compelled by the magistrates to write a confession of faith, in which he formally repudiated Socinian concepts. Shortly after 1610 Jan Gerrits (q.v.) van Emden, the elder of the Waterlander (also called Frisian) congregation of Danzig, Prussia, requested the aid of his Dutch brethren, e.g., Hans de Ries and Leenaerdt Clock (q.v.), to help them resist the advances of the Socinians, who wanted to merge their congregations in Danzig and elsewhere with those of the Mennonites (see Moscorovius and Smalcus). A married couple (according to Jan Gerrits) had already left the Mennonites to join the Socinians at Danzig; it was probably Matthis Radeken, who after joining the Polish Brethren, promoted the union. The Danzig Waterlander church and the neighboring churches, however, were not in favor of this attempt and finally retired from Socinian obtrusiveness. About 1625 a serious dissension arose in the Amsterdam Waterlander congregation, in which Nittert Obbesz (q.v.) opposed the other preachers of this church. Hans de Ries clearly pointed out that the teachings of Obbesz, so different from those of the other preachers, had their roots in Socinianism. In 1663 Galenus Abrahamz (q.v.), accused by his Mennonite opponents of teaching Socinian views as early as 1655, was summoned by the Reformed Church Board at Amsterdam to answer to the Court of Holland; but the Court declared him to be a "good Mennonite." Yet Galenus, who at this time had many contacts with the Amsterdam Collegiants (q.v.), among whom Socinianism found a rather favorable reception, may in some respects have been influenced by Socinian doctrines. His statement in opposing his co-preacher Samuel Apostool (q.v.) that the doctrine of satisfaction as taught by Apostool was dangerous for a sound moral life, in any case smacks of Socinianism. Foecke Floris (q.v.) was imprisoned at Leeuwarden in 1687 by order of the government of Friesland, on a charge of having taught the doctrines of Socinus. Jan Klaasz (q.v.) van Grouw openly avowed about 1700 that he was a Socinian; others, though usually with more caution, admitted their sympathy with Socinian ideas. The notorious mandate against Socinians, Quakers, and Dompeelaars issued in 1662 by the States of Friesland and repeated in 1678 was sometimes used against the Mennonites. Jan Thomas (q.v.), a preacher of Knijpe, Friesland, was suspended in 1719 because of Socinianism, and nineteen years later three other preachers, Wytze Jeens (Brouwer), Pieke Tjomes, and Wybe Pieters (Zeeman), were suspended for the same reason. Johannes Stinstra (q.v.), the noted preacher of Harlingen, was also charged with Socinianism, but unjustly, and was suspended from his office by the States of Friesland in 1742; he was not allowed to preach again until 1757. In 1771 the Reformed Church in Friesland was still exhorting its synods "to guard against and oppose the pernicious doctrine of Socinus among the Mennonites." Outside the province of Friesland the magistrates were apparently more tolerant from about 1650. Only in Deventer, province of Overijssel, Abraham Willemsz Cremer and his colleague Jan Lamberts ten Cate had some difficulty with the magistrates in 1669-70 concerning supposed Socinian teachings. In the province of Zeeland there were also some difficulties. Adriaan van Eeghem (q.v.) of Middelburg was summoned before the city magistrates in 1665 and suspended for a time; in the same town Gerardus de Wind (q.v.), a preacher of the same congregation, had to answer for his "Socinianism" in 1726-28. Twelve questions drawn up by the Reformed minister Cornelis Gentman (q.v.) (see Geuzenvragen) were used as a basis for the questioning of the Mennonite preachers.

The conservative Zonists not only repudiated Socinianism, but also attacked the Lamists, censuring their sympathy with Socinianism. Lambert Bidloo (q.v.) did so, bitterly, in Onbepaalde Verdraagzaamheid de Verwoesting der Doopsgezinden (1701), and Douwe Feddriks (q.v.) in Mennonitische Onderzoek op de Korte Grondstellingen . . . (1700), mildly and cautiously Herman Schijn did so in Onderzoek op de Rynsburgsche verdraagzaamheid (1703) and Ontwerp tot Vereeniging (1723), one-sidedly and rudely J. Rijdsdijk (q.v.) did so against Eppe Botterman in Verdediging van de Regtzinnigheid der ware Mennoniten (1729) and Zedige Aanmerkingen (1735). Besides these, attacks on true or putative Socinianism among the Dutch Mennonites are numerous in (mostly anonymous) pamphlets published by Mennonites, like Jan Theunis' (q.v.) Der Hanssijsch' Mennoniten Socinianismus (1627) against Hans de Ries, and Communio (1655), Sociniaense Hooftpyen (c1600), and Theodorus van der Meer, Het Gekraay van een Sociniaanse Haan, onder Doopsgezinde Vederen (1663), all against Galenus Abrahamz during the "Lammerenkrijgh" (q.v.). The "Socinian" Mennonites were moreover heatedly attacked in a number of books by Calvinist authors like J. Hoornbeek (q.v.), J. van den Honert (q.v.), and D. Gerdes (q.v.). vDZ.

III. Socinian (Polish Brethren) Relations with the Hutterites. Since the Polish Brethren practiced adult baptism and favored a communal form of living, as the Racovian catechism of 1605 expressly indicates, it was but natural that these Brethren wanted to study the communal way of life in the concrete, in particular the Hutterite way in Moravia. Polish Brethren made at least four extended visits to Moravia in the 16th and early 17th centuries. In one case several young Poles spent a year on a Bruderhof as apprentices, in order to report their experiences later to their church at home. But in spite of friendly words no real rapprochement was possible, due to basic differences in genius and in their understanding of the Scriptures. Stanislaus Kot of Paris has recently published a Polish Brethren document of 1570, which gives a rather unfriendly picture of the Moravian Bruderhofs. At about the same time the Hutterite Chronicle includes the correspondence of the Vorsteher Peter Walpot (q.v.) with the Polish elder Simon Ronenberg, apothecary in Cracow (English translation in MQR for 1945).

Other contacts between the Polish Brethren and the Anabaptists and Mennonites are connected with the name of Christoph Ostorodt (q.v.), a Unitarian minister in Poland before and after 1600. He had tried very hard to establish contacts both in Germany and Holland with the Anabaptists, trying even to convert them to his way; but this endeavor ended with totally negative results. It was not until the later 17th century, when the Polish Brethren were expelled from their home country and were thereupon kindly received in the Netherlands, that closer ties developed between them and Mennonites (see Socinianism in the Netherlands, Ostorodt).

A truly rare case was that of Dr. Daniel Zwicker (q.v.), a physician and Polish Brother, in Danzig, c1650. He had met some Hutterite missionaries from Slovakia, liked their way of life, visited the Bruderhofs in Slovakia which were under Andreas Ehrenpreis, and was so well pleased that he joined the Hutterite brotherhood. With certain mental reservations on both sides he was accepted. But soon he left again for Danzig, only to drift away from all religion. There are also epistles by Ehrenpreis to a Hans Martin and a Jost von Stein, both of Danzig, German-speaking "Polish Brethren." For the interesting exchange of letters, 1591-92, between Ostorodt and the Strasbourg Swiss Brethren, see Strasbourg Conferences. R.F.

Socinus (Sozzini), name of two well-known Unitarian theologians, Laelius (Lelio) and Faustus (Fausto), Laelius Socinus (b. 1525 at Siena, Italy; d. 1562 at Zürich, Switzerland) was a jurist with a broad theological interest; he turned away from Roman Catholicism, but did not definitively embrace Protestantism. In 1546 he stayed in Venice, where he came into contact with an Evangelical group. He also visited Basel, where he met a number of humanist scholars, including Sebastian Castellio (q.v.). He also conferred with some of the great Reformers, visiting Calvin (1548) and Melancthon (1550). After 1550 he lived mostly at Zürich, but he traveled also in France, England, and Poland. Laelius Socinus, doubting and criticizing the official doctrines of the churches, Catholic as well as Lutheran and Calvinist—he seems not to have been aware of the Mennonites—wrote against the Sacraments and taught a vague anti-Trinitarianism in unclear and covert terms.

Faustus Socinus (b. 1539 at Siena, d. May 31, 1604, near Cracow in Poland) systematically worked out the views of his uncle. He studied at Lyons, France, and other universities. In 1562-74 he lived at Florence, Italy, at the court of Francesco de Medici, a liberal man renowned for his interest in science and arts. In 1574-78 he lived at Basel, devoting himself to the study of theology. In 1578 he came to Transylvania to combat Frans Davidis and his followers, called Nonadorantes, who taught that Jesus was not worthy of worship. In 1579 he moved to Poland, where he remained until his death, building up his doctrine of Unitarianism (see Socinianism). He had to combat numerous heterodox groups, Nonadorantes, Arians, Chiliasts, and also Calvinism and Roman Catholicism. After a long and severe struggle his views were fully accepted at the synod of Rakov (Poland) in 1603. Socinus drew up a confession, Catechesis, which was not quite finished when he died; it was completed by his closest co-workers and published first in 1605 at Racov, and is therefore called the Racovian catechism. The theological, exegetical, and ethical works of Faustus Socinus were published in Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum 2 vv. (Amsterdam, 1656). It is interesting to note that Faustus never actually became a member of the Polish Brethren, since he did not accept rebaptism as required, nor was he their founder. vdZ.

Sodom Road Mennonite Church (MC). Joseph Willich (1808-72) was a deacon (MC), of Reformed background, who came to the Niagara area of Ontario, was employed by John Boyer, married one of his daughters, accepted the Mennonite faith, settled on the Sodom Road south of Niagara Falls and a few miles south of Chippewa. In his home in Willoughby Township, north of Bertie, Ont., services were conducted for several years while he was active. This and the Riverside church afforded the places of worship for Mennonites of this area about the middle of last century. There was no organized work. The ministers in Willoughby were Christian Hershey, Jacob Miller, and John Zavitz. J.C.F.

Soest, a town in Westphalia, Germany, about 30 miles south of Münster (q.v.), was visited in October 1534 by eight apostles sent out by Jan van Leyden (q.v.) to convert its citizens. Among the apostles were Johann Dusentschuer (q.v.), Hendrik (q.v.) Slachtscaep, and Hendrik van Maren (q.v.). Soon after their arrival, they were all arrested and, on Oct. 23, 1534, beheaded (not Oct. 21, 1543, as is erroneously stated in ME II, 112). Anabaptism could not develop in Soest. Soetken Gerrits (Soetken van Rotterdamme), d. Dec. 26, 1572, a Mennonite woman of Rotterdam, Holland, who was blind, composed a number of devotional hymns, which were collected by a certain J. C. (unknown) into a hymnbook entitled Nieu Gheestelijck Liedtboeckken, commonly called Soetken Gerrits' hymnal. This hymnal, containing 102 songs without notes, was published by Gillis Rooman at Haarlem in 1592. The preface contains some biographical material on Soetken Gerrits. A second and a third edition, both containing 98 hymns without notes, appeared in 1618 and 1632, both at Hoorn. The booklet is very rare. Of the second edition there is no extant copy; of the first edition there is only one copy, found in the Amsterdam Mennonite library. Of the third edition, as far as is known, three copies are extant, one in the Amsterdam Mennonite library, one in the library of the University of Gent, and one formerly in the private collection of D. F. Scheurleer at The Hague.

F. C. Wieder, who described the hymnal of Soetken Gerrits, is of the opinion that there was very probably an edition previous to that of 1592, printed shortly after her death. Karel Vos confused Vrou Gerrets van Medenblik with Soetken Gerrits of Rotterdam. The article Gerrets, Vrou, van Medenblik (ME II, 502) is therefore in error. vZ.

Soetken van den Hout(e), an Anabaptist martyr, secretly beheaded in the Gravensteen castle at Gent, Belgium, on Nov. 20, 1560 (not Nov. 27, as is stated in Mart. Mir. and ML), with Martha Baerts and Lynken Pieters. After the execution their corpses were thrown into a pit outside the Muide gate. Soetken van den Houtte, also called Avezoete, was forty years of age and mother of three children, David, Betken, and Tanneken. She was born in Oudenaerde in Flanders. Her husband, Ghislain de Meulenaere, who had died before she was put to death, was also a martyr, as may be seen from Soetken's letter to her children: "Your father has confessed the truth concerning baptism and the incarnation of Christ, and gave his life for it." Soetken wrote this letter in prison to her children as a "testament." It is often called a "Christelyke kindertucht." In this "testament" she wrote thus: "My dear children, since it pleases the Lord to take me out of this world, I will leave you a memorial, not of silver or gold; for such jewels are perishable; but I should like to write to your heart, which is the word of truth of the Lord Beware of bad company, and of playing in the streets with bad boys, but learn to read and write." She admonished her children to goodness, kindness, humility, obedience, patience, righteousness, chastity, peacefulness, firmness, mercy, and all Christian virtues.

Soetken also composed a song, "Godt ghy sijt myn Hulper fijn, Verlost my van de ewige pijn" (O God, Thou art my good Helper, Deliver me from eternal torment). This song is found in the Tweede Liedeboeck (q.v., Dutch hymnal of 1583). The "testament" and also a letter written in prison to her brother and sister are found in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror. A separate edition of the "testament" was published as early as about 1565; the only copy extant is an incomplete copy, now found in the Royal library at The Hague. A second edition, to which is added Soetken's hymn, was printed in 1579 by Nicolaes Biestkens at Amsterdam. Of this edition also only one copy is extant, found in the city library of Hamburg. There are reprints of the "testament" and the song as follows: Delft 1586; n.p., n.d. (c1605); Groningen 1636; Hoorn 1641; Groningen 1664; and Amsterdam 1679. Under the title Uyterste wille van Soetken van den Houte it was reprinted at Amsterdam in 1699 and 1748. Copies of a 16th-century German translation, Ein Testament vonn einer frommen Gott liebhaberinn Soecken von Holtz genandt, are found in the Prussian State Library of Berlin and the city library of Zürich. The "testament" and the other letter by Soetken are also inserted in Thomas von Imbroich's Confession of c1560 in two editions, one of which is in GCL, and in the well-known devotional book of 1702 (1742 and 1745), Gueldene Aepfel (q.v.). vZ.

Solothurn is a Swiss canton bordering on Bern (q.v.), predominantly Catholic, in which the Anabaptist movement also gained entry, though it was not so strong there as in the canton of Bern.

The council of Bern carried on negotiations with Solothurn repeatedly in the 16th century on the Anabaptist question. On Jan. 10, 1531, it sent a letter to various districts bordering on Solothurn calling attention to the fact that the Anabaptists had recently held a general meeting, at which it had been decided to extend their missionary activity to the canton of Solothurn; "Since their misleading sect and separatistic Pharisaic hypocrisy full of all evil, wickedness, and sedition and contrary to the government instituted by God, are said to teach and to attach the common simple folk to them and deceive them, we therefore command you to watch such people closely and take care especially of the pious that would be influenced thereby" (D. M. R. 467 Staatsarchiv Bern). On February 2 Bern called the attention of Solothurn to Anabaptism practiced secretly in the border districts, Wangen, Aarwangen, and Niderbipp, and on May 18 it reminded Solothurn that the "deceiving obstinate Anabaptists" had been staying in Overlinsbach, and that this "sect entirely unworthy of the common Christian status" should be expelled. Solothurn took its time to expel the Anabaptists. From this time on Bern continued to complain about Solothurn's careless attitude whereby the Anabaptist preachers were greatly helped. The Anabaptist movement continued to increase in the Swiss confederacy especially in the Protestant cantons of Zürich, Bern, Basel, and St. Gall. The Anabaptist problem had become a very difficult one for the authorities of the Protestant estates, after all the violent measures for its extermination had proved fruitless. At the parliament in Baden in 1530 it was decided to arrest the Anabaptist leaders and punish them severely in body and property.

On Feb. 5, 1532, Bern complained that Anabaptists were holding secret meetings in the canton of Solothurn. And on March 16 Bern requested Solothurn to report to "my lords" in Bern the names of those who did not come to the preaching service. Bern even found it necessary to send delegates to Solothurn to present its request either to punish the Anabaptists themselves or to permit the Bernese government to reach into Solothurn and punish them. This led to stricter steps by the council of Solothurn; all foreign Anabaptists had to leave the country within two or three days and pay a fine of 10 pounds.

On July 1-9, 1532, the big Anabaptist colloquy of Zofingen (q.v.) took place. Bern requested Solothurn to send the Anabaptists from their canton to Zofingen, but it seems that the Solothurn Anabaptists were at first not willing to appear in person, but wished to give a written account, because they "were entirely sure of their faith and therefore needed no colloquy." Bern, however, demanded that Solothurn see to it that at least the Anabaptist preacher Lincki (q.v.), whom the Reformed clergy of Bern considered a clever hypocrite, came to the disputation. Lincki was active in Lostorf and Egerkingen in the canton of Solothurn.

In 1533 and 1537 there were again negotiations between Bern and Solothurn on Anabaptist matters since the Anabaptists were meeting on Solothurn soil, holding their meetings in Aetingen and Lüsslingen. In 1545 the council issued a general order to expel the Anabaptists within a week; those who were found after that period were to be tortured. A year later the provost of St. Ursen complained about "non-Christian" meetings. Toward the end of the 16th century the council passed several regulations expelling the Anabaptists and confiscating their property.

The council of Solothurn was also worried by the immigration of Anabaptists from Basel. Since the Anabaptists in the north of the canton of Solothurn in the region of Weinwil fled to Seehof in case of danger, and into the Münster Valley, which was in the bishop's district, the council negotiated on this matter with the Bishop of Basel.

The efforts of Solothurn to gain control of the Anabaptist movement by means of expulsion were only partly successful. In the 17th century it flared up anew. Beginning in 1676 a long line of orders and mandates were published by the council; the magistrates were advised to pay close attention and to institute the sharpest investigations, "so that such weeds can be exterminated before they grow up." In 1697 the homes were searched for dangerous books. In 1707 the pastors were asked what people were neglecting religious services in the churches.

In spite of the mandates the council had to admit in 1710 that the Anabaptist movement was not yet extinguished in Solothurn. In October 1719 a mandate was issued (renewed in November 1725), which imposed a fine of 100 guilders on anyone who would give or sell them any land, lodging, or food.

The Anabaptist movement had apparently become rather strong in Lütterswil; members here were Hans Bandi, Elsbeth Mollet, Urs Stuber, Hans Dick, Peter Mose, Urs Rätz, and in Lüterkofen, Urs Nussbaum, who was found in La Meutte in the Jura. In October 1711 Magistrate Reder reported on his dealings with several Anabaptists who had refused to render the oath of obedience, with the comment that "among them yes and no were as much as an oath, and their conscience did not permit them to give more."

Gotthold Appenzeller wrote the following (Jahrbuch für Solothurnische Geschichte): "On April 18, 1757, Johann Karl Grimm reports that he has found out from a dependable man when and in whose home the meetings were held at night. Therefore on the past Saturday night toward 1:00 he had found the people in Stephan Jaggi's house in Gossliwil, and questioned them, taking the names of all the men, had locked up their books, writings, and other effects and had taken Stephan Jaggi and Niklaus Knörr to the authorities. One of them had let a child die unbaptized and had an unbaptized four-year-old." About 20 persons had taken part in the meeting. This was a severe blow for the Anabaptists in the Bucheggberg. To the council this successful coup was very significant. A detailed opinion about it was published, which states among other things: Art. 1: That the Anabaptist sect had been found harmful as early as 1500 by the entire praiseworthy confederacy, they were therefore nowhere tolerated and in short "exterminated from all the villages out of your grace's lands without hesitation and shall be wiped out." The Anabaptists in the Bucheggberg were no longer to have the boldness to hold a meeting on this territory. By rendering an oath they were to desist from their faith, and if they refused, "all these sectarians shall clear the land," in order that "this region all be cleansed, depopulated, and as much as possible untrodden by that kind of people." Art. 2 designated that the Anabaptist property at Bucheggberg be managed by a special magistrate. Art. 3: The two preachers, Stephan Jaggi and Niklaus Knörr, were each to be fined 100 pounds. Furthermore, all who attended the meeting, whether they were really Anabaptists or not, were to pay a fine of 10 pounds. Art. 4 says that the Anabaptists must in addition pay the costs for the soldiers in the inn. Art. 5 gives information on the inventory of the Anabaptists arrested in Bucheggberg. The capital amounted to 8,425 pounds and the "poor" capital of the Anabaptist congregation 2,914 pounds, a total of 11,399 pounds. Their private property was to be left them, but the property of the congregation should be taken from them and used for the benefit of the churches.

On May 16, 1757, the council ordered that the confiscated books be committed to the Capuchin monks. On July 15 the Anabaptists were ordered to leave the canton by September 29. On Aug. 17, 1757, "Altrat" Vogelsand asserted that Jaggi "has lost his mind." The preacher Knörr had to leave his property in Bucheggberg and leave the canton with only 40 crowns. He died in Plagne above Biel (Jura) in July 1773. That was the end of the Anabaptist congregation on Bucheggberg.

In other parts of the canton of Solothurn there are also traces of the Anabaptists in the 17th and 18th centuries. In Kriegstetten, Madle Luterbacher, Caspar Wiedmar, and later Mathis Kaufmann broke out of the prison.

In the district of Falkenstein Franz Fluri and his wife were found, who still "persist in the damned Anabaptist sect." Further it was reported that the Anabaptists detained in prison refused to give up their faith, but at the same time they requested the council to release them to leave the country. But the council decided to have the clergy visit them in prison and "instruct them in our true religion." If they refused to be converted by teaching, other means should be used. The magistrate declared that the persecution of the Anabaptists was difficult to carry out in winter with the great masses of snow and impenetrable mountain roads, for the Anabaptists were meeting at night in the mountains bordering on the bishopric. On March 28, 1731, the council received the report of the magistrate of Falkenstein that Margareth Loosli, Catharin Obersteg, Hans Kaufmann, and others in the district, charged with listening to Anabaptist preaching, were questioned; the main meeting of these people took place in the Münstertal; hence a letter should be written to the bishop in Pruntrut to assist them; if the people were encountered on Solothurn property, they were to be arrested or expelled. Considerable numbers of the Anabaptists were also found in the region of Welscherrohr and Gänsbrunnen close to the border, today in the Bernese Jura. Presumably most of them fled into the bishopric, where they found more toleration. In the powerful changes wrought by the French Revolution the last traces of Anabaptism in the canton of Solothurn died out.

In 1899 Christian Gerber of Bellelay moved to Emmenholz, near Solothurn. A number of families of his descendants have been living here since then. In 1957 monthly meetings of the Mennonite families were still held in the home of Abraham Gerber, preacher, at Brestenberg. S.G.

Somalia Mennonite Mission (MC) in Somalia (formerly Italian Somaliland), East Africa, was established in 1953 by the Eastern Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. In 1958 its headquarters was in Mogadiscio, the capital city, with three other stations in Mahaddei Uen, Margherita, and Torda. The staff consisted of four missionary couples, two nurses, three short-term workers, and a Pax unit of three men. H.S.B.

Somere (Somer, Sommere), Jaques de, probably an emigrant from Flanders, Belgium, was a member of the Reformed Church at London, England. In 1575 he wrote a long letter (found in van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror) to his mother at Gent, Belgium, in which he tells the story of the Anabaptist martyr Hendrik (q.v.) Terwoort and his companions in London. De Somere was apparently on good terms with these Anabaptists, for he wrote very sympathetically about their faith and principles and told his mother that he and a certain Lucas had tried—in vain—to release them from prison. Somerset County, Pa., the third county from the west in the southern tier of counties, and Garrett County, Md., at the extreme western end of the state, lie side by side, with the Pennsylvania-Maryland state line running due east and west between the two.

Allegheny Mountain, of the Appalachian mountain range, runs through the two counties, leaving the terrain mountainous and rough with limited areas of arable and productive land. Before the coming of the white man the region was covered with choice timber. Underlying large areas were coal, limestone, fire clay, and other minerals. Mt. Davis, the highest point in Pennsylvania (3,213), is located on Negro Mountain near the southern boundary of Somerset County and the northern edge of the Amish-Mennonite community on the Casselman River. Nearly all of Somerset County lies between 2,000 and 3,000 feet above sea level. The summers are moderate and pleasant, the winters cold with frequent heavy snowfalls. Precipitation is consistently adequate for good crops. Agriculture is probably the backbone of the region's economy, together with a variety of industries springing from natural resources. Somerset County was formed from Bedford in 1795. Garrett County was formed from Allegheny in 1872.

The provincial authorities of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia had secured the land from the Indians as far west as the Allegheny Mountains by the treaties of 1754-58. However, nearly all of this territory lies west of that boundary. Settlement west of the Allegheny was discouraged and at times County and the southwestern part of Somerset County, following the general course of the National Highway, U.S. Rt. 40. The Forbes Road, built in 1758 by General Forbes, passed through Somerset County, somewhat north of the present Lincoln Highway, U.S. Rt. 30. Thus nearly all traffic moving west from Virginia, Maryland, and eastern Pennsylvania passed through this region. Many of the early Amish and Mennonite settlements in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and elsewhere were either founded or largely reinforced by emigrants from these two counties. Nearly all of the Beachy, Peachey, Bontrager, Eash, Gnagey, Schrock, as well as many of the Bender, Yoder, Miller, Keim, and Swartzendruber families in the Amish and Mennonite communities throughout the United States trace their ancestry to this locality.

By 1772 land was being bought in the territory by the Amish, and in 1773 a number of land warrants were issued to them by Pennsylvania. It is almost certain that "Tomahawk Rights" were established before this without any legal recording in the public land office. By 1783 more than thirty Amish and Mennonite names were listed as taxpayers in Brothersvalley Township, which at that time included both the Glades and the Casselman River settlements. By the close of the century the Amish were well established in the two counties, with two distinct settlements: the Glades congregation near the town of Berlin, Somerset County; and the congregation at the "River" (Casselman), located along the Casselman from near Meyersdale, Pa., to beyond Grantsville, Md. Later, about 1800, another settlement was founded in Conemaugh Township, near the northern border of Somerset County, extending north into Cambria County. Still later, about 1849-50, a settlement was effected in the southwestern part of Garrett County, several miles southwest of the town of Oakland, extending west to the village of Aurora, W. Va., in Preston County. This settlement at present surrounds the village of Gortner, Md.

strictly forbidden, until the land could be legally secured from the Indians. But daring pioneers crossed the mountains and settled here in spite of all protests and dangers. In April 1768 a committee appointed by Governor John Penn found in the region of Pennsylvania west of the Allegheny an estimated 150 illegal white settlers. The Tunkers or Brethren had crossed the mountains and established a small congregation in the "Glades" near Berlin, Brothersvalley Township, in 1762. It is well known that because of similarity in faith and manner of life, the Amish, Mennonites, and Tunkers were companions in pioneer life in many communities in the westward movement. Thus it is probable that the earliest Amish and Mennonite settlers lived in the territory before the land was acquired from the Indians by the treaty of Fort Stanwick in New York in 1768. Local and family traditions support this view.

In 1769 the public land west of Allegheny Mountain was thrown open for settlement. Immediately Somerset and Garrett counties became an important steppingstone in the Amish and Mennonite emigration westward. The Braddock Road, built in 1754 by George Washington's forces, and rebuilt and extended to the Ohio River in 1755 by General Braddock's forces, was the one artery of travel westward from Fort Cumberland, passing through Garrett

(1) The Glades, near Berlin, Pa.—The first land warrants to Amish settlers here were issued in 1773. But some of their names appear on the tax lists prior to the time when they received legal title to their land. The following are some of the earliest dates on the public land records: Christian Zook, warrant 1773; Christian Spiker, taxable 1773; Benedict Leman, war. 1773; John Zook, war. 1773; Christian Yoder, war. 1773; John Yoder, deed 1775; Michael Troyer, tax 1775; John Troyer, tax 1775; Joseph Johns, tax 1775; David Yoder, war. 1777; Jacob Schrock, tax 1779; Peter Leman, tax 1779; John Leman, war. 1785. Christian Blough, who secured his warrant in 1773, had arrived here in 1767. Casper Schrock, warrant dated 1773, had settled on his land in 1772 according to reliable family tradition. Among the ministers who served the congregation were Christian Yoder, the first resident Amish bishop in the Glades who served as bishop 1785-d. 1838. His son Christian Yoder, Jr. (1790-1846), who served first as minister and later as bishop, assisted his father in his old age and continued in his bishop duties until his death. His grandson Abner Yoder also served as minister and then as bishop until he moved with his family to Johnson County, Iowa, in 1866. Abner was the last resident bishop in the Glades congregation. Jacob Schwartzendruber, ordained a minister in the Amish church at Menge-ringhausen, Waldeck, Germany, in 1826, emigrated to America in 1833, and served the Glade congregation until 1840, when he moved about six miles southeast of Grantsville, Md. (New Germany). He served the Casselman River congregation until 1851, when he migrated with his family to Johnson County, Iowa, being the first Amish minister there and the first Amish bishop ordained in Iowa in 1854. Abraham Miller and David Yoder were also ministers here, for they signed their names as such at a ministers' meeting (Dienerversammlung) of the three churches in Somerset County on March 18, 1837, along with those already noted above. According to tradition there was also a minister Schrock in later years. Almost certainly other ministers have served the congregation. This congregation figured prominently in Amish history. At least one of the church-wide Amish conferences (Dienerversammlung) was held here, Oct. 3, 1830. Some of the ministers were influential throughout the Amish churches. But the congregation is now extinct. The last services were probably held during the 1870's. Jacob B. Schrock, a jurist of Berlin, Pa., recalled in a personal interview in 1950, that as a boy he accompanied his parents on a visit to his grandparents, the Michael Schrocks, about 1879, and saw the old benches stacked on the back porch, left there after the last preaching service of the Amish in that community. The congregation had no meetinghouses. There are practically no church records extant. In the old Amish cemeteries not a single grave bears a legible marker to the writer's knowledge. Fragmentary information must be laboriously secured from family records, local history, and tradition, and from general church history.

A small cemetery 12 x 15 ft. on the old Yoder farmstead marks the resting place of Christian Yoder, Sr., and Christian Yoder, Jr. Another cemetery with about 20 graves is supposed to contain the remains of Yoders and others. Some Lehmans are buried in a small plot containing six or seven graves, on the old Leman farmstead. Another cemetery has been farmed over for some years and all marks obliterated. These are a few of the burial plots of the now extinct settlement.

Why did the Amish leave the Glades? Many emigrated to other communities. Among the early Amish settlers of Holmes and Tuscarawas counties, Ohio; Elkhart County, Ind.; Johnson County, Iowa; Moultrie and Douglas counties, Ill., there were numerous large families who left this congregation in 1830-60. This had a weakening effect. But it appears that unworthy conditions within the church also had their effect. It was said of the congregation, "The people became too ungodly and the church could not stand." Coupled with this is the evident fact that the church lost many members to other denominations, notably to the Church of the Brethren. A few who remained in the community and the Amish Church joined the Casselman River congregation. The last survivor was Benedict Yoder (d. May 20, 1910), grandson of Bishop Christian Yoder, Sr. The Mennonite Church had no congregation here. Many of the young men accepted military service in the Civil War, and this contributed to the breakup of the Amish community.

(2) Casselman River—A few years after the founding of the Glades settlement, the Amish moved on to establish another settlement on the Casselman River. Michael Buechley, Barn Twp., Lancaster Co., Pa., bought two tracts of land some 4 miles southwest of Meyersdale, Pa., in the fall of 1772. In 1773 he bought a third tract and presumably settled here. Peter Livengood, the first family to bring a covered wagon west over the Allegheny Mountain, came in 1775. These two families, along with the John Olinger and Christian Hochstetler families, left the Amish Church and joined the Tunkers or Brethren soon after 1783.

Here, as in the Glades, the Tunkers were very active and gained many members from the Amish. In the town of Meyersdale, the Tunkers or Brethren had at one time more members per square mile than in any other territory in the United States. In 1775 part of the Buechley land passed to Yost Yoder by deed. Public land records show other early dates as follows: John Miller, deed 1775; John Hershberger, taxable 1775; Christian Gnagey, tax. 1775; John Saylor, tax. 1775; Yost Zook, tax. 1773; John Hochstetler, tax. 1779; Andrew Borntrager, tax. 1783; John Borntrager, tax. 1783; Christian Mast, tax. 1783; Jacob Mast, tax. 1783; Jacob Saylor, tax. 1783; Peter Beachey, warrant 1785; Jacob Miller, war. 1793; Joseph Mast, war. 1795. All this land is between Meyersdale, Pa., and the Maryland state line in the northern part of the present Amish-Mennonite community. By the close of the century, the settlement extended south into Garrett County, Md., beyond the town of Grantsville, Md.

This settlement continues to the present time. It has the following congregations: an Old Order Amish congregation dating from the beginning of the settlement and numbering at present 180 members worshipping in two meetinghouses; five Mennonite (MC) congregations with several mission stations, with a total membership of 553, Springs, the oldest, having been organized about 1780 with Jacob Seiler (Saylor) as preacher, who settled south of Meyersdale about this time; a Conservative (Amish) Mennonite congregation formed in 1895, with 260 members and worshipping in three meetinghouses; and a Beachy Amish congregation, numbering 159 members and worshipping in one meetinghouse. Articles covering these congregations will appear under separate heads.

(3) Conemaugh—This settlement, located at the northern end of Somerset County, originally included part of the site of the city of Johnstown at its northern end. It appears to have been developed largely by settlers from the Glades settlement near Berlin. Possibly the first land warrant issued to the Amish or Mennonites was to Jacob Blough in 1793. Joseph Johns (Schantz) of the Amish Church moved here from the Glades. He founded the city of Johnstown, beginning to sell city lots from his farm about 1800. Other warrants issued were to David Yoder 1802, Jacob Spiker 1806, Jacob Kime 1806, Tobias Miller 1812, and John Lehman 1835.

John Borntrager, whose warrant was issued in 1803, was evidently seated on his land in 1798. The Amish congregation dates from the beginning of the settlement. The first Amish bishop was probably Jacob Eash (1774-1850), of Berks County. Assisting him for many years was Jacob Miller. John Borntrager, born March 10, 1805, was ordained minister and served here until he moved to Lagrange County, Ind., in April 1844. Joseph Borntrager was ordained deacon in 1839 and moved with his family to Elkhart County, Ind., June 29, 1841. They with three other families were the first Amish to move into Indiana. Other ministers who served the Amish church were Christian (Schmitt) Miller, who died here in 1845; Moses B. Miller, ordained minister 1844 and bishop 1848, shortly before the death of Jacob Eash; Jonathan Hershberger, ordained minister in 1862; and possibly others. The Amish built a meetinghouse northwest of Davidsville in 1875. In 1884 they numbered about 100 members. The congregation gradually declined in numbers until they were finally absorbed by the Mennonite Church. The last Amish services were held in 1916.

The first minister ordained by the Mennonite Church (MC) in this district was Jacob Blough, Jr., in 1803-4. His father was the first landholder noted above. Ordained bishop in 1814, he was the lone minister here until 1830, when he ordained Jacob Blough of another family as minister. In 1842 Samuel Blough was ordained minister and after the death of Bishop Jacob Blough in 1849, Samuel was ordained bishop in 1850. By 1884 the Mennonites had three meetinghouses in Somerset County and one in Cambria County in this district with a total membership of 240. Their membership has increased and today this is the strongest area in the Allegheny Mennonite Conference. The area is generally known as the Johnstown District. A membership of 900 meets for worship in seven meetinghouses, three of them in Cambria County. (See Kaufman Amish Church and other articles dealing with the Mennonite church in this area.)

(4) Gortner—By 1849-50 the Amish of the Casselman River region moved on to establish another settlement just beyond the Maryland line in Preston County, W. Va., along the Northwestern Turnpike, now U.S. Rt. 50. The location gradually shifted eastward and the settlement now centers on the village of Gortner, Md., three miles southwest of Oakland in the southwestern tip of Garrett County. This region, often called the "Glades," should not be confused with the now extinct Glades settlement near Berlin in Somerset County. Among the first settlers was the Samuel J. Beachy family who moved here from the Casselman River region, to which locality they returned after several years. In 1853 Daniel Beachy with his family moved in. Later he became the first bishop of the congregation. Other early settlers were Petersheim, Miller, Schrock, and Slabaugh. Because of the settlement's central location between the North and South on an important highway, the people suffered much during the Civil War. Raiding parties from both armies took horses, cattle, and other property with them. There were also periods of internal disturbances. Under these discouragements some of the people moved back to the parent congregation on the Casselman River. The settlement grew slowly at first, but has had a healthy growth in recent years. The Amish Church has continued since the founding of the settlement, having a membership at present of 83 and meeting for worship in the Gortner meetinghouse, two miles east of Gortner. In 1899 the Mennonite Church (MC) began services in a union meetinghouse alternately with other groups. This arrangement continues although the group maintains its identity as an unorganized Mennonite mission church.

The Conservative Amish Mennonite Church has several families living in the region who worship with the Casselman River congregation. I.J.M.

Sommelsdijk, a town on the island of Overflakkee in the Dutch province of South Holland, a center of Anabaptist-Mennonite activity in the 16th century. Paulus (q.v.) Harrouts of Sommelsdijk was executed in 1540 at Zierikzee, and Joos (q.v.) Jansz of Sommelsdijk died in 1561 as a martyr also at Zierikzee. In 1565 Jan Barentsz and his wife, living at Sommelsdijk, were sought by the police because of their Anabaptist activity, but they had already fled with all their possessions. Sommelsdijk was the birthplace of the noted Dutch elder Leenaert (q.v.) Bouwens.

Elder François de Knuyt (q.v.) debated with the Reformed pastor Abraham Stamperius on infant baptism at Sommelsdijk in 1617. About this time there was a Mennonite congregation at Sommelsdijk, which had a meetinghouse. Concerning this congregation there is not much information. In the early 18th century it merged with that of the adjacent town of Middelharnis (q.v.), but apparently long before, probably by 1664, Sommelsdijk and Middelharnis were more or less one congregation. For the history of this congregation, see Middelharnis.

Sommer (Sommers, Summer, Summers), a Mennonite family name of Swiss origin. The early homes of the family were Sumiswald and Lützelflüh in the Emmental, canton of Bern, Switzerland. During the fore part of the 18th century members of the family moved to the Jura, Montbéliard, Alsace, and the Palatinate. The migrations of the early 19th century brought several Sommer families from their European homes to Ohio and Illinois. Isaac Sommer became one of the first settlers in the Sonnenberg settlement in Wayne County, Ohio, coming there in 1819 from the Jura. A brother, Ulrich Sommer, came in 1824. Christian Sommer came in 1819. Christian Sommer (1811-91) was ordained to the ministry in 1838, and bishop of the Sonnenberg congregation in 1862. He preached his farewell sermon Oct. 4, 1891, just two months before his death. Ulrich Sommer (1792-1880) came from Switzerland in 1824 and was ordained a minister of the Sonnenberg congregation in 1827 and bishop in 1842.

In 1836 George Sommers (1801-83) migrated from Alsace to Woodford County, Ill. He was a deacon in the Amish Mennonite church, and one of the pioneer settlers in central Illinois. Peter Sommers, a son, was a minister of the Metamora (MC) church for many years.

Pierre Sommer (q.v., 1874-1952) was the leading minister and elder of the French-speaking congregations in France 1900-50. D.L.G.

Sommer, Isaac A. (1851-1924), was born near Dalton, Ohio, the son of Abraham and Elizabeth Sommer, on Jan. 17, 1851. He attended the Wadsworth school (q.v.) for a total of four years, serving as a schoolteacher 1869-84 when not in school. In the spring of 1884 he worked for the Mennonite Publishing Company at Elkhart, Ind. In the fall of the same year he was appointed editor of the Christlicher Bundesbote, the official organ of the General Conference Mennonite Church, serving until 1911. He also edited the Kinderbote, beginning in 1887, and The Mennonite 1905-11. He was ordained to the ministry in 1887 in his home congregation at Berne, Ind., but he never held a pastorate. He died April 19, 1924. H.S.B.

Sommer, Pierre (1874-1952), the outstanding leader of the French-speaking Mennonites of France in the 20th century and their historian, was born June 15, 1874, at Herbéviller in Lorraine (Meurthe-et-Moselle), d. April 23, 1952, at Grand-Charmont (Doubs) near Montbéliard, where he had had his home since 1919. After his marriage on May 13, 1909, to Anna Kennel, he made his home on his paternal farm which he operated until into World War I, when he had to leave because it was almost completely destroyed in the fighting.

Sommer's education included two years at the Weierhof Mennonite school in Germany, and the high school (Collège) at Lunéville, France, from which he graduated in 1891. The winter of 1892-93 he spent at the Weierhof school again, where he was much influenced by the teaching of Christian Neff, the local pastor. After four years of military service 1894-98, he spent two years at St. Chrischona, near Basel, having been converted in 1898. He was chosen preacher by the Repaix congregation on Aug. 6, 1899, and ordained as elder May 26, 1901, by Jacob Hege of Reichen, Baden. In the spring of 1927 he was chosen as traveling evangelist by the French Conference, in which capacity he rendered outstanding service, shepherding and reviving the scattered French-speaking groups, which were in a low estate.

Pierre Sommer's service to the Mennonites of France was outstanding in several directions. Unusual intelligence and warmth of personality, combined with a deep and sincere Christian experience and a spirit of aggressive action, aided by a training considerably above the average in his church, plus complete dedication to the cause of the Mennonite brotherhood, enabled him to render exceptionally effective service and exert unusual influence. With his close friend Valentin Pelsy (q.v.), of Sarrebourg in Lorraine, and Pierre Kennel, of Montbéliard, his future brother-in-law, he organized the French Mennonite Conference in 1901, and with Pelsy was a dominant leader for the rest of his life. He was the founder and editor (to 1941) of Christ Seul (q.v.), the French Mennonite paper (preliminaries 1901-7, regular issue 1907-14, 1927-41). He wrote and edited a number of books, producing practically the only French Mennonite literature until 1945: Formulaire pour les Services du Culte à l'usage des Eglises

Evangeliques-Mennonites de langue française (appeared as a supplement to Christ Seul in 1912; it was a minister's manual); Manuel d'instruction religieuse, containing the Zweibrücken (Elbing) catechism, the Dordrecht Confession, a collection of prayers, and a résumé of Mennonite history (Montbéliard, 1922); Precis d'histoire des Eglises Mennonites (Montbéliard, 1937, first part written by Valentin Pelsy in 1912). Sommer wrote a series of fifty carefully prepared articles giving congregational histories of all the existing and extinct congregations in France, a total of some 65, to which he prefaced a general introductory account. This valuable series was in effect a history of the Mennonite Church in France, though never collected and published in book form. It is found in Christ Seul monthly from April 1929 to February 1933, with two in November 1935 and August 1936, and one in June 1929 on "Our Family Names." Sommer also wrote a number of valuable articles for the Mennonitisches Lexikon, and served on the Editorial Council of the MENNONITE ENCYCLOPEDIA until his death. His son-in-law Pierre Widmer has continued in his line, serving as preacher, traveling evangelist, editor of Christ Seul, writer, and historian.† H.S.B.

Sommerfeld Colony, one of two colonies (the other was Bergthal, q.v.) established in 1948 some 50 miles east of Villarrica in East Paraguay by Sommerfelder Mennonites from Manitoba (West Reserve). In 1953 it had a population of 644 (119 families) in nine villages, occupying 93,000 acres. It is located some 15 miles from Bergthal. In the first two years 75 families with 383 persons returned to Canada. The center of the colony is the village of Sommerfeld, where the elder, Isbrandt Friesen, lives and where the co-operative is located. H.S.B.

Sommerfeld Mennonites, a very conservative body of Manitoba Mennonites of Russian background who originated as a separate group in 1890 when the Bergthal Mennonite Church divided into a minority progressive wing and a majority conservative wing. The issue was acceptance of the Manitoba government requirement of attendance at standard English schools. The Bergthal group had originally all settled in the East Reserve east of the Red River (1874 f.), as a single congregation under one elder, settled in a number of villages, but the half who moved to the West Reserve in the early 1880's were encouraged to elect their own elder, which they did, choosing Johann Funk. Gerhard Wiebe, the original Bergthal elder of the immigration, continued as elder of the East Reserve group. Since Funk took the progressive side in the school issue, and even though his party was in the minority (only 61 families of 300), he and his group considered themselves to be the continuing Bergthal Church, and are so considered and named to this day. The conservative group in the West Reserve, who could not follow the regular elder Funk and elected a new elder for themselves, Abram Doerksen, were considered to have withdrawn and hence no longer entitled to the name Bergthal. They came to be called Sommer-felders because their bishop lived in the village of Sommerfeld, about 6 miles southeast of Altona in the West Reserve. Elder Gerhard Wiebe and the entire membership of the Bergthal group in the East Reserve then threw in their lot with Doerksen and the Sommerfeld group in the West Reserve. Though they could have retained the name Bergthal with full right, or taken on the name Sommerfelder, they came to be called the Chortitz Church because Elder Wiebe lived in the village of Chortitz. Actually the two bodies, Sommerfeld and Chortitz, were identical in position, although because of the parity of the elders and the lack of an over-all organization such as a conference, they remained organizationally as well as geographically distinct. The large Old Colony group in the West Reserve, largely immigrants from the Chortitz (Old Colony) settlement in Russia, with some from the daughter Fürstenland settlement, took the same position on the school question as the Sommerfeld Mennonites, but remained ecclesiastically distinct. Thus there were three conservative groups of practically identical position bearing—almost accidentally—three different names, Chortitz, Sommerfeld, and Old Colony. The Old Colony group, however, has become and remained distinct, while the Chortitz and Sommerfeld groups have more fellowship and to all practical purposes are one.

The Manitoba conservatives continued to be restless under the threat of the English school system, sincerely believing this would endanger the maintenance of their faith and way of life. Accordingly two large new settlements were established on the frontier in Saskatchewan: (1) Rosthern Reserve in 1893 and (2) Swift Current Reserve in 1900, founded because the Rosthern Reserve was full and overflowing. Actually some went from Rosthern to Swift Current. Most of the settlers in both colonies were Sommerfelders from the West Reserve. In the Rosthern Reserve one Old Colony village was established, while in the Swift Current Reserve a larger percentage was Old Colony. Both colonies were organized as typical Russian colonies with Oberschulze and the village type of settlement. The Swift Current Reserve (south of the city of Swift Current) is an island plateau of rich soil surrounded by an unproductive area; hence it furnished an ideal fulfillment to the Sommerfelder wish for isolation and solidarity, practically uninfluenced by the outside world. The original 30 villages of this settlement are still intact, and the Sommerfelder culture and language of 1900 has been maintained almost unchanged. The Rosthern Reserve with its 15 villages has not been quite as successful in this, since four towns have sprung up in the midst of the reserve, viz., Rosthern, Hague, Osler, and Aberdeen. However, most of the Rosthern villages are still intact, and the greatest proportion of the village people are still Sommerfelders who have maintained their culture substantially unchanged, with some 3,000 members. However, the conservative Old Colony group which settled here calls itself Bergthal and has about 1,000 members. They are not to be confused with the progressive Bergthal group in Manitoba, now a part of the Canadian Conference (GCM).

The next Sommerfelder migration was to Mexico

(1922) and Paraguay (1926), the result of the severe pressure, practically persecution, by the Manitoba government in the period of World War I and the strong anti-German feeling of the general populace. Manitoba wanted no cultural pluralism; there was to be only an English culture. The Sommerfelders were right in leaving if their sole goal was to maintain their Low German culture as a supposed necessity to maintaining their faith and way of life. The Old Colony Mennonites (q.v.) of Manitoba (q.v.) led in the move to the South. Most of the new Mexican settlement was Old Colony, with only one Sommerfeld village, whereas in Paraguay all were Sommerfelders. The Sommerfelder Colony in the Chaco of Paraguay was named Menno; hence the name Sommerfelder has disappeared there.

Since only about half of the Sommerfelders went to Mexico or Paraguay, population pressure continued to increase in the four mother Sommerfeld colonies in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. In 1930-38 a continuous migration of Sommerfelders took place to new frontiers west and north. In the early 1930's settlements were established in Sunningdale and Carrot River in Northern Saskatchewan, at that time in forest areas 25 miles beyond the edge of the white settlement. In the late 1930's similar colonies were established at Vanderhoof in central British Columbia, at Peace River in Northern Alberta, and at Gladstone in north-central Manitoba. All these new colonies achieved their aim of avoiding any significant influence from the English school system. English schools are indeed imposed by the provincial governments, but many families live beyond the zone of compulsory attendance, and many build a second home in the bush (forest) where they live in the deep winter, working at logging. Thus the dominant culture is Sommerfeld-Platt and not English Canadian.

In 1948, following World War II, a second migration southward to Mexico and Paraguay occurred, drawing from all four mother settlements. Two settlements were established in southern Paraguay, between Villarrica and the Brazilian border, bearing the name Bergthal and Sommerfeld. In 1950 the population was 1,200, some 500 of the original 1,700 having returned to Canada. Of the original group 1,500 come from Manitoba (both Sommerfeld and Chortitz Mennonites) and 200 from Saskatchewan.

An attempted settlement in Honduras in 1951 by eight Sommerfelder families from Hague, Sask., failed, since the Honduras government refused entry, and the group returned to Hague.

The statement that the Sommerfelder culture has been maintained practically unchanged requires further examination. It is true that most of the outward forms of social organization (colony, village, church, family) have been maintained, as well as the outward forms of religion (simple meetinghouses, absolute authority of the elder and ministers, no ex tempore sermons, but only reading of sermons handed down from the past, old slow tunes in the singing, admission to church membership at adult age by baptism by pouring, usually just before marriage). However, two serious internal consequences are observable: (1) a progressive deterioration in inward spiritual life, and (2) alienation of an increasing percentage of their young people from the church. The complete cut-off from outside cultural influences, except the small amount of English schooling in the elementary schools, has had its inevitable consequence in intellectual and cultural stagnation. The lack of a vital understanding of the Gospel and really creative reading and exposition of the Bible, as well as the suffocation of creativity in the ministry which destroys the possibility of revival and results in a complete bondage to dead tradition, has resulted in serious spiritual stagnation. The focus of all concern on preservation of the Plattdeutsch and the old outward customs has produced regrettable results in many places. This is not true of the Menno Colony in Paraguay, which has made substantial progress in spiritual and cultural respects.

Because the Sommerfelders are very loosely organized as a church, it is possible for variations to develop in attitudes toward the church while remaining ethnically bound to the Sommerfelder body. Three such variational types may be observed: (1) the orthodox, (2) the liberal, (3) the diaspora or scattered. The orthodox, the majority body, consists of those who are baptized and continue a connection with the church. The liberal element, who may or may not once have been baptized and reckoned as members, no longer have any connection with the church. Part of this element continue to live in the villages, sometimes constituting almost the entire population of a village. However, the larger part of the liberal element live in the towns in the vicinity of the main settlements, such as Gretna, Altona, Winkler, and Morden in Manitoba, Hague, Osler, Aberdeen, Rosthern, and Swift Current in Saskatchewan. Most of this group remain unchurched, in fact are generally cold and antipathetic toward all religion. A few have joined other Mennonite congregations or evangelical churches.

The scattered families are to be found in the larger cities throughout Canada. Some have gone to the cities for employment, since the colonies are full and land is hard to get, others to escape the colony life and culture. These generally endeavor to shed their past as rapidly as possible and lose their identity, often anglicizing their names. Some of them react to extremes religiously against their earlier background, joining the Jehovah's Witnesses, Pentecostals, Seventh-Day Adventists, etc. In two cities there are Sommerfelder congregations with meetinghouses, one in Swift Current, and one in Winnipeg of the Chortitz group.

The present total population of the Sommerfelder group in Canada is at least 25,000, with possibly less than one half baptized members. Since no church records are maintained, reliable statistics are difficult to secure. In 1950 the Manitoba Sommerfelders had 4,120 baptized members (with children 7,944) in 14 congregations, and the Chortitz group had 1,684 baptized (with children 3,516) in 8 congregations, making a total population for Manitoba of 11,460, of whom 5,804 were baptized. In Saskatchewan there may be 5,000 baptized members in two northern colonies, 3,000 in Swift Current and 2,000 in Rosthern. The four frontier settlements may have another 1,000. With children there would be probably 10,000 population in Saskatchewan and 2,000 on the frontier. Scattered members with families could total another 2,000. In Mexico the Sommerfelders constitute about 6 per cent of the main Mennonite colony in Chihuahua and might therefore have a population of 1,000 today. The Sommerfeld and Bergthal colonies in Paraguay might today have a population of 2,000 (892 baptized). Menno Colony in the Chaco now has over 4,000 population with 1,359 baptized members; but this group, because of its progressive development in Paraguay, can scarcely be considered Sommerfelder in character today. A small conservative group of possibly 100 souls left the Menno Colony in 1955 to settle in Bolivia. Thus the total population of all Sommerfelder settlements, not counting the scattered families, can be held to be 30,000, of whom probably 12,000 are baptized members.

The Sommerfeld group in Manitoba has suffered two serious schisms. In 1937 the group known as the Rudnerweide Church broke off in the Western Reserve, which in 1957 had a total of 1,700 baptized members, of whom 1,200 (pop. 3,200) were in the original settlement in Southern Manitoba (with 500 scattered unorganized individuals in other places in West Canada). In 1940 a Rudnerweide congregation was organized in Saskatchewan near Hague, which now has 300 baptized members, mostly from the Sommerfeld Mennonites there. The second schism occurred in April 1958, when a conservative faction, numbering about 100 families of the 3,500 existing membership, led however by 12 of the 16 ministers, withdrew ostensibly because of opposition to introducing electric lights into the meetinghouses. The majority group, which calls itself the Reinländer Mennonite Church, elected its own bishop (Cornelius Nickel), since the regular Sommerfeld bishop Johann Friesen stayed with the main body.

Song Festivals. Singing has been a favorite tradition and recreation among the Mennonites of Prussia and Russia, which can be traced back to the days when Mennonites lived in secluded and isolated communities where commercial entertainment was scarce and not promoted. The practice of spontaneous singing in the family, church, and community was transplanted to North and South America. The song festivals are a special form of expression of the love of music found among the Mennonites of Russia and now in Canada, the United States, and South America.

Mennonite song festivals became very popular in Russia before World War I. K. G. Neufeld published the magazine Aufwärts (q.v.), 1909 f., which was originally devoted primarily to music, singing, and song festivals. Unser Blatt (1925-28) reported regularly after World War I about the song festivals of the various Mennonite settlements in Russia. No other subject received as much attention and treatment in the paper as the song festivals and the training courses for song leaders. Choirs and song leaders of many villages met at song festivals and inspired each other for better achievements in the art of singing. Even under the Soviets this was one of the activities which was partially tolerated for a while. Small group and family singing continued even during the darkest hour when large meetings and worship services were forbidden.

Well known among the Mennonites (GCM) of Kansas is the Mennonite Song Festival Society which was organized in 1930 at the Alexanderwohl Mennonite Church at Goessel, Kan., during the spring of that year, for church choirs. Smaller song festivals had been held at various places prior to this organization. In 1931 the Eden Mennonite Church of Moundridge, Kan., was the host to the Mennonite Song Festival. Choirs from surrounding Mennonite churches joined in the all-day singing of hymns and choral numbers. The following year at Whitewater a mass women's choir also performed. In 1932 at the Song Festival in Newton it was agreed that the afternoon would be devoted to presentations of songs by various church choirs, while evening programs would be devoted to combined choral singing. After this, with the exception of the years 1935, 1937, 1941, when the Song Festival took place in Lindley Hall in Newton, the choirs performed in the Kidron Park on the Bethel College campus. The number of participating choirs in the early years was sometimes has high as 30, with a total of 500 to 1,000 singers. The choir groups consisted of 25 to 75 members. Reports indicate that there was a total attendance of 3-5,000. Among the officers of the Mennonite Song Festival Society were Paul Baumgartner, D. C. Wedel, Elizabeth Nickel, and Jacob Bartel. Some of the programs were broadcast. The combined singing was usually under the direction of W. H. Hohmann. As a rule the mass choir rehearsal took place prior to the song festival. The Mennonite Men's Chorus Festival gave its tenth annual presentation on March 23, 1958, at Memorial Hall of Bethel College.

The Mennonite Brethren have similar song festivals. Formerly they took place in various communities and churches. Recently the Mennonite Brethren Central Kansas Choir Festival, as well as the Mennonite Brethren Men's Chorus, are giving their programs in Memorial Hall at Bethel College. In the western part of Kansas there is also an annual song festival, as well as one in Oklahoma and one on the Pacific Coast. H. C. Richert and his Tabor College Choir have had a significant influence on the Mennonite Brethren Song Festival.

Song and music festivals and choir director schools are particularly popular among the Mennonites of Canada both in the General Conference and the Mennonite Brethren churches. The two Bible colleges in Winnipeg and the various schools from coast to coast are centers of these activities. Some of the outstanding leaders were K. H. Neufeld, John Konrad, and Ben Horsch. Similar song festivals are held in various places in the western provinces.

The April 1948 issue of Mennonite Life was devoted primarily to Mennonite music and singing. Unser Blatt, published in Russia 1925-28, reports on song festivals, Vol. I, 12, 30, 40, 132, 176, 219, 253, 277 ff., 317; Vol. II, 179, 219, 334, 343, 376; Vol. III, 146, 168, 171; Elizabeth Nickel, "Mennonite Song Festival Society," compiled the minutes 1928-49 (BeCL).

Sonnenberg Mennonite Church, located on a plateau in the Bernese Jura mountain district called Sonnenberg, about six miles from the town of Tramelan, next to Langnau (q.v.) the largest and oldest Mennonite congregation in Switzerland, whose members live in a radius of approximately 5 miles from the central meetinghouse which is known as Jeangisboden. The members of the congregation are almost exclusively of Bernese origin and are descendants of the Anabaptists who fled from their homes in the area of Langnau because of persecution.

The beginnings of the Sonnenberg congregation are no longer clear; probably a few families settled here in the 16th century. The scattered and rather isolated farms on the plateaus of the Jura Mountains were a secure place of refuge for persecuted Anabaptists as far back as the time of the Reformation, under the toleration and protection of the Catholic prince-bishop of Basel, who at that time was the ruler of the Jura. Here, however, they had to live in very meager conditions, cultivating stony land which had little water, and here they located their isolated barns as much as possible in secret places. Along with their agricultural work, which was mostly meadow farming, they practiced weaving as a side line. Their simple clothing was thus the product of their own hands.

There is evidence that the first migration on a larger scale from the Bernese area into the Jura, particularly to the Sonnenberg district, began with the severe persecutions of the 1670's and the 1690's; it increased at the beginning of the 18th century, particularly from the Emmental, when the Bernese authorities attempted to drive out all the Anabaptists from their territory. Official reports of 1716 and 1720 indicate that a number of Anabaptist families located in the Sonnenberg district and the region of Soncéboz, Corgémont, and Tramelan at that time. Ernst Müller names numerous Anabaptist families who came into this area at the beginning of the 18th century whose descendants constitute the membership of the Sonnenberg congregation today.

A document of May 24, 1779, and a letter of March 2, 1785, indicate that the elders and ministers of the Swiss congregations met regularly on March 25 for conference. Since these two documents were in the possession of a former deacon of the Sonnenberg congregation it is certain that Sonnenberg was the location of these early conferences. Through these conferences Sonnenberg became the center of the Jura congregations. The Sonnenberg congregation was in close contact with the congregations located at Biderich-Graben, Plagne, etc., in the mountains north of Biel. Niklaus Knörr, who died in Plagne in 1783, was arrested at one o'clock at night on April 18, 1757, in a secret Anabaptist meeting held at Gossliwil in Bucheggberg in the Solothurn district. He later had to flee to the Jura district in a destitute condition.

Among the known ministers and elders of the 18th century Hans Röthlisberger, chosen preacher in 1752 and elder in 1759; Johann Zingg of Corgémontberg and Peter Sommer of Vion near Tavannes were preachers in the Sonnenberg congregation according to a document of Sept. 1, 1850, written at Talvogne requesting military exemption.

At the beginning of the 19th century the congregation had some 200 baptized members. Its alms fund, which goes back at least to 1715, was managed by a deacon. Known deacons were David Tanner of Nidauberg near Soncéboz in 1827, Peter Lehman of Sombevalberg in 1850, and Johannes Zürcher of Talvogne, whose son Peter Zürcher was deacon until late in the 19th century.

In the first half of the 19th century large numbers of Sonnenberg members who found life on the Jura Mountains too difficult emigrated to America, where they settled largely in Ohio and Indiana. The heaviest emigration was in the 1830's, the 1850's, and the 1880's. The congregation founded near Dalton, Ohio, in 1817 took the name Sonnenberg. The large Swiss settlements near Bluffton, Ohio, and Berne, Ind., were also founded by emigrants from the same general area as the one in Sonnenberg, Ohio, although not all came from the same congregation.

Until the end of the 19th century the Sonnenberg congregation met every three weeks for worship in large second-floor rooms of various homes in the congregation, or in the summer in large barns. Those who came on foot from distant farms were given a meal of pea soup and "milk coffee." The meeting lasted several hours. The hymnal used was the Ausbund and the Lobwasser Psalmbook of the Reformed Church. For many years Peter Schnegg was the elder of the congregation; David Lerch also served, although he was in the neighboring congregation of Mont-Cortébert.

New life was brought into the congregation from 1876 on through the preaching missions of Jakob Hege (q.v.) of Reichen in Baden, the Reiseprediger (q.v.) of the South German Mennonites (Verband, q.v.), who held numerous Bible conferences. A very fruitful ministry was also rendered by J. A. Sprunger (q.v.) of Berne, Ind., who held a number of series of meetings in 1889. Sprunger introduced the songbook of the General Conference Mennonites, called Gesangbuch mit Noten.

At the end of the 1880's the congregation established a regular place of meeting, first in the large upper room of a house owned by Niklaus Gerber in Cernil near Tramelan. At the beginning of the 1890's a second location was established at the house of Ulrich Lehman at Brichon. A third meeting place was purchased in 1897 at Fürstenberg, Mont Tramelan. From this time on the meetings were held in rotation every Sunday at one of these places. Since the main meeting at Ulrich Lehman's on the Sonnenberg became too large for the place, the congregation built a meetinghouse on ground furnished by Christian Geiser in Jeangisboden next to his house. This substantial meetinghouse, built largely with volunteer labor from the congregation, was dedicated on Oct. 14, 1900. It has ever since been the meeting place for the conference of the Swiss Mennonite congregations, as well as the central meetinghouse of the Sonnenberg congregation. In 1928 the second story of a house purchased in Les Mottes was rebuilt into a good-sized meeting place to replace the rented room in Cernil.

In 1891, after the death of Elder Peter Schnegg, three ministers were ordained: Samuel Nussbaumer, Christian Habegger, and Jacob Amstutz. Several years later, when Amstutz took over the ministerial work in the Kleintal congregation, Samuel Gerber was ordained preacher. In 1901 Nussbaumer and Gerber were ordained elders. Among the evangelists who served the Sonnenberg congregation repeatedly in the early 19th century were Fritz Schüpbach (1903-8) and later Jacob Vetter.

The Sonnenberg congregation has continued to grow. In 1958 it had a membership of approximately 500 baptized persons, with three ministers, all of whom have been ordained as elders, namely, Samuel Geiser of Fontaines, Daniel Habegger of La Tanne, and Samuel Gerber of Les Reussilles. S.G.

Sonnenberg Mennonite Church (MC), located in Wayne County, Ohio, now a member of the Virginia Conference, was founded by Swiss immigrants from the canton of Bern in the early decades of the 19th century. The first settlers arrived in Wayne County in 1819 in what is now the Sonnenberg neighborhood north of the village of Kidron. The congregation made a steady growth but gradually withdrew, culturally, from its kindred Swiss Mennonite congregations in Allen and Putnam counties, Ohio, Adams County, Ind., and Moniteau County, Mo. After 1878, when the last conference of all the Swiss congregations was held at Sonnenberg, the congregation, under the wise and able leadership of its bishop (or elder) Christian Sommer (ordained preacher in 1844 and elder in 1862), remained independent, but gradually formed cultural and informal organizational ties with the Wayne County Amish Mennonite and Mennonite congregations. In 1886 a few members withdrew, partly under the influence of the "Oberholtzer" Mennonite school at Wadsworth (q.v.), Ohio, to found the Salem Mennonite (GCM) Church (q.v.). In spite of difficulties relating to the transition from German to English and similar matters, chiefly cultural, the congregation continued to grow until in 1935 there were over 500 members. Sonnenberg collaborated more and more with the Amish Mennonite and Mennonite congregations in Bible conferences, Sunday-school meetings, and similar religious activities. In 1935, 330 members withdrew and organized the Kidron Mennonite Church (q.v.) under the Ohio and Eastern Conference. The Sonnenberg congregation suffered a later division which resulted in the organization of the Bethel Mennonite Church (unaffiliated) near Apple Creek, Ohio, with 49 members. The Sonnenberg Church, now a member of the Virginia Conference (q.v.), had a membership of 168 in 1957, with Louis Amstutz as bishop and James Stauffer as minister. J.S.U.

Sonnus, Franciscus (Frans van der Velde, 1507-76, b. at Son), professor of theology at the University of Leuven, Belgium, thereupon (1560) Roman Catholic bishop, first of 's Hertogenbosch, then of Antwerp, is known in Mennonite history as an inquisitor. In 1545 he was appointed to oversee the extirpation of heresy in the Dutch provinces of Holland and Zeeland, and in 1553 also in Friesland. He also dealt with Anabaptists. The martyrs gave him a good testimony, saying that he was willing to hear them and that he was moderate. The insolence and brutality of many other inquisitors were foreign to Sonnius. He wrote to his instructor that he preferred a certain lenience toward the heretics, trying to save souls and rejecting all kinds of cruelty. vDZ.

Sonoy, Dierck (Dirk) (1529-97), a stadholder (governor) of North Holland in the name of William (q.v.) of Orange, protected the Dutch Mennonites against the intolerance of the Reformed, who had asked in 1576 that the Mennonite meetings be prohibited. Sonoy also respected the Mennonite principle of nonresistance, ruling that the Mennonites should make their contribution in the struggle against the Spaniards not by bearing arms, but by using spades and baskets to dig trenches for defense; he also ordered them to guard duty. (DB 1909, 40; 1910, 18.) vDZ.

Sorga, a village about three miles east of Hersfeld in Hesse (q.v.), Germany, which became the center of the Anabaptist movement in this entire region and where a strong Anabaptist congregation existed from about the middle of 1528 to 1533, which had strong connections with the Moravian Anabaptists. Hans Both (q.v.), and later a certain Ilgen, were the leaders or elders of the congregation. Ludwig Spon (q.v.) (or Hans Römer), an active Anabaptist leader in eastern Thuringia and eastern Hesse, testified in 1533 before the court that there were 40-50 persons in the congregation, taught by a minister (Lehrer); the Christian life was practiced, and no one suffered need, since there was mutual aid. The greeting of the Lord, "Peace be with you," was the distinguishing mark of the brethren, who celebrated the Lord's Supper according to the ordination of the Lord; for this consisted of nothing more than the partaking of the natural bread, taken with thanksgiving. "Whoever does the will of the Lord has received His body and drunk His blood." Wappler, in reporting the reasons for the strength of the Anabaptist propaganda which proceeded from Sorga into the neighboring Thuringian-Hessian territory, explains that "on the one hand the [tolerant] attitude of Prince Philip of Hesse was responsible, who, due to a certain sympathy for the Anabaptists because of the earnestness of their faith and the boldness of their confessing, always shrank back from severe measures; on the other hand the sermons of the Lutheran preachers all too often failed to produce the fruits of a new life, while their conduct gave much occasion for offense. How strikingly the Anabaptist preachers differed in this respect, who really lived what they preached, and often enough went to their death for the truth of their cause." The Lutheran pastor Raidt in neighboring Hersfeld also had understanding for them. A certain Anabaptist preacher called Alexander (q.v.) testified in July 1533, that he had often been at Sorga, where the brethren held public meetings and preaching ("öffentliche Gemeinde und Predigt").

But the pressure of neighboring Saxony, which demanded the death penalty and strict suppression because of the constant influence of the Sorga Anabaptists in Saxony, as well as the evident increasing strength of the movement, finally moved Philip to drastic action. In September 1533 the entire Sorga congregation was expelled. They, like many other persecuted Anabaptists in Central and Southern Germany, moved to the Hutterites in Moravia, with whom they had intimate connections. George Knobloch testified in September 1534, that "the whole village of Sorga had moved to Moravia, expelled by the Prince." Hans Both went with them. The further history of the Sorga group's failure to find a satisfactory spiritual home with the communal Hutterites, and then partial returns to Hesse is detailed by Wappler partly on the basis of the account in the Hutterite Chronicle (under the year 1533). Sorg(h)drager (Zorgdrager), Kornelis Pietersz (d. Aug. 9, 1826), was chosen as preacher in 1782 and as elder in 1795 to serve the Janjacobgezinde (q.v.) Mennonite church on the Dutch island of Ameland (q.v.). He was untrained, yet very capable and much less conservative than Jacob Jobs (q.v.), his coelder until 1804, with whom Sorgdrager could not get along, because Jobs disapproved all innovations and obstructed all proposals and measures which Sorgdrager considered necessary for the sound development of the congregation, such as audible prayer instead of silent prayer, an offering to be held at the end of the services, and the introduction of catechetical instruction for the children. Sorgdrager, who was a man of strong faith and devotion, was a great blessing for the church of Ameland. For his catechetical instruction he published Vragen aan de Dopelingen met derselver antwoorden (n.p., n.d.), and during his eldership the Foppe (q.v.) Ones congregation merged (1804) with the Janjacobgezinden. He kept a diary, which contains a large number of interesting particulars concerning the congregation. Some of his descendants served the church as deacons, one of whom was Cornelis Pietersz Sorgdrager, treasurer of the Holum (q.v.) congregation at the close of the 19th century.

Whether the Mennonite Sorgdrager (Zorgdrager) family found at Westzaan, province of North Holland, usually whaling captains, belonged to the same family, could not be ascertained, but they probably did, because most members of the Sorgdrager family of Ameland also were shipmasters. Of the North Holland Sorgdragers, Cornelis Gysbertsz Zorgdrager, commander of a whaling expedition, wrote the book Bloeyende Opkomst der Aloude en Hedendaagsche Groenlandsche Visscherij (Amsterdam 1720, repr. The Hague 1727-28), and Dirk Kornelis Sorgdrager, possibly a son of the former, was a preacher of the Westzaan Frisian congregation in 1746-66.

Souderton, a town (pop. 4,623) in Montgomery County, Pa., midway between Philadelphia and Allentown, was incorporated as a borough in 1888. Mennonites from the surrounding area, mostly west of town, made up a goodly portion of the earlier inhabitants. There are over 1,400 baptized Mennonites of the M.C. and G.C.M. groups and an unaffiliated church, living in Souderton. Probably 40 per cent of Franconia Conference Mennonites (MC) use Souderton as a shopping center. At least five Mennonite congregations were established in the area in the first half of the 18th century, viz., Franconia, Rockhill, Salford, Line Lexington, and Plains, all 3-5 miles away. Agriculture, marketing, and industry are the principal means of livelihood. J.M.Mo.

Souderton Mennonite Church (MC), located in Montgomery County, Pa., a member of the Franconia Conference, began in 1879 when families of the Franconia and the Rockhill Mennonite congregations living in Souderton built the first house of worship in Souderton. The congregation was organized in 1891. The first communion was held on April 19, 1891, when 68 members partook. Ministers from established Mennonite congregations accepted appointments to preach at Souderton until 1914, when the first minister there was ordained. Ministers who have served the congregation with the date of ordination were Jacob M. Moyer, minister 1914; bishop 1947; Elmer B. Moyer (d. 1957) minister 1919; Russell B. Musselman, minister 1948. The membership in 1958 was 470; Stanley Shenk was assisting in the ministry. A considerable number have left from here to build mission stations into congregations in the outlying areas. J.M.Mo.

Souterliedekens, a Dutch medieval term for Psalms, were much used in the 16th-century Reformation period. "The Souterliedekens, though intended for the use of the Catholics, form the transition to the congregational singing of the Reformed" (Wolkan). A well-known edition was the one published at Antwerp, Belgium, in 1540 under the title Souterliedekens, Ghemaect ter eeren Gods op alle die Psalmen van David: tot stichtinghe ende een gheestelijcke vermakinghe van allen Christen menschen. This edition was reprinted more than 30 times under a variety of titles, the last reprint having been published in 1652 by Karel de Flegler (Vlieger), a Mennonite printer at Hamburg, Germany.

Though the early Dutch Anabaptists knew the "souterliedekens" and some martyrs are said to have sung a "souterlieden," these Psalms were apparently not popular among the Anabaptists: the reason may have been that the "souterliedekens" had come from Catholicism, with which they wished to make a complete break. They preferred to sing the "liedekens" (songs) written by or in honor of the martyrs, and it was not before the publication of the Lietboek (q.v.) of Hans de Ries (q.v.) in 1582, which contained some Psalms, that singing of Psalms was introduced in at least a number of Mennonite congregations. South Abbotsford Mennonite Brethren Church, located at Abbotsford, B.C., was organized on May 1, 1932, with 31 members. A. D. Rempel was elected leader of the group, continuing in office until 1945 with the exception of one year. In 1945 Henry H. Nikkel began to serve as leader. The following have been ministers in the congregation: Frank Janzen, Franz C. Thiessen, Jacob F. Redekop, Jacob Wedel, Jacob Bargen, Isaak Janzen, Herman Voth, and John J. Stobbe. In the neighboring districts a number of mission Sunday schools are held among the unchurched. The membership in 1957 was 385, with J. J. Stobbe serving as pastor. In 1950 a section of the congregation was organized separately as the Abbotsford M.B. (q.v.) church. H.H.N.

The Mennonite colonization in South America has been by three groups: (1) Russian Mennonites to the Paraguayan Chaco from Manitoba and Sas-

In 1957 the total population of the Mennonite colonies in South America was about 16,500, distributed as follows: Paraguay 11,500, Brazil 3,000, Uruguay 1,500, Argentina 500. The number of baptized members was 7,150, distributed as follows: Paraguay 5,000 (GCM 1,560, MB 1,000, EMB 180, Menno 1,360, Sommerfeld 890), Brazil 1,100 (MB 650, GCM 450), Uruguay 900 (GCM 809, MB 91), Argentina 150 (EMB). By Mennonite bodies this gives: GCM—2,900, MB—1,730, EMB—330.

The total Mennonite immigration to South America according to Fretz has been 411,000:

The Mennonite Central Committee sponsored the refugee colonies in Paraguay and has continued to aid them in various ways to date. It also sponsored the colonies in Uruguay and has been the channel of some aid there. It did not sponsor the colonies in Brazil, which were originally sponsored by the German government.

The Mennonite Biblical Seminary was established in Montevideo in 1956 under an inter-Mennonite international board, supported by the mission boards of the G.C.M. and M.C. North American conferences. There is also an M.B. Bible School in Montevideo, an inter-Mennonite Bible School in Filadelfia, Fernheim Colony, and a Spanish Bible School at Bragado, Argentina.

Two German language Mennonite church papers are published in South America, the Menno-Blatt (founded 1930) by the Fernheim Colony administration at Filadelfia, Paraguay, and Bibel und Pflug (founded 1954) published privately at Witmarsum, Brazil. The first Brazil Mennonite paper, Die Brücke, was published privately at Witmarsum 1932-37, then for a short time by the Krauel Colony in 1938. The only Spanish language Mennonite periodical has been La Voz Menonita, published since 1932 by the Argentine Mennonites (MC). In 1955-58 a settlement of some 260 souls from Menno and Fernheim, Paraguay, was established near Santa Cruz, Bolivia. H.S.B.

South Bruderthal Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church, now in the town of Langham, Sask., was organized in May 1925. The first minister was Jacob R. Doerksen (d. 1940). On Aug. 3, 1929, the original building was destroyed by fire. The basement of a new church was completed, but because of the depression the superstructure could not be finished at that time. Until 1941 this basement served as the place of worship. In 1956 the church was moved to Langham. The membership in 1958 was 85, J. N. Hiebert pastor. J.N.H.

South Cayuga (Ont.) Mennonite Church (MC), first known as Fry's Corners, is located on the Rainham Road, a mile north of Lake Erie and 8 miles west of the Rainham Mennonite neighborhood. Land was conveyed for worship and school purposes in 1839 and 1843. The present frame meetinghouse was built in 1850. This was a fairly strong fellowship by 1870. The Old Order Mennonite group was the stronger group after the division of 1889. Christian Gayman was an influential bishop here before the division. When John Shirk, the last Old Order minister, moved to Waterloo County, this faction ceased to function. Mennonite ministers in charge have been Moses Hoover of Rainham (q.v.) after 1893 and A. Lewis Fretz, also at Rainham since 1931. For several years after 1917 this congregation with under 20 members became the charge of the Rural Mission Board of Ontario. By 1957 the membership had risen to 32. J.C.F.

South Central Mennonite (MC) Conference, successor to the Kansas-Nebraska Mennonite Conference (q.v.), organized in 1921 under the name Missouri-Kansas Conference; it was renamed South Central Conference in 1946 to give more adequate recognition to its congregations in Colorado, Texas, Louisiana, and Mississippi. Beginning in 1921 with 35 reporting congregations with 1,907 baptized members, in 1957 it reported 58 congregations (14 unorganized), with 3,413 members.

The South Central Conference took the lead in the Mennonite Church (MC) in a revision of church polity in 1954-55 by (1) the introduction of the office of regional overseer appointed by the executive committee of conference in conjunction with the ministry of the region, (2) the introduction of a three-year term not only for the overseer but also for the local pastor, and (3) the suspension of further ordination of bishops. The conference has been divided into regions (each with an overseer) as follows: Colorado, Kansas, Missouri, Gulf Coast. (For further statistics, see Kansas-Nebraska.) H.S.B.

South China Mennonite Brethren Mission. The General Conference of the Mennonite Brethren Church in 1909 discussed the matter of opening a mission in China, but the Board of Foreign Missions did not see its way clear to do so at the time. Mr. and Mrs. F. J. Wiens then set out in 1910 to begin an independent M.B. mission in China, receiving their support from friends. On their way they stopped nearly a year in Russia, holding evangelistic meetings in M.B. churches and winning supporters for the intended mission. They arrived at the Baptist Mission, Swatow, South China, in the fall of 1911. In May 1912 they proceeded into the Hakka area 200 miles inland, and opened a mission among the Hakkas at Shanghang (Shonghong), on the Han River, Fukien Province. While procuring or erecting the required buildings, Wiens preached in the city and surrounding villages and opened chapels in strategic centers. Soon a number of Chinese converts were won and baptized and an indigenous church was organized. To supply a pressing need for native evangelists, ministers, and teachers, Wiens opened a Bible institute for training such workers. He also began a school for boys and another for girls, and began medical work. In 1915 the M.B. Conference agreed to give partial support to the mission, and in 1919 it took over the mission and accepted new missionaries for this field.

Mr. and Mrs. J. S. Dick, Helena Heppner, and Tina Kornelsen left for this field in the spring of 1920. Mr. and Mrs. B. F. Wiens followed early in 1921. Their stay and service was short, as less than two years later Mr. Wiens died and Mrs. Wiens returned to the homeland a year later. Maria Richert, Sophia Richert, Paulina Foote, and Adelgunda Pribe entered the work a little later.

The mission prospered for some time, and Mr. and Mrs. Dick began a second station at EngTeng, 40 miles from Shanghang. Schools increased and hospital work expanded. At the 1921 conference F. J. Wiens, who had then returned for his first furlough, reported an indigenous church of 450 members, 11 outstations with ministers, and 17 schools with 30 teachers.

The most serious hindrance for the mission was the continuous political unrest with repeated revolutions and civil wars, which not only interrupted the work, but also endangered the missionaries' lives. In 1927 all the missionaries were obliged to leave the field and were plundered by pirates while proceeding to the coast in river boats.

Several later efforts were made to renew the work of the mission. Mr. and Mrs. Dick returned to China, but were compelled to remain at the coast much of the time. F. J. Wiens returned about 1935 and found the buildings of the mission stations demolished and the native church scattered, but many believers still firm and true in their faith. He did not rebuild the stations but devoted himself to traveling and preaching in the Hakka area. The Conference meanwhile maintained a policy of waiting.

In 1947 the M.B. Conference made another attempt to resume the work of the mission and sent Mr. and Mrs. Roland Wiens there. They still found some believers and an indigenous church again began to rise out of chaos. Some new converts were won and baptized and work in school and hospital was begun. The communistic revolution in China thwarted all further efforts, and all the missionaries were evacuated in 1951. J.H.L.

South Colon Mennonite Church (MC), Colon, Mich., was established in 1954 by members from Locust Grove (q.v.). It had 41 members in 1957, William Wickey serving as minister. M.G.

South Dakota. Mennonites began to arrive in southern Dakota 16 years before the territory was admitted into the Union. The first group, under the leadership of Daniel Unruh, reached Yankton in October 1873, coming directly from the Crimea in Russia. It was the forerunner of many groups to follow during the 1870's and early 1880's—all from Russia. The great bulk of the immigrants arriving in those years settled in Turner and Hutchinson counties in the southeastern part of the territory. From the very first there were four rather distinct groups even though all came from Russia.

The northern part of the settlement was predominantly Low German with the following family names rather common: Tieszen, Regier, Schmidt, Berg, Goosen, Koehn, Buller, Vogt, Peters, Ratzlaff, Dalke, Becker, Unruh, Ewert, Tiahr, and Scharner. South of this group were the Swiss settlers who had immigrated from the Province of Volhynia in Russian Poland. Common family names in this group were Albrecht, Fliginger, Gering, Graber, Kaufman, Müller, Preheim, Ries, Schrag, Senner, Stucky, and Schwartz. To the west of these two settlements were the Hutterite Mennonites, whose ethnic background was the same as that of the Hutterian Brethren but who had left communal life long before the movement out of Russia. The more common family names in this group were Hofer, Tschetter, Wipf, Stahl, Gross, Kleinsasser, Mendel, Wollman, Waldner, and Walter. The fourth group represented the Hutterian Brethren. All of the 110 Hutterite colonies now established in the United States and Canada stem from the three original brotherhoods planted in Dakota in the 1870's. The original three were Bon Homme, on the Missouri River, near Tabor; Wolf Creek, on the James River, west of Freeman; and Old Elm Spring, near Milltown. An estimated 1,200-1,500 Mennonites came to Dakota in this early period, not including the approximately 300 Hutterian Brethren who established the original three colonies.

The difficulties pertinent to the establishment of pioneer homes on the western prairies have been repeatedly rehearsed by writers. Suffice it to say that the Mennonite tillers of the soil experienced the whole gamut of pioneering problems. Prairie fires, grasshoppers, Dakota blizzards, spring floods, crop failures, and countless other barriers impeded progress again and again.

That the western states were anxious to get Mennonite settlers is clearly revealed in the editorial policies of the newspapers. The Yankton Press and Dakotan was especially anxious to give "this class of immigrants the best chance possible, for we have already seen enough of their thrift and enterprise to convince us that they will make most desirable citizens" (Dec. 4, 1873). The paper pleaded for more united action to secure as much as possible of this "most valuable tide of humanity" (May 28, 1874).

In most instances early church services were held in the homes, and when schools were built these were utilized for worship services. The first meetinghouse was constructed in 1877 in the western part of the settlement by the Hutterthal congregation. The Bethesda congregation in the northern part of the territory erected its first building in 1879. Others followed until by 1900 there were at least a half dozen or more.

At least 80 per cent of the Mennonites in South Dakota are farmers. This dependence on the soil was a contributing factor to the movement of large numbers of Hutterian Mennonites from Hutchinson County to counties in the state farther north and west, notably Beadle, Spink, and Sully. Here cheap marginal land was available which under the stimulus of high prices for farm products brought on by World War I proved tempting for many hundreds of Mennonites. Spurred on by the real-estate men these people became alarmed lest opportunities for buying land would be curtailed. The dry years in the 1930's brought real hardship to many of these people, since rainfall was considerably less in these counties than in Turner and Hutchinson counties. An increasing number of Mennonite farmers have received recognition at county and state fairs through the exhibition of grain products and purebred livestock and poultry.

Except for the Hutterian Brethren the Mennonites of South Dakota have generally participated in local politics and have quite universally exercised the right of franchise. The only Mennonite ever to hold a major state elective office was David D. Wipf of Freeman, who served two terms as Secretary of State (1905-9). The following Mennonites have represented Hutchinson and Turner counties in the lower house of the state legislature: John J. Wipf, six terms; P. P. Kleinsasser, two terms; Emil J. Waltner, three terms; David J. Mendel, Andrew J. Waltner, J. J. Kleinsasser, J. P. Kleinsasser, John J. Gering, and Joseph K. Schrag, each one term. P. P. Kleinsasser also served two terms in the Senate, and the following have each served one term in the upper house: John J. Wipf, A. A. Wipf, J. C. Graber, and John J. Gering. All of these legislators were affiliated with the Republican Party. On the local level there have been county commissioners, county judges, state's attorneys, township supervisors, mayors, and city councilmen.

The most important institution established by the Mennonites in the state is Freeman Junior College at Freeman, which was incorporated on Dec. 14, 1900, under the name of "South Dakota Mennonite College." The name was changed to Freeman College in 1921, and in 1939 to Freeman Junior College. From the first this institution has been a co-operative endeavor supported by virtually all the Mennonite groups in the state. It has done much to make Freeman the Mennonite center of the state. A more recent institution located at Freeman is the Salem Mennonite Home for the Aged, which first began to operate in 1949. It, too, is co-operatively supported by the Mennonite church groups in the Freeman and Marion communities. J.D.U.

South End Mennonite Brethren Church, located at Juno and William streets, Winnipeg, Man., was organized on Oct. 4, 1936, under P. J. Kornelsen, who led the church until 1947. At first the meetings were held at the rented Maple Street Mission Church. A year later an old church building on 344 Ross Avenue was bought. In 1940 this church was sold and the present church building, fully equipped, with a seating capacity of 1,200 was bought. The membership in 1957 was 527. J. P. Neufeld was the leading minister. The congregation is a member of the Manitoba Provincial and the Canadian District M.B. conferences. H.NE.

South Hoffnungsfeld (or South Fairview) Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct. When the Cherokee strip in Oklahoma was opened for homesteading on Sept. 16, 1893, many members of M.B. church congregations in Kansas and in other states took up homesteads in the vicinity of what is now Fairview, Major Co., Okla. These settlers at first worshiped in houses and sometimes under trees. In the fall of 1895 a church was organized with William Hergert as leader, with a membership of 69. He served in this capacity until November 1900. In 1949 over 100 members of this congregation joined the Fairview City M.B. Church, followed in 1951 by the remaining members. J.C.GR.

South Holland (Dutch, Zuid-Holland), a province of the Netherlands (1,085 sq. miles, pop. 2,400,000 in 1954) in which are found the large cities of The Hague and Rotterdam, has six Mennonite congregations, viz., Leiden, The Hague, Delft, Rotterdam, Dordrecht, and Ouddorp, and "kringen" (circles) at Gouda, Voorburg-Rijswijk, and Gorinchem.

In the 1530's Anabaptism did not spread as much in South Holland as it did in other Dutch provinces like North Holland and Friesland, though there were a number of important Anabaptist centers like Leiden, Brielle, and Schiedam. About 1600 there were probably many Mennonite congregations in this province, most of them small, and usually founded or increased in membership by Mennonite immigrants from Flanders, Belgium. Most of these Flemish immigrants later moved on to Rotterdam and Haarlem, and thus between 1600 and 1700 more than 20 Mennonite congregations in South Holland died out. Other reasons for the decay were the small membership, the pressure of the Reformed Church, and mixed marriages. By 1700 only Leiden, Gouda, The Hague, Schiedam, Hazerswoude, Rotterdam, Dordrecht, Spijkenisse, and Ouddorp were left, and during the 18th century Gouda, The Hague, Schiedam, Hazerswoude, Dordrecht, and Spijkenisse also dissolved. In 1810 there were only three left—Leiden, Rotterdam, and Ouddorp, with a total of 180 baptized members. Since 1880 there has been considerable growth and new congregations have arisen at The Hague (1881), Dordrecht (1895/6), and Delft (1925), besides the circles mentioned above.

The total number of baptized members in South Holland was 3,307 in 1771; it is now (1958) 4,195, whereas the last census (1947) listed 8,237 persons as Mennonites. vdZ.

South Lawrence Mennonite Church (MC), located 10 miles southeast of Glen Flora, Wis., on state highway 73, and 12 miles east of the Sheldon Mennonite community. In May 1942 J. W. Martin and Sam Helmuth organized a Sunday school in the area and 4 years later Leroy Schrock was called in as pastor. On Dec. 9, 1946, the group of 20 members, of whom 8 were of non-Mennonite background, was organized as a congregation in the North Central Conference. The membership in 1957 was 26, with Leroy Schrock as pastor. L.S.

South Pacific Mission Board, an organization of the South Pacific Mennonite Conference (MC), issues the bimonthly Southwest Messenger, first issue January 1956. The board supports the Mennonite Hour, a Spanish Gospel broadcast from Pasadena, sponsors summer camps and Bible schools, as well as mission stations. In 1957 the president of the board was Jacob Shetler and the treasurer Daniel Horst. M.G.

South Peel Old Order Mennonite Church is the strongest of the five O.O.M. churches of Ontario. The frame meetinghouse west of the Conestoga River, west of Wallenstein on the Waterloo-Wellington County line in Peel Township, was erected in 1901, enlarged in 1928, 1932, and again before the middle of the century. Its membership in 1955 was some 400. Those who have ministered at this place are David B. Martin and Henry S. Bauman. Bishop Addison Gingerich (ordained 1942) has present oversight of all five O.O.M. appointments, and the minister at Peel is Abraham Bearinger (1890-), ordained 1935. J.C.F.

South Perkasio, a village adjoining Perkasio, Bucks Co., Pa., formerly also known as Bridgetown (for its covered bridge which was still in use in 1958) and Benjamin. In 1866 a Lutheran, Stephen Young, called a meeting in his home of persons interested in building a church. Mennonites, Lutherans, and Reformed worked together in the efforts to provide a church building for the area. The Mennonites purchased the lot on which the building was to be erected. In the final analysis, however, it was the Lutherans and Reformed who used the building. The Mennonites are not known to have ever held regular services there. The site was about midway between the Rockhill and Blooming Glen Mennonite meetinghouses, and only a few miles from each; so there was no particular need for the Mennonites to use the new house of worship. J.C.W.

South Shafter (Cal.) Mennonite Brethren Church was started in 1957. In 1958 it had a membership of 43, with Jack Williams as temporary pastor.

South Side Mennonite Brethren Mission Church, in Minneapolis, Minn., began as a mission on Franklin Avenue in 1907 with Mr. and Mrs. B. F. Wiens as missionaries and Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Schmidt as assistants. Soon the M.B. Conference built a two-story mission building near the Milwaukee Railroad Yards, at 2120 Minnehaha Avenue, in an area where there were many neglected homes with many children. This building provided a chapel seating about 200, and other facilities. When the Wienses left in 1911 the Schmidts took charge of the mission, serving more than 30 years, with a number of assistants. In 1943 Mr. and Mrs. O. W. Dirks were called to the mission. After a year of service, they were replaced by Mr. and Mrs. Melvin Schimnowski. In 1946 Mr. and Mrs. Chester Fast had charge of the mission, with the help of students attending Bible school in the city. This mission has been supported by the M.B. General Conference under the supervision of the Conference City Mission Board. In 1955 it became a congregation with 31 members and Paul G. Hiebert as pastor. H.E.W.

South Union Mennonite Church (MC), formerly known as the North (Amish) District or the King's Church, located one mile north of West Liberty, Logan Co., Ohio, a member of the Ohio and Eastern Conference, was founded by Amish families from Wayne and Holmes counties, Ohio, and Mifflin County, Pa. In 1840 the Peter Yoder family moved from Wayne County to Union Township, Logan County, and by 1845 enough settlers had arrived to be organized into a congregation by two Holmes County bishops. After a second Amish group had settled in the Kennard-Kingscreek area in Champaign County (now the Oak Grove congregation, q.v.), Ohio, the two groups were considered the north and south districts of the same congregation. In 1855 the North District built the first Amish meetinghouse in Ohio one mile west and a half mile north of the present South Union church. Here, also, the first Amish Sunday school was organized in 1863 by the young minister, David Plank (q.v.). But for many years the North District held more strictly to some of the old Amish practices than the South and frequent disagreements arose. These differences led to a complete rupture between the two districts during the late 1860's, Bishop-Deacon John P. King, quite conservative, serving the North (Logan County) District and Bishop John Warye the South. David Plank with his father, Samuel Plank, who was a deacon, and a considerable body of the members of King's congregation sided with Warye and in 1875 built the Walnut Grove church (q.v.) several miles west of King's church. In 1876 King's congregation built the South Union meetinghouse at its present location. In 1886 King moved to Coffee County, Kan., leaving the congregation in charge of Christian K. Yoder, brother of John K. Yoder, of Wayne County, Ohio. In 1890 a group of South Union young people refused to unite with the congregation because they were denied an English class in Sunday school. This group was baptized into a Mennonite church at Elida, Ohio, and became the nucleus of the Bethel Mennonite congregation (q.v.) at West Liberty, Ohio. In 1895 the South Union and Walnut Grove congregations decided to unite under one bishop. David Plank was chosen by lot and served both congregations until his death in 1912. Then A. I. Yoder (q.v.), son of C. K. Yoder, was ordained bishop and served until his death in 1934. S. E. Allgyer (q.v.), bishop of the Oak Grove church in Champaign County, then served as bishop of both congregations until his retirement in 1950. In 1953 the congregation completed a large brick church building, and in 1955 a commodious Sunday-school unit. In 1957 the pastor was Bishop Roy S. Koch, and membership 309. J.S.U.

Southern District of the Virginia Mennonite (MC) Conference. The Shenandoah Valley churches were divided into districts in 1837: the Northern (or Lower) District with Broadway as a center, the Central (or Middle) District with Harrisonburg as a center, and the Southern (or Upper) District with Waynesboro in Augusta County as a center. In 1942 the terms "Lower" and "Upper" were discontinued. The Mennonite churches of Augusta County have been known as the Southern District ever since. The Southern District includes six congregations with a total of 522 members as follows: Springdale with 217, Hildebrand with 49 at Waynesboro, Mt. View with 61 at Lyndhurst, Ebenezer with 38 at South Boston, Stuarts Draft with 109, and Greenmonte Rural Mission Church at Greenville with 48 members. The district has traditionally had one bishop, who in 1958 was Franklin Weaver. H.A.B.

Southern District Conference of the Mennonite Brethren Church of North America was organized in 1909, comprising the churches of Kansas, Oklahoma, and California. The California churches, however, withdrew the following year and organized their own conference. The first convention of the Southern District was held in 1910 in the Ebenezer Church near Buhler, Kan., with Johann Foth chairman, M. M. Just vice-chairman, and A. L. Schellenberg secretary.

The purpose for the organization of the district conferences was to stress chiefly the home mission work and evangelism in the churches. At its organization this Conference had a membership of 2,100 with a total of 21 churches. The Colorado and Texas churches soon were added to the Southern District.

A number of leaders made valuable contributions in the early days of the Conference. Among these were Johann Foth, M. M. Just, Heinrich Adrian, and Abr. Schellenberg. Later leaders include H. W. Lohrenz, H. H. Flaming, P. E. Nickel, J. K. Hiebert, P. P. Rempel, J. S. Regier, and P. C. Hiebert. Soon the sphere of labor of this Conference expanded. Home mission work occupied the chief attention and called for the greatest efforts on the part of the Home Missions Committee. A Committee of Reference and Counsel was created and charged with looking after the spiritual welfare of the Conference and assisted the individual churches in the event of difficult problems. The evangelism project for the churches was another important factor to which much emphasis was given. The Home Missions Committee secured qualified evangelists and presented them to the churches for engagement.

A third project of the Conference is extension work. At first this work was confined to the fringe areas of the churches. In 1936 the Conference opened a field of mission work in Texas along the Mexican border with Mr. and Mrs. Harry Neufeld as missionaries. Other stations have been created there since, and also in Arkansas and Wichita missionary projects are carried on with good success.

Although a General Conference project, Tabor College is located in the Southern District, and the Oklahoma churches support a full four-year academy at Corn with a strong Bible department. A church school committee promotes the Sunday-school work as well as the religious education work of this district, and a youth committee has charge of the Christian fellowship work and the youth retreat.

In 1947 a constitution was adopted and in 1948 the Conference was incorporated in Kansas. Thirty-five churches belong to the Conference (1956) with a total membership of 4,763. P.H.B.

Southern Manitoba Broadcasting Company, operating radio station CFAM at Altona, Man., was organized in 1956 to provide good music, agricultural information, religious services for shut-ins, and an opportunity for ethnic groups to have services in their own languages. First licensed in November 1956 for 1,000 watts, in 1958 the power was increased to 10,000 watts and CFAM could be heard by 95 per cent of all Manitobans, the second most powerful station in Manitoba. Southwest Messenger, the organ of the South Pacific Mennonite (MC) District Mission Board, an 8-page 6 x 9 inch bimonthly, first issue January 1956, editor Samuel Spicher, place of publication Phoenix, Ariz. H.S.B.

Southwestern Pennsylvania Conference News. This publication was begun as "Southwestern Pennsylvania Mission News," a bimonthly, on Nov. 23, 1936. The first editors were Sanford G. Shetler and John L. Horst. It began as a mimeographed sheet. With the issue of Jan. 25, 1938, it was changed to a four-page, printed sheet, 6 x 8 in., enlarged in January 1939 to 9 x 12 in. In May 1942, by conference action, the name of the paper was changed to "Southwestern Pennsylvania Conference News," and its contents were adapted to represent the four conference-wide organizations—Church Conference, Mission Board, Sunday School Conference (now known as the Christian Education Conference), and Associated Sewing Circles. In April 1954 the paper was changed to a monthly and in September 1954 the title was changed to "Allegheny Conference News" after the conference adopted a new constitution which changed its name from Southwestern Pennsylvania to Allegheny. It continues as the official organ of the four conference-wide organizations of Allegheny Conference (MC). J.L.H.

Southwestern Pennsylvania Mennonite Conference (MC), in 1954 renamed Allegheny Conference with reference to the Allegheny Mountains which run through the district from north to south, was organized in 1876. While Mennonites had settled in the area of the conference much earlier—Somerset County in two areas of Amish (Johnstown in the north and Meyersdale-Springs in the south) 1780-1800, Masontown, Martinsburg, and Scottdale Mennonites all about 1790, Rockton 1839, these being all the settlements at the time of organization, no conference had been formed.

When the Masontown congregation in 1873 called in Bishop Jacob N. Brubacher, of the Lancaster Conference, to conduct the ordination of a bishop—J. N. Durr was ordained—he gave them a cordial invitation to join the Lancaster Conference, having learned in response to his inquiry as to what conference the ministers attended that they sometimes attended the Lancaster Conference and sometimes the Ohio Conference. Bishop Durr did not follow Bishop Brubaker's invitation but took the lead in organizing a conference locally. In April 1876 the Lancaster Conference responded to an appropriate request carried by Bishop Durr and Henry Blauch, a minister, from a meeting of ministers of the area by authorizing the formation of a conference which was to be subject to the Lancaster Conference. The organization meeting was held Sept. 22, 1876, at the Blough meetinghouse near Davidsville, Pa., with the Lancaster moderator, Bishop Benjamin Herr, in charge, but it was not subject to the Lancaster Conference. The first moderator chosen was Bishop Durr, who was for many years the dominant personality in the conference.

In a few years all the Mennonite congregations of the southwestern area of the state were members of the conference. No major new additions occurred until the former Amish Mennonite congregations of Mifflin County, Pa., members of the Eastern A.M. (later Ohio and Eastern A.M.) Conference, joined—Maple Grove at Belleville (1944), and Allensville and Mattawana with mission outposts (1957). In 1957 the Allegheny Conference had 3,177 members in 27 organized and 22 mission congregations. Because of the location of the Mennonite Publishing House in the conference district at Scottdale since 1908, the ordained men on the staff there have been among the outstanding leaders of the conference. These included such men as bishops Aaron Loucks (a native of Scottdale), Daniel Kauffman, J. A. Ressler, John L. Horst, A. J. Metzler (a native of Martinsburg), Paul M. Lederach, and others such as C. F. Yake, Paul Erb, and Ellrose Zook.

A conference mission board, organized in 1913, and a Sunday-school conference, organized in 1895, now called a Christian Education Conference, have had a strong and wholesome influence. The first permanent Mennonite camp was in this district, located at Laurelville (q.v.) in 1944, though not a conference organization; it was preceded by a Young People's Institute organization which held an annual institute at Arbutus Park at Johnstown a number of years earlier. The Arbutus-Laurelville Institute, under a conference organization, has had a wide and wholesome influence. The Johnstown Bible School (q.v.), started in 1922, which later became a conference institution, also rendered good service. The Johnstown Mennonite School is not a conference institution. H.S.B.

History of the Southwestern Pennsylvania Conference (n.p., 1923, not a history but a collection of conference minutes and statistics); Southwestern Pennsylvania Mission News (first number Nov. 23, 1936, renamed Southwestern Pennsylvania Conference News in May 1942, and Allegheny Conference News in November 1954) contains a series of historical sketches of congregations by Ammon Kaufman beginning March 1947, which were largely reprinted in J. L. Horst and Ammon Kaufman, Seventy-Fifth Anniversary Observance of the Southwestern Pennsylvania Mennonite Conference (n.p., 1951), and from which came the article "Beginning of the Southwestern Pennsylvania Conference" in MHB XII (October 1951).

Soviet Central Asia, region of West Asia bordering in the west on the Caspian Sea, in the north on Siberia, in the south on Persia, Afghanistan, and India, and in the east on China, consists of an area of 1,508,445 sq. mi., with an approximate population of twenty million. At present Soviet Central Asia is composed of the Kazakh SSR, including the former Syr Darya and Dzhetysay regions (1956 pop. 8½ million; capital Alma-Ata), the Uzbek SSR (pop. 7,300,000; capital Tashkent), including the former Bukhara (q.v.), southern Khorezm and parts of Samarkand, Amu Darya and Syr Darya, and Turkistan, the Turkmen SSR (1956 pop. 1,400,000; capital Ashkhabad), including the former Turkoman region of Turkistan and the western parts of Bukhara and Khorezm, the Tadzhik SSR (pop. 1956, 1,800,000; capital Stalinabad), including eastern Turkistan. The largest SSR of all is in the Kazakh SSR with Alma-Ata as its capital and other larger cities like Karaganda, Petropavlovsk, Akmolinsk, Semipalatinsk, Aktyubinsk, and Pavlodar. The Pavlodar Mennonite settlement (q.v.) is now a part of it. Other early Mennonite settlements were Auli-Ata (q.v.) and Ak-Mechet (q.v.). See also Khiva, Klaas, Epp, Asiatic Russia.

The Soviet government has used various methods and experiments since 1917 to transform this vast territory and its primitive population to its basic philosophy and plans. In 1917-24 some independent khanates such as Bukhara and Khiva struggled for their independence. Since 1924 the Soviets have attempted to stamp out the national feelings of the population of these countries and to transform the entire political, economical, and cultural life of the total area to integrate it into the Soviet empire. Stalin stated in 1919 that "owing to its geographical situation, Turkistan is a bridge linking Socialist Russia with the oppressed countries of the east. In view of this, the consolidation of Soviet power in Turkistan may have the greatest revolutionary significance for the entire east" (Stackelberg, p. 85). Particularly Khrushchev has pursued the policy of making the vast territory of the Kazakh and Uzbek SSR's an agricultural and industrial stronghold. In the latter, two thirds of the total Soviet cotton crop is raised. The native population is apparently decreasing while the European-Russian population has been moving in in large groups since World War II.

During World War II particularly the Ukrainian population, including many Mennonites and others of German background, were forcibly sent to Soviet Central Asia and other parts of north and east Russia. Later when those who had been taken along with the German army into Germany were repatriated in 1943 by the Soviet army, they were also sent here. Many were sent into the coal mines of the Karaganda region. Klaus Mehnert (189) estimates that one million persons of German background are living in Soviet Asia today.

In the spring of 1954 many hundreds of thousands of people were sent to the Kazakh SSR for agricultural work in the Khrushchev program; some 18,000,000 hectares of land were to be made arable.

The Canadian Mennonite papers contain significant information on the location, life, and activities of the Mennonites in Central Asia. One reporter states that when the German army moved into the Ukraine in 1941, the Mennonites were put into freight cars and sent to the Kustanai region of the Kazakh SSR, arriving there in November 1941. However, the men were drafted in January 1942, and the women and children left to take care of themselves under very primitive conditions (M.R., Sept. 19, 1956, p. 1). The largest concentration of Mennonites in Central Asia is in the Kazakh SSR, the main centers being the region and city of Karaganda. In 1955 the Karaganda Baptist Church had 1,000 members, two thirds of whom were of German background and mostly Mennonites. The Mennonites had previously worshiped separately. The leader of the eight ministers of the church is a Russian Baptist, three are Mennonites, and two are Lutherans. They meet four times a week and have communion services the first Sunday of each month. Every Sunday they have two German sermons. Smaller meetings take place in Mennonite homes. Thirty families had received Bibles from Mennonites in America. The Russian Baptist magazine, Bratsky Vestnik, published in Moscow, in its report on the dedication of the Baptist Church of Karaganda on Nov. 18, 1956, says that 133,000 rubles and much voluntary labor had been spent on enlarging and remodeling the church. The Moscow representative, who came by plane to take part in the activities, reports that he visited a Peters family who lived in an attractive home with a nice garden. Peters was working in the mines and earned enough to permit his wife to devote her time to church work.

When H. S. Bender and David Wiens visited Soviet Central Asia a little later, they met some of the Mennonites of this area, particularly of Karaganda and Alma-Ata. The latter also has a large Baptist church in which Mennonites worship. Orie O. Miller, who visited this area in 1958, also made several contacts with the Mennonites. All reports, written and oral, confirm that living conditions, including freedom to move from one place to another, choice of occupation, freedom to worship, have improved considerably. In some instances Mennonites have organized congregations, but these have not been officially registered and approved by the Department of Cults. In some cases, because of local pressure, the meetings have been discontinued. A recent letter reports that a Mennonite baptismal service was stopped when the police arrested the officiating minister. The congregation remained together praying for the minister, and he returned after a few hours (Bote, Oct. 8, 1958, p. 4). In general, the Mennonites have suffered with others of German background because of their German culture and language during and after World War II. There are indications that today, at least in some places, there is less discrimination.

Mennonites in this area can be found in almost any occupation, but many of them were originally men and women forced to work in the mines. A letter (M.R., Nov. 9, 1955, pp. 2 & 3) from Stalinabad says that some of the members of a certain family are working in a hospital, one works as a nurse in a clinic, another in a print shop, still another is a railroad engineer, while others are tailors and chauffeurs. They raise two crops a year. They attend the Baptist church of the city, and some sing in the choir. Orie O. Miller visited Stalinabad in 1958 and found these reports confirmed. C.K.

Spaans, Dutch Mennonite family, since the 17th century found at Barsingerhorn (q.v.), where some of its members served as deacons. Simon Spaans (1873-1944), of Barsingerhorn, educated at the university and the Mennonite seminary at Amsterdam, was pastor at Goes-Vlissingen 1899-1907, Enkhuizen 1907-17, and Assen-Stadskanaal 1917-39, in which year he retired. He published some sermons and a paper, Het Christologische in de Catechese (Assen, 1927). vdZ.

Spaargaren, a Mennonite family at Aalsmeer (q.v.), Dutch province of North Holland, found there from at least the early 17th century. An Oude Jan Jans Spaargaren, a middle-aged man, is named in 1649. Many members of the Spaargaren family have served the church as deacons, and Jacob Spaargaren was a preacher of the Oude Vermaning (Frisian congregation) on the Uiterweg 1786-1812, while Jan Willems Spaargaren served the same congregation as preacher from 1838 and elder 1850-60. vdZ.

Spaarndam, a hamlet in the Dutch province of North Holland, not far from Haarlem, which was in the 16th century a watery and inaccessible region, was in the period of persecution often a hiding place for dislodged Anabaptists. During a raid in March 1534 at least 105 men and 126 women and a number of children were apprehended at Spaarndam, some of whom were executed at Haarlem.

In December 1534 or in early January 1535 a meeting of 32 Anabaptist leaders was held in the inn "De halve Mane" at Spaarndam. This meeting was called to discuss the matter of revolutionary Anabaptism. Revolutionary Anabaptists such as Meynart (q.v.) van Emden instigated an attack on Amsterdam, but most of the leaders refused to consider such rebellion, desiring to hold to peaceful principles. This too was the advice of Jacob van Campen (q.v.), the Anabaptist bishop of Amsterdam, who was not present at the Spaarndam meeting. The proceedings of the Spaarndam discussion clearly show that at this moment the majority of the Dutch Anabaptist leaders were averse to violence. vdZ.

Spanheim Sr., Frederik (Fredericus Spanhemius), b. 1600 at Amberg in Bavaria, Germany, d. 1649 at Leiden, Holland, and his son Frederik Spanheim Jr. (b. Geneva 1632, d. Leiden 1707), both Reformed theologians and professors at the University of Leiden, attacked the Mennonites in their writings. Spanheim Sr. wrote Variae disputationes anti-anabaptisticae (1643-48) and Diatribe Historica de Origine, Progressu et Sectis Anabaptistarum (Franker, 1645; 2d ed. 1656), in which he maintained the old and false theory that the Dutch Mennonites were the descendants of the Münsterite (q.v.) Anabaptists. Spanheim Jr. in the second chapter of his book Controversiarum de Religione Elenchus historico-theologicus (Leiden, 1687, repr. 1694 and 1757) repeated the assertions of his father. His contentions were opposed by the Mennonites E. A. van Dooregeest (q.v.) in Brief aan den Heer F. Spanhemius (Amsterdam, 1693, 2d ed. 1693, 3d ed. augmented with a letter by Herman Schijn, 1700), and Galenus (q.v.) Abrahamsz in Verdediging der Christenen, die Doopsgezinden genaamd worden (Amsterdam, 1700). vdZ.

Spanish Mennonite Church (MC), La Junta, Col., a member of the South Central Conference, was formerly called the Spanish Baptist Church, but was turned over to the Mennonites in 1940, who bought and remodeled the church building, which had been erected in 1921. The present congregation was organized under the leadership of David Castillo, a native of Mexico, in February 1941, when eleven were baptized and six received upon confession of faith. The membership in 1955 was 42, with Castillo as pastor. Since 1944 the congregation has sponsored a Spanish Gospel Program over the local radio station. E.S.C.

Spat, a Mennonite village in the Crimea. The land for this village, 23,500 acres, was purchased in 1881 by a group of Mennonites from the Molotschna settlement and was located near the station Sarabus. Two villages were established on this land, the larger named Spat and the smaller, about five miles distant, Menlerchik. Spat consisted of 31 settlers, among whom the most influential were Johann Langemann and Cornelius Wall. Economic difficulties were overcome by means of a loan from Molotschna private sources. By 1912 the land, which had been purchased from Anna Semyonova, had been paid for. The villages were established on the usual pattern used by the Mennonites of Russia. Soon Spat became a prosperous center of the Mennonites of the Crimea in agriculture, industry, and education. Langemann had an agricultural implement factory, and there were two large mills owned respectively by Langemann and Janzen and Langemann and Unrau, besides numerous other businesses. C.K.

Spat Mennonite Church, Crimea, Russia, was a subsidiary of the Karassan Mennonite Church (q.v.) established in 1882. The local meetinghouse was destroyed by fire in 1919. The main place of worship was at Karassan. The village of Spat was also the center of a Mennonite Brethren church. (H. Dirks, Statistik, 1905, 63.) C.K.

Spat Zentralschule was opened in the Spat Mennonite settlement in 1906, when an impressive school building with three teachers' residences was completed. The school differed from other Zentralschulen in that it was coeducational. The first teachers were Cornelius Janzen, Franz Ediger, and Daniel Enns. Later Cornelius Lehn and Heinrich Ediger taught the school. In addition to this Zentralschule, the Crimean Mennonites also had the Karassan Zentralschule. Among its teachers were Karl Friedrichsen, K. Bergmann, and J. Loetke-mann. For a time Karassan also had a girls' school. C.K.

Spat-Schöntal Mennonite Brethren Church of Crimea, Russia, was organized as a result of the Mennonite Brethren influences from the Molotschna Mennonite settlement. A group began to meet in private homes where, among other things, Spurgeon's sermons were read and religious experiences were exchanged. Some Mennonite Brethren moved to the Crimea. The first baptism by immersion was conducted there by Elder David Schellenberg on April 28, 1885. Thus a branch of the Rückenau M.B. Church was established at Spat, Crimea. In 1886 Hermann Konrad was ordained minister by David and Abraham Schellenberg. On Oct. 11, 1887, a meetinghouse was dedicated at Spat. In 1891 Cornelius Boschmann, Bernhard Friesen, and Daniel Friesen were ordained by David Schellenberg and Daniel Fast. In 1894 Peter Görzen, Jakob Hiebert, Jr., and Heinrich Janzen were appointed ministers.

In 1895 Abraham J. Kröker and in 1897 Jakob Kröker came to Spat. The latter was ordained minister by David Schellenberg on May 25, 1898. Abraham and Jakob Kröker (q.v.) began here with the publication of Christlicher Familienkalender (1897), Christlicher Abreißkalender (1903), and Friedensstimme (1903), which efforts later resulted in the founding of "Raduga" (q.v.). Heinrich Unruh (q.v.) and Cornelius Unruh (q.v.) were ordained as missionaries to India at the turn of the century. On May 23, 1899, David Dürksen (q.v.) was ordained elder of the Spat M.B. Church, which thus became independent. In 1902 the congregation consisted of 140 families, 330 members, and 810 souls. In 1905 another meetinghouse with a seating capacity of six hundred was established in Schöntal where David Dürksen resided. The Mennonite Brethren had an active part in the establishment of the Zentralschulen in Karassan (1905) and Spat (1906). Some young people did graduate work and made a vital contribution to the spiritual and cultural life of the Mennonites of Russia. Another meetinghouse was established at Annovka. Meetings also took place in Bashlichia and in Tokulchak. David Dürksen died in 1910. It is likely that Hermann Konrad of Spat and Peter Görzen of Schöntal continued as leaders. They officiated at an ordination in 1926 (Unser Blatt II, p. 110). C.K.

Spating, Vinzenz, a member of the Great Council of the Swiss canton of Bern, took part in the Anabaptist colloquy of Jan. 22, 1528, on the side of the Anabaptists; he recanted later and was pardoned on Jan. 24. (Zwingliana 1933, 409 and 411; ML IV.)

Speedwell Mennonite Brethren Church, now extinct, situated 3 miles east and 8 miles north of Fairholme, Sask., a member of the North Saskatchewan M.B. Conference, was organized in 1926 under the leadership of John Kliewer with a membership of 13.

The membership steadily increased to 116 by 1936. Because of heavy emigration to Ontario and British Columbia and because of local farming difficulties, the membership again decreased so that by 1948, when J. A. Enns, who had been leader since 1937, moved away with his family, the few members remaining transferred their membership to other churches. J.H.E.

Sperling (Sparling), a Mennonite family in a number of Prussian congregations as early as 1700, in Montau even before 1700. Tobias Sperling, living in East Prussia, was forced to leave his farm in 1722, moving to West Prussia, where he died. Laurens (Lorenz) Sperling was an elder of the Groningen Old Flemish congregation in the Culmsche Niederung 1757-80, and Johann Sparling (d. 1799) a preacher and elder (from 1775) of the Klein-Werder (Markushof) congregation. The name is also found among the Mennonites of Russia and America.

The form "Spaarlinck," which is sometimes found, seems to indicate that this family was of Dutch descent. vDZ.

Sperling Mennonite Brethren Church of Sperling, Man., a member of the Manitoba Provincial and the Canadian District M.B. conferences, had a membership of 18 in 1957, with D. D. Froese as leading minister. It was organized in 1932 with 20 members out of a group which, meeting earlier with General Conference Mennonites in this area, began to meet separately in May 1928. In January 1954 the Sperling M.B. group temporarily joined the Winkler M.B. congregation, but soon became an independent congregation again. H.N.E.

Speybroeck, M. van, is the author or composer of the Dutch Mennonite hymnal Syons Wijnberch, inhoudende Verscheyden Schriftuerlijke Liedekens. . . . This hymnal is very rare. Copies of a third edition (Vlissingen, 1670), containing 78 hymns without notes on 380 pages, and a later undated edition are found in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library. A sequel or second part of this hymnal was published in 1665 at Vlissingen, entitled 't Nieuw (q.v.) Geestelijck Kruyt-Hof. Concerning van Speybroeck no information was available. vDZ.

Speyer, Diet of, 1529, the notorious Imperial Diet at which the first imperial law was passed against the Anabaptists threatening death to anyone who did not recognize infant baptism. Thereby the mandate of Charles V (q.v.) of Jan. 4, 1528, acquired the consent of the estates, including the Protestants, who at the same diet protested against compulsion in religious matters. The delegates from the cities (Catholic and Protestant) declared in a petition presented on April 8 to the two estates of princes that they would give their consent to the article on Anabaptism and on April 12 the Protestant princes also expressed their willingness to agree with the majority in the matter of the Anabaptists. Prince Louis V, a Catholic of the Palatinate, suggested a lightening of the penalty to the effect that only those should be punished with capital punishment who would not desist from Anabaptism. In the session of all the estates of the diet of April 17, a draft of a decision made by the committee, to be included in the mandate against the Anabaptists, was announced to the estates and received the consent of both princely chambers, whereas the cities were for the time being still debating it. The Protestant princes in addition, in their protestation of April 19 and again on April 20, declared their express agreement with the measures to be adopted against the adherents of adult baptism. The imperial law against the Anabaptists was issued April 23, 1529.

The content of the mandate—printed in the Neue und vollständige Sammlung der Reichsabschiede (Frankfurt a.M., 1747) II, 284; in J. J. Schmaussens Corpora juris publici Academ. III (1755) No. XIX, 141-43; Krohn, 213; and Bossert's *Quellen (TA Württemberg, 1930) 3*5—was about as follows (literally according to Ney, 216, who gives an excerpt): Although the common law forbids upon penalty of death to baptize again an already baptized person and the emperor at the beginning of 1528 has given a new warning against the transgressors of the prohibition, that sect is still increasing. Therefore the regulation is ordered again, that each and every rebaptizer and rebaptized person, man or woman, of an accountable age shall be brought from natural life to death with fire, sword, or the like according to the circumstances of the persons without previous inquisition of spiritual judges. Against the preachers and leaders of the sect as well as those who persisted in the same or fell back into it no mercy shall be exercised but the threatened penalty shall be ruthlessly performed. Those who confess their error, recant, and beg for mercy may be pardoned. Whoever does not have his children baptized shall be considered an Anabaptist. No pardoned person shall be permitted to emigrate, so that the authorities can see to it that he does not backslide. No prince shall receive the subjects of another who have escaped. This mandate shall in all points be most strictly performed by all in order to perform the duties and oaths to the emperor and empire and to avoid the serious displeasure and punishment of the emperor.

The edict of Speyer brought brutal punishment upon the Anabaptists such as was inflicted upon no other religious party of the Holy Roman Empire. The law was repeated at Speyer in 1544, and was finally renewed at the diet of Augsburg in 1551. As late as 1694 the court councillor of Jülich, von Heyden, justified his sudden expulsion of the Mennonites from Rheydt (q.v.) by the edict of Speyer.

Spiegel der Taufe, Ein, written by Henry Funck, a Mennonite bishop in the Franconia congregation, and printed by Christopher Saur at Germantown in 1744, was a small-format 94-page book intended to show that pouring is the Scriptural mode of baptism. Evidently the Mennonites of this area were under pressure from the aggressive Tunkers (Church of the Brethren) who insisted that immersion was the only valid mode of baptism. The full title of the book is Ein Spiegel der Tauffe mit Geist, mit Wasser und mit Blut. Verfasset in neun Theile, Aufßs Neue aufgesetzt und ausgezogen aus dem Heiligen Fundament-Buch, des Neuen und Alten Testaments, der Canonischen Bücher. I. Epist. Joh. V. 8. Saur, being a Tunker immersionist, refused to put his imprint on the title page. Only one complete copy has survived, in the Historical Society of Pennsylvania library in Philadelphia, and a defective copy in GCL.

The author argues from I John 5:8 that Spirit baptism, water baptism, and baptism by blood are one, and must be symbolically identical. Since the baptism of the Holy Spirit was by pouring, and since baptism by blood means going under the blood (by pouring; Jesus poured out His lifeblood for our salvation), hence water baptism must also be by pouring. Other arguments are adduced, such as that the Levitical washings under the Old Covenant were sprinklings. Sprinkling is also acceptable as a mode of baptism; it is certainly not immersion. Funck attributes the error of immersion to too much dependence upon history and the writings of the church fathers, rather than relying exclusively upon the Scriptures. There is other useful material in the book besides the arguments against immersion and for pouring which are sometimes strong and sometimes weak. The author's insistence upon the necessity and value of water baptism in obeying the commandment of Christ suggests that he also had the Quakers in mind who reject water baptism altogether. The book was reprinted four times in German (1834, 1850, 1853, 1861) and three times in English (1851, 1853, 1890) under the title A Mirror of Baptism with Spirit, with Water, and with Blood. Drawn up in nine parts. Drawn out and enlarged anew out of the Holy Foundation Book, The New and Old Testament, and the Canonical Books. I. Epis. John V, 8. It evidently served a continuing need, due largely to constant pressure of Brethren teaching. The Brethren won a considerable number of Mennonites to their group in Eastern Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, where their congregations were often neighbors to Mennonite congregations. H.S.B.

Spielmann, Christoph (1861-1917), director of the city archives at Wiesbaden, Germany, and the author of various works on pedagogy and history; e.g., Sagen und Geschichten aus dem Nassauerland and Geschichte von Nassau, as well as novels, stories, and dramas. In 1894 he published an article in the Annalen für nassauische Altertumskunde und Geschichtsforschung (XXVII) with the title "Die Mennoniten und ihre Bedeutung für die Kultur in Nassau," which aside from a few historical errors is a just evaluation of Mennonitism. (Menn. Bl., 1895, 19 ff.; ML IV.)

Spiesheim, a village near Alzey (q.v.) in Rheinhessen, Germany, formerly belonging to the Palatinate, in which there have been Mennonites since at least 1661. In that year Wendel Holl of Wolfsheim (q.v.) asked permission for the few Mennonites who were living in Bernersheim, Spiesheim, and Aspisheim to hold meetings. The lists of the Generallandesarchiv of Karlsruhe name three Mennonite families living in Spiesheim in 1664: Johann Bliem, Christian Weber, and Wilhelm Ham (Hahn?). In 1685 there were five families: Severin Ham, Matthes Becker, Wilhelm Mäurer, Joh. Bliem, and Heinrich Bliem. In 1738 the lists name the families of Heinrich Hahn, Johannes Weber, Peter Berg ("the young and the old"), Dietrich, Daniel, Heinrich, and Julius Blum, and also Julius and Heinrich Biehn. In 1752 the heads of the families were Peter Berg ("the young and the old"), Julius Biehn, Dietrich and Daniel Bliem, Heinrich Hahn's widow, Johann Jakob Hüthwohl, and Johann Weber. In 1759 there were only Julius Biehn, Johann Weber's widow, Peter Berg, Heinrich Biehn's widow, and as a new name Peter Jansz. The last list of names, 1768, also names five families: Julius Biehn, Hermann Biehn, Peter Jantz, Johann Schmidt's widow, and Peter Berg. A summary of 1773 counts five families with a total of five sons and eight daughters.

In 1732 the Mennonites of Spiesheim still belonged to the Wolfsheim congregation. After the Wolfsheim congregation disbanded, Spiesheim apparently merged with the neighboring Wallertheim. The union existed until at least 1810, for a document left by Johannes Borkholder of Wallertheim shows that he was chosen as preacher of the joint congregation in 1808, and as elder in 1809. The relation of Spiesheim to the neighboring churches is not clear. In the Dutch Naamlijst of 1766 Oberflörsheim, Spiesheim, and Griesheim are listed as one congregation with Christian Weber as elder (from 1728) and Wilhelm Krämer, Johannes Schörger, Henrich Müller as preachers. The Naamlijst of 1767 lists each of these three congregations as more or less independent, Johann Schörger and Wilhelm Krämer (1748) being the preachers at Spiesheim, while Christian Weber (preacher 1725, elder 1728, d. 1771) of Oberflörsheim still served as elder of the three congregations. The Naamlijst of 1775 lists Johann Schörger, Henrich Müller (1759), and Gerhard Berg (1772) as preachers at Spiesheim. Müller and Berg died in 1790 and were followed by Johann Borkholder, the father of the above, and Abraham Hertzler. Shortly after 1775 Johann Schörger died and was followed by his son Andreas Schörger who served until c1783.

In the Naamlijst of 1786 and later Spiesheim-Wallertheim is listed together with Erbesbüdisheim and Weierhof, Jacob Galle of Erbesbüdisheim being the elder of this group of congregations. This situation lasted until 1791, when both preachers of Spiesheim-Wallertheim were ordained as elders and this church became independent.

As a contribution for the erection of a new church in Altleiningen (q.v.) Hermann Biehn of Spiesheim sent 6 florins and 9 kreutzer from the Schniftenbergerhof congregation and 12 florins from the Spiesheim and Wallertheim congregation to Valentin Krämer in Oberflörsheim. Johann Borkholder signed the resolutions of Ibersheim (q.v.) for the Wallertheim (Spiesheim is not named) and Rhein-grafenstein (q.v.) congregations in 1803.

In the course of an interesting school dispute between the Mennonites and the government of Hesse, which was fought out especially by David Kaege (q.v.), of Offstein, other Hessian Mennonite congregations also stated their position. A letter of this kind written to the government of the province of Rheinhessen in December 1828 was signed by the following: for the Spiesheim congregation—Peter Berg and Johannes Berg, preachers; Johann Schmitt, Vorsteher; and Peter Bien; for the Wallertheim congregation—Christian Hegi, Jakob Schowalter; for the Uffhofen congregation—Jakob Galle, preacher; Jakob Steiner. This seems to indicate that there were three independent congregations. But this can have been the case for only a short time, for in 1829, when a small church was built in Uffhofen (q.v.), first Wallertheim and then Spiesheim joined the Mennonite congregation in Uffhofen; the latter are still members there.

Jakob Weber of Spiesheim was the last lay preacher of the congregation. After the Weierhof congregation became responsible for the services at Spiesheim he probably served only on certain occasions. In February 1852 a Mennonite funeral was held in the town church in Spiesheim, which had been built a few years previously with the aid of Mennonite contributions. Since no trained minister was available, a lay preacher, probably Weber, was about to preach the funeral sermon, but was told that he must preach from the altar, and not from the pulpit. On February 27 he wrote a vehement protest to the pastor at Ensisheim, asking either that such restrictions be removed, or that the contributions made by the Mennonites be returned to them. After a correspondence of six months the matter was apparently settled to Weber's satisfaction; the payments made by the Mennonites were not refunded, on the ground that they had used the church six times in the eight years.

An instance of gross intolerance had occurred at Spiesheim about 150 years earlier when the lay preacher Chiles Hahn was fined ten talers for preaching a short funeral sermon in the local Catholic cemetery (see Burial, Funerals).

Two instances of the enforcement of the right of redemption (Jus Retractus, q.v.) illustrate the lack of protection and legal status of the early Mennonites. In 1732 Johann Weber, a Mennonite, had bought some land at a public auction for 152 florins. A few days later another claimed the right to the land. The Mennonites under the jurisdiction of Alzey made a united appeal to the elector, but to no avail. In 1736 the dispute flared up again in Spiesheim, when a vineyard was claimed in this manner after it had been in Mennonite possession for ten years. This time, however, the elector required the local government to return it to the Mennonites and imposed a fine of 10 talers on the local authorities.

At present there are in Spiesheim five Mennonite families and a few single persons, with the old names of Berg, Schmidt, and Weber. A Beutler family moved in from Sembach in 1875. (ML IV)

P.S.

Spijkenisse, a small town on the island of Putten in the Dutch province of South Holland, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation, which is sometimes called "Spijkenis, Heenvliet and Suytlant," and also "Geervliet-Spijkenis." (See also Geervliet, Heenvliet, and Zuidland.) It is impossible because of lack of sources to ascertain whether and to what extent these congregations were independent of each other. A congregation of Spijkenisse is mentioned before 1600. This congregation, belonging to the Flemish branch, was always small (figures not obtainable). In 1648 its meetinghouse burned down and was rebuilt with financial support by the Rotterdam congregation; also at several other times Rotterdam contributed to the needs of Spijkenisse. After the Lammerenkrijgh (q.v.) had divided the Flemish Mennonites into Lamists (q.v.) and Zonists (q.v.), Spijkenisse, Heenvliet, and Zuidland sided with the conservative Zonists, and in 1664 Huygh Barentsz van der Klok, Leendert Pietersz, and Adriaan Jansz signed the Verbondt van Eenigheydt (q.v.) for these congregation(s), while in 1674 the congregation rejected liberal Collegiant (q.v.) views. It was always served by untrained preachers chosen from the membership; apparently Klaas Cornelissen, who served till about 1721, was the last of them. According to the Naamlijst of 1731, 1743, and 1755 the pulpit then became vacant and by about 1760 the congregation of Spijkenisse had ceased to exist.

Spijker, an old Dutch word for warehouse. The Dutch Mennonites in the 16-17th centuries often bought warehouses and adapted them for use as meetinghouses; hence the name "spijker" sometimes remained usual for these meetinghouses. In Amsterdam the Groote Spijker near the Jan Rodenpoorts Toren on the Singel Canal was from 1604 the meetinghouse of the Amsterdam Waterlander congregation. It remained in use after the Waterlander merger with the Lamist congregation in 1668. In 1801 after a fusion of Lamists and Zonists in Amsterdam, the pulpit and the organ of the Zon meetinghouse were installed in the Groote Spijker. This meetinghouse was used until 1812, and was razed in 1814. Its organ and pulpit are now in the Leeuwarden church, which bought them in 1812 for 2800 Dutch guilders.

Before the Waterlanders acquired the Groote Spijker, they had held their meetings in the Kleine Spijker in the Teerketelsteeg. This Kleine Spijker

(Oude Spijker) was taken over by a Frisian Mennonite congregation in 1604. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 82-99, 1341 f.)

Spink Hutterite Bruderhof, called Spink Hutterian Brethren, Inc., of the Schmiedeleut (q.v.) group, located near Frankfort, S.D., was founded in 1905 by members of the Wolf Creek (q.v.) Bruderhof. In 1918 they sold this land and moved to Alberta, founding the Stand-Off Colony near Macleod. In 1944 the Bon Homme commune bought this site and rebuilt it; eleven families with Johannes Wipf, who had been chosen to the ministry in 1934, from Bon Homme settled here. Joseph Wipf was chosen preacher in Spink in 1946. In 1958 the commune numbered 152 souls. Land has been bought at Ipswich, S.D., where a new Bruderhof is to be established in the near future by members of Spink.

Spinniker, Adriaan (Ate), b. March 18, 1676, at Groningen, d. April 28, 1754, at Haarlem, was the son of Preacher Melis Ates Spinniker (q.v.). He was baptized in 1695 in the Amsterdam Lamist church, was trained for the ministry by Galenus (q.v.) Abrahamsz of Amsterdam, and served as assistant pastor of the Amsterdam Lamist congregation 1700-5. He resigned in 1705 because, as he wrote, "I have not duly guarded against seduction, and have fallen into outrages, by which I feel unworthy not only to continue the holy service of preaching, but also to participate with you in the holy communion of our Lord." He then moved to Haarlem, where he earned his living as a book-keeper. He was a loyal member of the church, and in 1727 he was asked by the church board of the Peuzelaarsteeg congregation to train young men for the ministry. Spinniker accepted, but resigned in May 1728, feeling that this task could be better undertaken by a minister in active service.

Adriaan Spinniker, who was married to Sara Verdun of Amsterdam, is known for his poetry. He published several volumes, all very mediocre, including Lof der Vriendschap (Amsterdam, 1699; reprint ed. Rotterdam, 1711), Morgen en Avondgezangen, Gebedswijze berijmt (Amsterdam, 1699), Leerzame Zinnebeelden (Haarlem, 1714; repr. Haarlem, 1756, Haarlem, 1757), Gods gerichten op aarde, vertoond in den schrikkelyken storm en hoogen watervloed . . . in't 1717de Jaar voorgevallen (Haarlem, n.d.-1718), Vervolg der Leerzame Zinnebeelden, prefaced by a biography of Spinniker by G. W. van Oosten (Haarlem, 1758). His De vrijheit op den troon gezet (Amsterdam, 1743) is a rhymed attack on the heresy-hunters in the Dutch Reformed Church. For the use of the Haarlem Mennonite congregation, Spinniker collaborated in making a new rhymed version of the Psalms. Spinniker also wrote a large amount of topical poetry; such are found in the 1706 edition of J. P. Schabaelje's Wandelende Ziele, and Schijn and Maatschoen's Geschiedenis dier Christenen, welke . . . Mennoniten genaamd worden I (Amsterdam, 1743). He also wrote the short laudatory poems to each of the portrait engravings in the collection of outstanding Mennonite ministers Afbeeldingen van Doopsgezinde Leeraren (Amsterdam, 1743), which pictures with the same legends are also found in the work by Schijn-Maatschoen.

Spinniker, Melis Ates, d. Dec. 1681, was a preacher of the Waterlander Mennonite congregation at Groningen, Netherlands, 16 -79. Because of some trouble with the church board here and by the intervention of Galenus (q.v.) Abrahamsz, the Schiedam congregation called him as its preacher. Spinniker served at Schiedam from 1669 until his early death in 1681. His widow Grietje Hillebrands with two or three daughters and two sons, one of whom was Adriaan Spinniker (q.v.), moved to Amsterdam in 1694. Spinniker had not received special training for the ministry and was a book printer by trade.

Spinoza, Baruch (Benedictus) de (1632-77), the noted philosopher, was born at Amsterdam on Nov. 24, 1632, of Spanish-Jewish descent. His pantheistic-rationalistic ideas, with an overtone of mysticism, profoundly influenced German and Dutch philosophy. He was expelled from the Jewish community as a heretic and lived in modest retirement, on a friendly footing with the Mennonites and the Collegiants (q.v.) in Rijnsburg and The Hague. The Mennonites were instrumental in publishing his writings, when the Dutch Reformed publishers were afraid to do it. One of his greatest benefactors was Joosten de Vries, a Mennonite merchant of Amsterdam. Spinoza died at The Hague on Feb. 21, 1677.

Spiritualism, mainly of the 16th century (Rufus M. Jones prefers the term "Spiritual Reformers"), a tendency in the period of the Reformation to emphasize the possession of the Spirit (occasionally called the Holy Spirit, by Anabaptists also called "the Power of God" or the "Heart") over against a literal acceptance of the Scriptures. Actually the conflict between "letter" and "spirit" is as old as the New Testament itself and represents a perennial problem for any honest Christian. In the days of the Reformation two opposing tendencies appear very clearly: a stronger reliance upon the letter of the Scriptures such as with Luther, or a greater emphasis on inner illumination, with its corollary: freedom of decision, centering in man's conscience, and neglect of historical elements in Christianity such as the organized church, the sacraments (as means of salvation), and the historical setting of Christian events: creation, fall, redemption, Last Judgment, etc. While all Scripturally oriented Christians center around some organized form of church life, Spiritualists usually minimize these social aspects of faith, relying on the "invisible" church rather than on any visible one, by this promoting a strong individualistic element within Christianity. In its extreme forms Spiritualism moves even further away from its New Testament matrix, only to become a vague "spiritual religion" of some Neoplatonic character, hence no longer justifiably called "Christian."

It seems that Spiritualism in its different forms of historical expression originated in German and Dutch-speaking areas in the 16th century, while in the 17th century there arose a similar phenomenon in England, i.e., Quakerism. The first to recognize Spiritualism as a particular phenomenon was Hegler (q.v.) in his unsurpassed study on Sebastian Franck (1892); his ideas were taken up in part by Troeltsch in his Social Teachings (1912, English 1930), in which he made a distinction between (institutional) church, sect (i.e., gathered church or brotherhood), and individualistic Spiritualism. In the latter movement he counts men like Franck, Bänderlin, and Entfelder. Two years later the American Quaker scholar Rufus M. Jones published his Spiritual Reformers of the 16th and 17th Centuries (1914) where the term received its final formulation and historic content. Jones sees in men like Denk, Franck, and later Weigel and Boehme, the true forerunners of the Quakers of the 17th century. Actually to pool Denk, Franck, and Schwenckfeld on the one side and Weigel and Boehme (a theosophist) on the other dramatically reveals the vagueness of the term Spiritualism. Karl Holl, another modern church historian concerned with the theme, lumps together all dissidents from the Lutheran way as Schwärmer and in another connection also calls them Spiritualists (in conscious opposition to Troeltsch); to him Anabaptists were also a kind of Spiritualists.

A great step forward in the problem of the definition of Spiritualism was achieved by Kühn (q.v.) in 1923, who distinguished five types of "Protestants"; besides the "prophetic" type of Luther (believing in the revealed Word of God in the Scriptures), the Spiritualistic type represented by Schwenckfeld in Germany and Roger Williams in America, the "Nachfolge" (discipleship) type such as Anabaptists and Quakers—again a strange fellowship inasmuch as Quakerism is nearer to the Spiritualists than to the Anabaptists, the mystical type (Weigel, Boehme), and the ethical-rational type (Castellio and Arminius, later also Pietism). Köhler (RGG, 1931) classified Castellio among the Spiritualists.

Finally, George H. Williams of Harvard presented in his edition of Spiritual and Anabaptist Writers (1957) a new classification which seems to come nearer to historical reality than any of the earlier attempts. He distinguished three groups in Spiritualism: revolutionary, evangelical, and rational. For revolutionary Spiritualism Carlstadt and Müntzer are named as typical; for evangelical Spiritualism Schwenckfeld and Gabriel Ascherham are considered as characteristic; for the rational type of Spiritualism Sebastian Franck is named as a representative, but also—strangely—the "pansophist" Paracelsus and the mystic Valentine Weigel. On the other hand, a man like Hans Denk is classified among the "contemplative Anabaptists," quite in contradistinction to Rufus Jones's opinion.

This survey clearly demonstrates the elusiveness of the concept of Spiritualist as found in the 16th and 17th centuries. Sharper definitions or distinctions are still needed to understand the deeper issues. For instance, for some of these men the doctrine of the "inner word" (see Bible, Inner and Outer Word) means a divine impulse to discipleship and a concrete Christianity while to others (e.g., Quakers) it means simply the spiritual equipment in every man, hence a liberating force in life's decisions. It might perhaps be best to distinguish Spiritualism proper (as described by Williams) from spiritualistic tendencies both in general Protestantism and in Anabaptism (this distinction is suggested by Bergsten). In this regard early Anabaptism clearly demonstrates these tendencies without, however, losing its concrete and existential character as the religion of discipleship.

Spiritualism is only in part New Testamental; in part it is Neoplatonic, a teaching which runs like a red thread throughout Western intellectual history (see Lovejoy), and in part is indebted to medieval mysticism (Williams, 87). But beyond that Spiritualists rely either strongly "on that of God in every man" (George Fox's term), i.e., on man's spiritual equipment, or on dreams, visions, revelations, and other inspirations, occasionally called Eingebungsgeist (Müntzer, David Joris). The great names in this line are undoubtedly Sebastian Franck (q.v.), Johann Bänderlin, Christian Entfelder, and (as a type in itself) Caspar Schwenckfeld, sometimes called the "spiritualistic pietist" of his age. All these men consider the Holy Scripture more as a textbook of Spiritualism than as the one and final revealed Word of God to be unconditionally obeyed. Franck very clearly explains why he could not be an Anabaptist, in spite of all his warm sympathies for these people—it was their discipline, their congregational life, their practical demonstration of discipleship. There was a great controversy between Spiritualism and Anabaptism, even though the delineations are not always clear. Spiritualists are generally individualists, believing in an invisible church rather than in a visible institution or brotherhood, although at times they developed fellowship groups or circles, as around Schwenckfeld. Doctrinally they were not much concerned, inasmuch as the person of Christ is often not absolutely central (for some Christ was only a great teacher). Also sacraments or ordinances were minimized: neither Müntzer nor Joris nor Schwenckfeld cared for baptism or the Lord's Supper, nor did Quakers ever practice these ceremonies. Spiritualists hardly ever speak of the "church under the cross" (see Martyrdom, Theology of). Of course, they, too, know of suffering in this world, but it is due to the tension between spirit and flesh and not because the "world" would contradict their teachings and practices. Usually they live a life of withdrawal and inconspicuous conduct, filled with meditation, writing, and a rich correspondence.

At first Spiritualism can be a very strong force in those who actually experience such an immediacy of God's inner light. Later it can and often does develop into two directions: rationalism (Socinianism) and Pietism, sometimes even combining them. This development became particularly obvious in later Dutch Mennonitism—the line from Hans de Ries to Galenus de Haan (see Meihuizen). Thus Kühn's typology can become blurred since there are no pure types. Often Spiritualism ends in religious liberalism, just as Anabaptism at times eventuates into conservatism, fundamentalism, and legalism.

Early Anabaptism, that is, the first generation, 1525/50, bears certain marks of a dynamic spiritual (spiritualistic) character; in fact, this is the very justification for its existence. Inner rebirth and John 3:8 explain the vigor and liveliness of its first representatives anywhere. This has been brought out most impressively in Orley Swartzentruber's analysis of some early documents, Michael Sattler's letter to the congregation in Horb of 1527, and Anneken Jans's farewell letter to her infant son in 1539 (Swartzentruber, 17 ff., 131 ff.). In these analyses it becomes quite clear that to these early martyrs the "inner word" does not mean at all an "antinomian escape" but rather an increased urge for obedience and concrete witnessing to one's faith. Sattler warns his fellow believers of "false brethren," apparently "spiritualizers" (perhaps followers of Hans Denk and Hans Hut; see Kiwiet), and "enthusiasts," but nevertheless he himself uses, as Swartzentruber writes, a "pneumatic language," stressing the inwardness of a dedicated heart. Early Anabaptism represents a unique synthesis of spiritualism, Gospel ethics, and eschatology (ibid., 133); most likely this formula of explanation does not exhaust the phenomenon. Certainly, the idea of a "church without spot and wrinkle" is another aspect of this "Anabaptist spiritualism" which Swartzentruber calls "orthodox spiritualism" (22), something which is very different from the ideas of Spiritualism in the narrower sense of the term used above.

The present writer has discussed the issue of Anabaptism-Spiritualism several times. In his Mennonite Piety (79 ff.) he formulated the issue somewhat as follows: "The Spirit can be present only where He can also become flesh" (82). Such a spiritualism is then called a "concrete or Biblical spiritualism" as contrasted to the non-concrete vagueness of Neoplatonic Spiritualism in a Franck or a Campanus. In other words, Anabaptist "spiritualism" requires commitment, Nachfolge, obedience, evidencing of faith in life—points little cared for by the Neoplatonists, and hence is probably better not called Spiritualism. But, to be sure, all this is true for the early representatives of the movement (to 1540-55), while later generations show already signs of the "routinization of charisma" (term by Max Weber), that is, a certain formalization of erstwhile spontaneous acts and expressions.

H. W. Meihuizen (MQR 1953, 259-304) wrote an important article on the "Spiritualistic Tendencies and Movements Among the Dutch Mennonites of the 16th and 17th Centuries," contrasting the line from Hans de Ries and the Waterlanders up to Galenus Abrahamsz de Haan with the other line from Menno Simons and Dirk Philips to Pieter Jans Twisck and the Hard Frisians, claiming that the spiritualistic line is the very genius of the Dutch Doopsgezinde. To this Friedmann replied in a rather lengthy analysis (MQR 1954, 150 f.): It must be granted that Anabaptism would not be Anabaptism if it did not contain a certain element of spiritualism, i.e., the free working of the Holy Spirit in the understanding of the Scriptures. Without this spiritualism Anabaptism would quickly deteriorate into formalism, legalism, or antinomianism. But it leads rather to emphatic commitments, since it is never an unguided inspirationalism or illuminism (see Enthusiasts). Reference was made to Wiswedel's important study on the "Inner and Outer Word" among Anabaptists (see Bible, Inner and Outer Word), and in particular to Ulrich Stadler's beautiful tract of 1536 entitled Vom lebendigen Wort und geschriebenen (L. Müller, 212-27). But precisely these studies demonstrate convincingly the distance of such thoughts from those of the Spiritualists discussed above, German, Dutch, or English. The question was raised more than once how the Anabaptist brethren could actually know that their "spirit" was the same as the Spirit of the Scriptures and not mere imagination (Eingebungsgeist). This was the question of E. Hegenwalt in 1524 (Bender, 122), J. J. Wolleb in 1722 (Friedmann, 42 ff.), and Karl Holl in 1923 (Friedmann, 78). Obviously, no absolute proof can be given but the external results might suggest the answer: the pure church, discipleship, Gospel character of the brotherhood, versus a mildly rationally oriented conventicle or circle of like-minded friends. In the 19th century Ludwig Keller (q.v.) was in his own life a dramatic example of this shift: he began as an ardent "Anabaptist" (see Keller and the Anabaptists) mainly of the Hans Denk type, only to end as the chairman of the spiritualistic "Comenius-Gesellschaft."

Once more the tension between Anabaptism and Spiritualism becomes an urgent issue in recent studies on Pilgram Marpeck (q.v.) and his controversy with Caspar Schwenckfeld. Kiwiet, Bergsten, Klassen, and others put this controversy into the very center of their analyses. For Marpeck the "Word," as revealed in the New Testament, is the carrier of spirit and life, while for Schwenckfeld such ties are nonessential, as one may also receive the inner word without any traditional means (Kiwiet, 111). In other words, the "spirit" of the Spiritualists is not necessarily the Holy Spirit. The difference between Marpeck and Schwenckfeld becomes particularly evident in their ideas concerning the church: visible vs. invisible, discipline vs. no discipline, historical vs. timeless. Bergsten in his Marpeck study (part IV: Zusammenfassung) claims that before 1534 Anabaptism and Spiritualism were hard to distinguish (even though the line Grebel-Sattler is different from the line Denk-Hut), but after 1534 the distinction became very clear and sharp, not only sociologically as Troeltsch claimed, but also theologically (no ordinances, etc.). But Klassen holds that the separation of Anabaptism and Spiritualism occurred clearly in 1531.

Still not fully understood is the position of Hans Denk, which might be called a real borderline case. At one time he is nearer Anabaptism, while at another time he appears to be nearer or leaning toward Neoplatonic Spiritualism, although Kiwiet expressly says that he was not a Spiritualist.

The issue of Müntzer and David Joris, both of whom might better be called "inspirationalists" than Spiritualists, will not be discussed here at any length, in spite of their possible influence upon the early Anabaptists. Anabaptists at all times were cool to the idea of "direct inspiration" (Eingebungsgeist) by which these men lived and acted. Of course such a judgment is correct only as long as one adheres to the conventional definition of Anabaptism (see Anabaptist, Section 2). In any other case the situation becomes more complicated, and one might then better refer back to G. H. Williams' recent classification (see Radical Reformation). Certainly, Spiritualism and Inspirationalism are not identical phenomena (see Enthusiasts).

Letter and Spirit represent a basic tension in Christianity from its very beginning (see I Cor. 3:6), and will remain so throughout history: the Word without the Spirit is dead, but the Spirit without the Word is empty of content and without control.

Spis, Jacob Pietersz, b. in 1725, d. Dec. 13, 1810, at Hoorn, was the last untrained minister of the Mennonite congregation at Hoorn, Dutch province of North Holland. He served 1775-95 and 1802-10. In the period of the French Revolution, Spis was not a Patriot (q.v.) as were nearly all the Dutch Mennonites, but a loyal adherent of the Orange party. For this reason he was suspended from his ministry from 1795 to 1802. Spis was also the last conservative leader in Hoorn. (Naamlijst 1802, 70; 1806, 73; DJ 1941, 49-54.)

Spittellaier, Hans, early Anabaptist leader in Moravia, of whom we hear only in the Hutterite Chronicle. Neither his origin nor his end is known. He seems not to have been related to his contemporary Ambrosius Spittelmayer (q.v.); the name is Bavarian-Austrian and quite common. In 1527 Hans was ordained minister of the new Anabaptist congregation in Nikolsburg (q.v.), Moravia, which was under the leadership of Balthasar Hubmaier and protected by the two manorial lords of Nikolsburg, Hans and (his uncle) Leonhard Liechtenstein (q.v.). At the great debate of 1527 between Hubmaier and Hans Hut, Spittellaier took sides with Hubmaier, mainly by favoring the use of the sword by Christians and the paying of war taxes. When Hubmaier went to Vienna in 1528 (to be martyred eventually), Spittellaier took his place as the leader of the entire congregation. Soon this congregation grew by newcomers such as Jakob Wideman (q.v.), Philipp Plener (q.v.), and Gabriel Ascherham (q.v.). Spittellaier preached publicly the Hubmaier doctrine concerning the sword (at least that is what the Chronicle reports). Thereupon, in 1528, a large section under the leadership of Jakob Wideman separated from Spittellaier and his followers, since they could not possibly tolerate this "principle of the sword." From now on there were two "peoples" in Nikolsburg: the Stäbler (q.v.; staff bearers, more correctly bearers of canes), nonresistant and strictly pacifist, who were not willing to support war even in the face of the Turkish danger (the Turks were besieging Vienna in 1529), and the Schwertler (q.v.; sword bearers, more correctly those who tolerated the use of the sword), Spittellaier and Leonhard Liechtenstein. As the latter could not achieve a reconciliation and unification, Lord Liechtenstein expelled them from his territory. Nothing further is known of Spittellaier.

Zieglschmid, Chronik; Johann Loserth, Doctor Balthasar Hubmaier und die Anfänge der Wiedertaufe in Mähren (Brünn, 1893).

Spittelmayer (Spittellaier), Ambrosius, an early Anabaptist leader, a citizen of Linz, Upper Austria, and a university student with a good command of Latin, born c1497 in Linz where he was baptized and commissioned to preach by Hans Hut on July 25, 1527. He worked as an Anabaptist apostle in the vicinity of Linz for about two weeks after his baptism but then was forced to flee. He traveled through Augsburg, Nuremberg, Schwabach, and Gunzenhausen, preaching and baptizing, until he arrived in Erlangen, where on inquiring after Hans Nadler he was taken prisoner on Sept. 9, 1527. After his first trial he was transferred to Ansbach and on October 2 to Cadolzburg, where he was tortured and tried and finally beheaded on Feb. 6, 1528. He should not be confused with Hans Spittelman, reformer at Nikolsburg and associate of Balthasar Hubmaier.

There are five extant records (TA, 25 f.) of his answers to the questions the authorities directed to him at his trial. He wrote out his answer for the trial on October 25, and the 3,000-word document is a moving confession of his Anabaptist faith. It includes a treatment of his view of the knowledge of God, the nature of the covenant in the church, the sharing of goods and property, admonition and discipline, the seven decisions of Scripture, namely, the covenant of God, the kingdom of God, the body of Christ, the end of the world, the judgment, the resurrection, and the eternal verdict; also the person and work of Christ, discipleship and the imitation of Christ, the relationship of the Christian to the state, the significance of the Lord's Supper, the humanity of Mary, the second coming of Christ, and purgatory. A comparison of Hans Hut's answers to the same set of questions (TA, 41 f.) makes the similarity between their positions quite obvious. Spittelman's confession is particularly significant because it throws light on the teachings of Hut that are not treated as fully in Hut's own tracts and confessions. Hut's seven decisions, for example, are described in greater detail in this confession than anywhere else in the writings of Hut and his followers.

Spittelman's view of the essence of the Christian commitment and the nature of the church is illustrated by a set of five questions that penetrate progressively deeper into the implications of the Christian faith which he put to strangers while carrying on his itinerant ministry as an Anabaptist apostle: first he asked whether the individual was a Christian; secondly he inquired about the character of his life and walk as a Christian—was he a disciple? thirdly he asked what his relationship to his Christian brother was like—was he a functioning member of the church? fourthly he asked whether he shared all things with his brothers and they with him—no brother should suffer need of food or clothing; and fifthly he inquired about the practice of brotherly admonition and discipline.

Spittelman said of Christ that He was "true God and man, the head of all His members, who has erased with His suffering the eternal wrath of God that was directed against us. He has reconciled us and restored us to peace with God, and as our personal mediator His suffering and death have opened for us the kingdom of heaven from which we had fallen because of Adam." Spittelman emphasized in his confession that Christians must live, suffer, and die as Christ died for them if they want to inherit the kingdom of God.

The patient acceptance of suffering is a recurrent theme in the testimonies of Spittelman and is presented as an integral part of a life of discipleship. Whoever will not suffer with Christ will not inherit with Christ. Christians must drink the cup that He drank. If men enjoy this world and live according to the lusts of the flesh, they must suffer in the next. Disciples partake of Christ when He is spiritually conceived, born, circumcised, baptized, and preached in them. Spittelman's emphasis is on discipleship, the following of Christ, rather than on physical suffering as Thomas Müntzer and some of the earlier mystics maintained.

The covenant consists of brotherly admonition, the sharing of all things, nonresistance to evil men, and participation in baptism and the Lord's Supper. "This covenant is realized in the Spirit, in baptism, and in the drinking of the cup, which Christ has called the baptism of blood. We covenant ourselves to God to remain with Him in one love, one spirit, one faith, and one baptism and on the other hand God covenants to be our Father and to stay with us in tribulation."

Spittelman said that he was moved to accept adult baptism because he wanted to be a true and obedient Christian. Christ taught His disciples when He left them saying: Go into all the world and preach the Gospel; whoever believes and is baptized is saved. The preaching of God's Word must come before and not after baptism. Apart from voluntary faith the concept of covenant and baptism are meaningless and the disciple-church an impossibility.

In speaking of the Lord's Supper Spittelman accused the priests of a very wooden understanding of Christ's words in John 6: He who eats my flesh and drinks my blood has eternal life. One should not look at these words outwardly but rather put away the letter and seek the spirit. You eat the flesh of Christ by giving yourself here and now as a member of Christ's body. A true Christian must do everything in his spiritual Christ that Christ did visibly in the flesh. It is in this way that the Word becomes flesh and lives in a Christian. The celebration of the supper itself is to remind us of the suffering of Christ and our commitment to follow Him.

Spittelman represents a fine example of the early South German position regarding the sharing of goods. "Nobody can inherit the kingdom unless he is poor with Christ, for a Christian has nothing of his own; no place where he can lay his head. A real Christian should not even have enough property on earth to be able to stand on it with one foot. This does not mean that he should go and lie down in the woods and not have a trade, or that he should not have fields and meadows, or that he should not work, but alone that he might not think they are for his own use and be tempted to say: this house is mine, this field is mine, this dollar is mine. Rather he should say it is ours, even as we pray: Our Father. In summary, a Christian should not have anything of his own but should have all things in common with his brother, i.e., not allow him to suffer need. In other words, I will not work that my house be filled, that my larder be supplied with meat, but rather I will see that my brother has enough, for a Christian looks more to his neighbor than to himself. Whoever desires to be rich in this world, who is concerned that he miss nothing when it comes to his person and property, who is honored by men and feared by them, who refuses to prostrate himself at the feet of his Lord . . . will be humbled." This did not mean absolute propertylessness as it did later for the Hutterian Brethren.

Spittelman shared Hut's dynamic view of the apostolate. He says of his own role as an apostle:

"It is my desire to preach and baptize and lead men to accept the Christian faith; God instituted this work (the apostolate) by His Son after the resurrection." He refers to Hut as a "commissioned apostle sent from God in these last and most perilous times."

Spittelmayer interprets Christ's command as preaching the Gospel "through" the whole creation. This means that Christ has given men created things that they might use the visible to understand and explain the invisible. Christ did this when He used real water to explain what living water and eternal life are. A man's vocation or trade can become a book through which he learns to know the will of God. This is not understood to be a substitute for the written Word of God. It was through Hans Hut that this interpretation entered the Anabaptist movement.

There is nothing dangerously radical (chiliastic) about Spittelmayer's eschatology. The day and hour of Christ's reappearing is hidden from all men. The end of the world is near, the time when the world and its lusts will pass away. In the future judgment Christ will appear to judge the living and the dead, everybody reaping in eternity what he has sown in time. In the great resurrection the godless will arise to death, for they have lived and lusted here, and the godly will arise to life, for they have been dead here. The eternal verdict will seal the fate of the godless to the eternal fire that does not consume.

Spittelmayer believed that civil authority was originally instituted by God and that it was the duty of government "to judge word and deed that is directed against God." Governments had fallen from this original commission and now resembled Pilate. This does not mean that Spittelmayer advocated resistance to the authorities; on the contrary, he called for obedience. The authorities, however, did not have the right to coerce the Christian's conscience. Besides the principle of nonresistance to evil he said nothing specific about the oath and government office.

Spittelmayer, a disciple of Hans Hut, reflects a position that has much in common with Hans Schlaffer, Leonhard Schiemer, Wolfgang Brandhuber, and also later leaders of the South German Anabaptist movement like Leupold Scharnschlager and Pilgram Marpeck. H.C.K.L.

Spoelder, Cornelis (1886-1958), a Dutch Mennonite, professor of Latin and Greek and rector of the Gymnasium at Haarlem, was a man of many interests. He was prominent in sports, was a commander of the Haarlem fire brigade, and member and promoter of many associations, but most of all he was a loyal member of the Mennonite Church. Stemming from a non-Mennonite background he later joined the Haarlem Mennonite congregation, of which he was a deacon from 1945 until his death. He was 1946-55 a trustee of the ADS (q.v.) and a curator of its seminary, 1951-55 acting as its moderator. Spoelder was a beloved teacher, a man of strong faith, who sometimes as lay preacher conducted services in Mennonite congregations. vdZ.

Spring City Mennonite Brethren in Christ Church, located in Spring City, Pa., was organized in 1891 under the leadership of H. B. Musselman. In 1956 the congregation had 67 members with Earl M. Hosler serving as pastor. P.E.B.

Spring Creek Hutterite Bruderhof, of the Dariusleut (q.v.) group, at Lewistown, Mont., was founded in 1945. In 1950 its head preacher was Paul Walter.

Spring Mountain Mennonite Church (MC), located in the village of Spring Mountain within 1½ miles of the town of Schwenksville, Pa., was dedicated on July 17, 1949. On Oct. 17, 1949, Elmer M. Mack, chairman of the Franconia Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities, together with Jacob M. Moyer, bishop of the district, organized the mission group as a congregation of the Franconia Mennonite Conference. In 1955 the baptized membership was 68 with Paul L. Ruth as pastor. M.D.R.

Spring Valley Mennonite Brethren Church, located 5 miles west and 4½ miles south of Ulysses, Kan., dates back to 1927 when the first services were held in the Spring Valley School. The congregation was organized in 1928. Among the charter members were Harms, Kliever, Neufeld, Karber, and Buschman families, from Kansas and Oklahoma. The first leader was Isaac Harms. In November 1943 a meetinghouse was moved from Liberal, Kan., and dedicated. A parsonage was added in 1951. The first full-time pastor was Elmer Jantz. In 1958 the membership was 72, and the pastor John H. Flaming. J.H.F.L.

Spring Valley Mennonite Church (MC), a rural congregation, now extinct, located at Kenmare, Ward Co., N.D. In 1899 D. B. Kauffman moved from Cass Co., Mo., with team and covered wagon and homesteaded, followed in 1900 by four other families. In 1904 a congregation was organized and D. B. Kauffman ordained minister. He served until 1919. In 1905 the church was built and dedicated. In 1921 J. L. Lehman was ordained minister and served until his accidental death in 1928. Archie Kauffman was ordained minister in 1929 and served until 1936. The largest membership was 62 in 1933. Because of dry years all had moved away by 1940, and later the church building was sold. During the 35 years, 90 were baptized and received into the church. Of this number six were ordained ministers and one a bishop. F.E.K.

Spring Valley Mennonite Church (MC), located 2 miles east and 3 miles south of Canton, McPherson Co., Kan., is a member of the South Central Conference, and the oldest of the four M.C. congregations in central Kansas. It was organized by Bishop Daniel Brundage in 1873, who also organized the three other churches, viz., the Catlin Mennonite Church near Peabody in 1876, the West Liberty Mennonite Church near Inman in 1883, and the Pennsylvania Mennonite Church near Newton in 1885. Brundage also organized the Kansas-Nebraska Mennonite Conference in 1876, which later came to be the Missouri-Kansas Conference but now is called the South Central Conference. In 1957 Charles Diener was pastor, with a membership of 59. C.D.

Spring Valley Mennonite Church (GCM), formerly known as the Newport Mennonite Church, located 8 miles south of Newport, Pend Oreille Co., Wash., began in the 1920's, when Mennonites of Russian-German background settled here having come from Kansas, Oklahoma, and Texas. The church was organized in 1928. Ministers who have served are John W. Kliever, Peter D. Unruh, Rudolf Schmidt, and Rudolf Toews, who was the pastor in 1958, when the membership was 89. R.Sc.

Springdale Mennonite Church (MC), also known as Kindig's Church, located at Waynesboro, Va., a member of the Virginia Conference, built its first meetinghouse in 1825, replaced by a larger church in 1941, which seats 450. Mountain View Mennonite Church, built in 1900, and Valley View are congregations started as mission points from Springdale. East Bethel Mennonite Mission, begun in 1952, is a growing mission point. The membership of Springdale in 1957 was 217, with Paul L. Wenger as pastor. J.R.D.

Springer, Hans, an Anabaptist martyr in Iglau, Moravia. The Anabaptist movement gained adherents here very early; but through the influence of Paul Speratus (q.v.) Lutheranism predominated and Anabaptism was suppressed, especially by the Lutheran clergy, as in 1529, 1536, and 1537. The city records and council reports call the Anabaptists

"böse Buben." It was thus impossible for the Anabaptists to organize a congregation. Nevertheless there were occasionally some Anabaptists found in Iglau, and at the end of the century they apparently increased in number. Their leader and preacher was Hans Springer. The city council again took steps to suppress them. In 1592 Hans Springer was surprised in his house and "with great violence was miserably and painfully slain." The erection of the fountain on the market place (1592-94) is attributed to the Anabaptists. W.W.

Springfield, a Mennonite village name found in the Alexanderwohl settlement near Newton, Kan.; Swift Current, Sask.; and Cuauhtemoc, Mexico. (See Villages.) C.K.

Springfield Krimmer Mennonite Brethren Church, located in the western part of Marion County, 5 miles southwest of Lehigh, Kan., was organized on April 2, 1902, with David P. Schroeder as elder, ordained on Jan. 24, 1904, by Jacob A. Wiebe, the elder of the Gnadenu K.M.B. Church and founder of the K.M.B. Church. P. A. Wiebe was elected as assistant minister, and later served as elder. The Springfield community was settled in the 1870's by a dozen members of the Gnadenu Church, nine miles east, who in 1878 began to have their own worship services in their homes. As a result of two revivals soon after the organization, about 60 members were added to the church.

The church building was constructed in 1894, and, with additions made later, was still in use in 1949. A small stream fed by an incessant spring, from which the church receives its name, runs across the churchyard; in it the church has practiced immersion by kneeling and dipping forward. Communion is observed with footwashing four times a year. Most members are farmers.

Other ministers and leaders of the church have been Isbrand Harder, H. V. Wiebe, J. T. Krause, J. E. Plett, W. W. Harms, David V. Wiebe, C. F. Plett, and Franklin Wiebe, the present pastor. The membership in 1956 was 77. The first missionaries of the K.M.B. Church, P. V. and H. V. Wiebe, came from this congregation. P.V.W.

Springfield Township Chapel (MC), located one-half mile southwest of Holland, Ohio, is a mission station established in 1945. It had 40 members in 1957, with Raymond Richer as its pastor. M.G.

Springfield Mennonite Church (GCM), now extinct, 17 miles south of Hydro, Okla., began in 1898 in the home of J. J. Zerger. The first baptism of thirteen young people was conducted by J. J. Flickner. Attempts to unite with the Bergthal Mennonite Church at Hydro failed. On Sept. 13, 1899, under the leadership of Elder C. Ramseier, the church was organized. On April 19, 1900, J. J. Kaufman and J. T. Albrecht were elected ministers. Later C. P. Stucky was elected minister. The members of the church were primarily Swiss Volhynian Mennonites from Moundridge and Pretty Prairie, Kan. In 1903 a church was built. The last entry of the church record was dated Feb. 2, 1919, stating that Emil Riesen, who had been serving the church, was to issue church letters to the members and care for the few remaining families. It was decided to sell the church and to turn the income over to the Board of Missions. Most of the families had moved away and joined other churches. C.K.

Springfield Mennonite Church (GCM), located in Springfield Twp., Bucks Co., Pa. It is not known when the first meetinghouse was built, but the Mennonite settlers reached the area before the middle of the 18th century; Peter Meyer, the first known preacher, located there in 1741. The letter written by the Franconia bishops to Holland in 1773 seems to call this congregation "Term" (Durham). The second meetinghouse, "in a little grove, delightfully located on high ground, . . . a low stone building," was built in 1824 and is still standing. The names of the ministers who served at Springfield (MC) were Meyer and Moyer, Gehman, and Geisinger. The congregation divided in 1847, the deacon and part of the church following John H. Oberholtzer (q.v.) and the two preachers and the other portion of the congregation remaining in the Franconia Conference. The two groups then alternated in the use of the meetinghouse until about 1948, when the Franconia Mennonites discontinued services. In 1888 the Franconia Conference group numbered twenty; in 1936, eleven. The membership of the Eastern District Conference congregation at Springfield (GCM) was 74 in 1895; in 1936 it was 36; and in 1958 it was 44, with Robert M. Landis as pastor. J.C.W.

Springs, a town (pop. 275) near Salisbury, Pa., was built on an area originally consisting of two farms, the George Folk farm whose buildings were erected near the present J. J. Otto residence, and the Peter Bitsche farm whose buildings were erected near the present Amos J. Yoder residence. Springs is the home congregation from which all the Mennonite (MC) churches and mission points in the Casselman Valley district have been established. Sunday-school work had its beginning in 1846 in the "Red School House," on the lot now occupied by the F. W. Bender Co. store building. The town has a number of Mennonite-owned industries. It is a community for truck, dairy, and chicken farming, and is known for its good mountain air and its good water, as its name suggests. E.E.B.

Springs Mennonite Church (MC), also known as German Springs, now extinct, was located near Manchester, Okla., in the northwestern part of the state. Organized by S. C. Miller in 1895, it had 22 members in 1905, with George C. Hinkel as its minister. Its meetinghouse was built in 1894. The first minister was Simon Hetrick. It was last listed in the Yearbook of 1919, when it had 22 members, but no minister. M.G.

Springs Mennonite Church (MC), located at Springs, 4 miles west of Salisbury, Pa., a member of the Allegheny Conference, was founded in 1780. Until 1853 the congregation, known as the Society of Mennonites, met in homes for worship under Lancaster Conference. The first minister was Jakob Seiler (later Saylor), an Amishman from Germany, who had been ordained bishop to serve in the Meyersdale area. In 1853, after a period of decline, Henry H. Blauch was ordained to the ministry, and in the half century of his service the church grew from 22 members to about 250 in the Casselman Valley district. In 1859 the Mennonite Union Church, known as Keim's (q.v.), was built at St. Paul with the Lutheran and Reformed congregations. In 1874 a meeting was held here to consider the formation of the Southwestern Pennsylvania Conference, now the Allegheny Conference. In 1878 a meetinghouse was built at Springs, known first as the Folk Church. It was remodeled and enlarged in 1916 and 1925, and replaced by a new church in 1954. The product of the missionary outreach of this church are the Oak Grove, Casselman, Glade, Pinto, and Gortner Mennonite churches. Other mission points are Laughlin, turned over to the Brethren; Lageer, turned over to Glade; Bear Hill; Manadier; Fairview; Black Hawk, later called Meadow Mountain; Dry Run; Red Run; Bear Creek, and Meyersdale. The membership of the Springs congregation in 1957 was 291, with Roy Otto as bishop, and Walter Otto as pastor. E.E.B.

Springstein, Man., a town located on the Canadian Pacific railway lines southwest of Winnipeg. Here the "Midwest Properties Co., Ltd." of Minneapolis purchased a tract of land of 2,890 acres. This land was acquired by purchase in 1924 by ten Mennonite families, who had immigrated to Canada from Russia in 1923, for the sum of $240,000, without down payment, but with the obligation of delivering annually half of the harvest to the company as payment on their debt. On Oct. 14, 1923, the families had settled on this farm and helped to thresh out the 1,000 acres of wheat. The school which was opened at Springstein when these families arrived had seven pupils. Today, after 30 years, Springstein is a neat Mennonite village with 18 families. An excellent school of three classes, in which 3 teachers give instruction as far as grade 11, is probably the most valuable possession of Springstein. The teachers and the students are all children of Mennonite parents and the instruction is very closely bound with the Mennonite faith. Opposite the school stands the church (GCM), which has seating space for about 300. One mile southwest of Springstein is the Mennonite Brethren church. Mennonite farmers have bought up most of the land around Springstein.

It has not been easy to develop or even to keep the land at all. It was particularly hard during depression. The "Midwest Properties Company" reduced the purchase price to one half of the original sum, and gave the loan free of interest for 15 years. As the times improved, the financial status of the settlement also improved. W.H.E.

Springstein Mennonite Brethren Church of Springstein, Man., was organized on May 17, 1942, by members of the North End Mennonite Brethren Church of Winnipeg. The church building was erected in 1938 and enlarged in 1948. The church is a member of the Manitoba Provincial and the Canadian District M.B. conferences. In 1957 the membership was 33, with Peter P. Dueck as leading minister. H.N.E.

Springstein Mennonite Church (GCM) was organized on Oct. 17, 1938, by the 17 families of the Schoenwiese congregation who were living at Springstein, Man. The meetinghouse, recently built, 50 x 34 ft., seats 300. In 1957 the congregation had 197 baptized members, with William H. Enns as leading minister. W.H.E.

Springtown, Bucks Co., Pa., was a meetinghouse erected by the Lutherans in 1872, with the help of the Reformed and Mennonites, located only a few miles north of the Springfield Mennonite meetinghouse. Fisher (101) reports this joint effort and adds, "The Mennonites discontinued their services and consequently their rights at this point sometime in the past." The Oberholtzer group (Eastern District Conference, GCM) held the important conference meeting of May 1857, at which they acted on the Gehman schism, at Springtown. It is probable that the Mennonites in the joint effort of 1872 were of the Oberholtzer group. H.S.B.

Springvale Hutterite Bruderhof of the Dariusleut (q.v.) branch, located near Rockyford, Alberta, was founded in 1918 by the Jamesville Bruderhof in South Dakota. The preachers were Jakob Wurcz, chosen in 1913, confirmed in 1915, and Paul Hofer, chosen in 1915 and confirmed in 1921 in Canada. In 1936 the Springvale Bruderhof established Sandhill (q.v.), near Beiseker. In 1950 the Bruderhof numbered 77 baptized members. D.D.

Springville Old Order Mennonite Church (Weaverland Conference), located northeast of Lincoln, Lancaster Co., Pa., purchased a German Baptist meetinghouse, which they used until the early 1950's when the new church was built at the crossroads to the east. The membership in 1955 was 235, with the same ministers as the Meadow Valley (q.v.) O.O.M. Church. I.D.L.

Spron(c)k, a Dutch Mennonite family, in the 17th century found at Utrecht, Netherlands. Here Abraham Spronck was from about 1620 an elder of the Old Flemish Mennonite congregation, which in 1632 merged with the Flemish, and in 1639 with the High German and Frisian congregation. In all these unifications Abraham Spronck took an active part. In 1632 he signed the Dordrecht (q.v.) Confession in the name of the Utrecht congregation. He served until 1652. His son Cornelis Spronck was a deacon of the Utrecht congregation in 1661-63.

The Spronck (Sprunck) family in West and East Prussia was apparently a collateral branch of this same family. It was found in Danzig both in the Flemish and Frisian congregations, from 1678 and 1685 respectively. As early as 1618 a Cornelius Sprunck is named, a farmer at Altebabke, West Prussia. Hans Sprung rented the "Schlossbrennerei" (distillery) at Tiegenhof (q.v.) in 1664. Johan Peter Sprunck (q.v.) moved from Danzig to Königsberg in East Prussia in 1716. The following members of the family were living in Königsberg in the 18th century: Abraham Jansz, distiller; Bernhard (or Peter Bernhard), distiller; Heinrich, wholesale dealer; and Isaac. Wilhelm Sprunck (1795-1871) was the owner of the famous distillery "Bunte Bock" at Memel, East Prussia. Hermann Sprunck was a preacher of the Heubuden (q.v.) congregation in West Prussia in 1869-95(?). vdZ.

Spruce Mountain Mennonite (MC) outpost, located in Pendleton County, on the eastern slope of the Allegheny Mountain six miles southwest of Onego, W. Va. R. H. Benner (MC) responded to a call to preach here in the 1920's. Summer Bible schools and revival meetings were introduced in the 1930's. Since then the membership has declined; the young people have moved out. Only a few small families remain. Services are still held twice a month in a schoolhouse. The membership in 1958 was 5, with Earl J. Hartzler serving as pastor, under the Virginia Mennonite (MC) Conference. H.A.B.

Sprunck (Sprunk, Sprung, Spronck), Johan Peter (Jan Pieters) (d. 1753), a resident of Danzig, West Prussia, moved to Königsberg (q.v.), East Prussia, in 1716, where he in 1717 obtained a license to distill rye brandy "nach Danziger Art." Sprunck also organized the small group of Mennonite immigrants then living in Königsberg into a Mennonite congregation; he became the elder of this "Clercksche" (q.v.) congregation in 1727. He was also watchful of the interests of a group of Mennonite farmers in the Tilsit Niederung (Lowlands), however with little result, because they were expelled by the King of Prussia in 1723. In 1732 the Mennonites of Königsberg were also forced to leave the city; Sprunck and others moved to Danzig, but soon obtained permission to return to Königsberg. This and a number of particulars concerning the Mennonites of Königsberg are found in some letters sent by Sprunck to the Dutch Mennonite Committee of Foreign Needs at Amsterdam. One of these letters contains the information that he personally paid the rent for the room used as a meeting place, and for the purchase of a pulpit, benches, and chairs. This indicates that he was well-to-do. He fell into discord with Jan Bruinvisch (q.v.), a Mennonite from Holland who had established a warehouse at Königsberg and who was also an agent of the Dutch Committee of Foreign Needs. Bruinvisch, a member of the Königsberg congregation, was reprimanded by Sprunck for marrying outside the church. Sprunck seems to have been very active, with a great love for the church, but was not free of a certain presumption and ambition; this and a tendency toward the more liberal Collegiant (q.v.) views, of which he was accused, caused his dismissal from the eldership in 1743. Peter (Pieter) Sprunck, probably his son, was the elder of the Königsberg congregation 1758-68.

Sprunger, a Mennonite family name, the origin of which is not known. Records show that in the 18th century families by the name of Sprunger were citizens of Sarmenstorf in Aargau, and Oberwangen in Thurgau, Switzerland. The Mennonite Sprungers in America trace their ancestry to the Thurgau branch, though when asked they invariably say their forebears came from the canton of Bern. During the religious persecutions one Jacob Sprunger fled from the canton of Thurgau about 1741 and found haven on the Jura Mountains. Jacob had one son, Peter, and three daughters. Though Peter was confirmed in the Reformed Church he eventually joined the Mennonite Church, where later he was elected to the ministry. Peter had four sons and two daughters. In 1852 a group of some 70 left the Jura region and came to America. Most of them were of this Peter Sprunger family and its relation by marriage. It was this group of Sprungers that formed the nucleus of the Mennonite community in Berne, Ind. Some 35 years later S. F. Sprunger (grandson of Peter), wishing to acquaint Peter's descendants with their ancestry, with the help of his cousin Abraham J. Sprunger compiled and edited a genealogy, Geschlechts- und Namen-Register der Familie Sprunger (Berne, 1890). E.S.

Sprunger, John A. (1852-1911), a Mennonite (GCM) evangelist and publisher, was born Aug. 12, 1852, on Münsterberg, Switzerland, a son of Abraham B. and Elizabeth Zürcher-Sprunger. In 1854 the family came to America and settled in Allen County, Ind., in what is now Berne. His formal education consisted of several winter terms in the district school and a short term in the Mennonite school at Wadsworth, Ohio. He was eager to learn and had a good working knowledge of both English and German. As a young man he took active part in church activities, but his interests were rather centered on business affairs. In fact, he became the outstanding early promoter of Berne. He originated or took a prominent part in more business enterprises and built more homes in Berne than any other man, and became wealthy. On Feb. 15, 1880, he married Katharine, a daughter of Peter and Elizabeth Sprunger-Sprunger. In 1888, after the death of his only child, Sprunger resolved to devote his life to Christian work, and devoted his considerable wealth to the cause of Christ. He conducted a few home mission tours in this country. Then he and his wife spent about a year (1889) in Switzerland in successful evangelism, which led to a permanent revival, especially among the Jura Mennonite churches, including Sonnenberg. While there he was ordained to the ministry. Sprunger founded the Light and Hope Missionary Society in 1893, which established the Light and Hope Orphanage (q.v.) in Berne on April 1, 1893. Sprunger also established a deaconess training school in connection with the missionary society, and made the orphanage the headquarters of all these activities. About 1898 he established the Light and Hope Publishing Co. (q.v.) at Berne, which published the monthly journal Licht und Hoffnung (q.v.), started in 1893, and its English counterpart Light and Hope. Among the workers in the print shop and orphanage in Berne were William Egle, H. C. Barthel, and John Horsch. Sprunger was strongly influenced by the Christian and Missionary Alliance. Although he worked very closely with the founders of the Missionary Church Association (q.v.) for a time, he never fully joined the group.

In 1902 Sprunger moved the orphanage, print shop, and publishing company to Cleveland, Ohio, and soon to Birmingham near Cleveland. Here H. J. Dyck joined the group of workers. Here also Sprunger died Sept. 28, 1911. He was buried at Berne, where his cousin S. F. Sprunger preached the funeral sermon. He was the author of several books, including a 2-volume work, The Gospel in Types, and Outline of Prophecy, and in German, Ein Blick in die prophetische Zukunft (Berne, c1900), Leben und volle Genüge (Berne, n.d.), and Volles Heil (Berne, n.d.). With H. J. Dyck he edited two hymnals: Himmels-Harfe für Sonntag-Schulen, Jugendvereine und Evangelisations-Versammlungen (Birmingham, Ohio, c1907), and Lieder-Auswahl aus Himmels-Harfe (Birmingham, c1907). H.S.B.

Sprunger, Samuel Ferdinand (1848-1923), the son of Abraham and Magdalena (Rüfenacht) Sprunger, was born on the Münsterberg in the Bernese Jura of Switzerland, Oct. 19, 1848. His mother died when he was but fifteen months old leaving him, as the youngest of the family, with two other brothers and three sisters from a previous marriage, to the care of their father. In the spring of 1852 the family crossed the Atlantic and settled in Adams County, Ind. Here "S.F." grew to maturity and on Oct. 2, 1872, married Katherina Luginbill. To them there were born ten children—three sons and seven daughters. He died, after a lingering illness, on Nov. 16, 1923; interment was in the Berne cemetery.

"Sammie," as he was called in the early years, spent only five short terms in country school before the age of twenty. He joined the church by baptism on April 14, 1865, at the age of seventeen. Three years later, on Aug. 23, 1868, one of seventeen candidates, he was chosen by lot for the ministry and immediately ordained. His ordination as elder occurred several years later, on March 5, 1874, Christian Krehbiel officiating. In the meantime he had spent three school years at the new Mennonite educational institute just opened at Wadsworth, Ohio, and was graduated in the first class in the spring of 1871. With the Wadsworth emphasis on Sunday schools, missions, and heartfelt religion, he returned home to resume the ministry and became the center of disagreement and division regarding new methods of work. Through patience and wise conduct and a deeply spiritual ministry, the differing groups were in 15 years brought into a single unified congregation which became the largest in the General Conference Mennonite Church. His 33 years of active leadership of the Berne church (1871-1903) not only brought unity but introduced a new spirit into the congregation's life with a strong emphasis on inner religion, evangelical activities, and practical Christian service. Organizations for Sunday school, missions, higher education, young people's work, and temperance were actively promoted by him in the church and town.

In 1884 Sprunger's name was incorporated in the firm name of Welty and Sprunger, which became the publishing agent for the General Conference Mennonite Book Concern. In this connection he served as Business Manager of the Publication Board of the Conference 1884-90. He also served as editor of the German Sunday School Quarterly 1889-1920, and editor of the Bundesbote Kalender 1886-1922. Upon the organization of the Middle District Conference in 1888 he became its first president, continuing until 1895 and serving again in 1897 and 1898. Sprunger first attended the triennial General Conference as a delegate in 1872, and attended every one thereafter until 1911. He served the General Conference on committees in connection with the Wadsworth school in 1872, 1875, 1876, and in its closing year in 1878. He was a member of the Foreign Mission Board for 25 years (1884-87, 1896-1917), of the Publication Board 10 years (1884-93), of the Home Mission Board 3 years (1893-96), and was one of the General Conference trustees in 1887 and again 1893-1914. He also served as traveling minister (Reiseprediger) for the General Conference and was active in visiting churches, assisting in their organization, and, especially among the Swiss churches, in drawing them into conference connection.

Samuel F. Sprunger is described as a man of deep consecration, good judgment, unshakable conviction, remarkable organizing and executive ability, and prodigious memory. He was not too approachable in the intimate personal and pastoral relations, but was unusually strong in the pulpit and as a leader in church and social life. Probably no one was more highly respected in the history of his own congregation nor more influential among the 19th-century Swiss Mennonite immigrants of Ohio and Indiana.

Sprunger edited a collection of Mennonite sermons from Europe and the United States under the title Festklänge, Predigten von Mennoniten-Predigern aus den Vereinigten Staaten, Russland, Deutschland, Pfalz, Baiern und der Schweiz (Berne, 1891).

Spruyt, David, a physician, married to Janneke Bartels, was a preacher of the Lamist congregation at Amsterdam, Holland, in 1648-79. He was a man of liberal opinions, wholeheartedly embracing Collegiant (q.v.) views, and a fervent adherent of his co-preacher Galenus (q.v.) Abrahamsz. Though he could not measure up to Galenus either in firmness of faith or in intelligence, it was Spruyt who by his perfectionism (q.v.; the doctrine that man can completely fulfill the commands of God) initiated the Lammerenkrigh (q.v.), which in 1664 divided the church into the more progressive Lamists (q.v.) and the conservative Zonists (q.v.). His brother Willem Spruyt became a deacon of the same congregation in 1662. vdZ.

Ssadovoye, an unfortunate Mennonite settlement in the Russian province of Voronesh, east of the Bichug River. In 1909 a company of 50 Mennonites bought for 1,350,000 rubles the estate Ssadovoye with over 13,000 acres of land and a sugar refinery. Forty-three families with about 280 souls settled here in the spring of 1910. Eighteen of them founded the village of Vassilyevka, and the rest settled on individual farms. Poor crops made it impossible to pay more than the interest in the first year, and less than that in the second. The premature winter of 1912 destroyed the entire beet crop. The settlers were bankrupt and had to sell the estate at great sacrifice, losing all they had. In the fall of 1913 all left Ssadovoye. J.N.

Ssvorovka, a Mennonite settlement in North Caucasasia in the province of Stavropol. It was a daughter colony sponsored by the Zagradovka, Kuban, and other settlements. Two villages were founded, Nikolaifeld in 1894, and Grossfürstental in 1899, a subsidiary of the Mennonite Brethren Church of the Kuban. Later they also built Lavarov and Arrival. At the time of the settlement there were 89 families with about 500 persons and some 100,000 acres of land. The statistics of 1925 indicated a population of 1,000 with an average of about 22 acres each. Th.B.

Staal, Abraham, b. 1752 at Gouda, d. 18 ? was trained for the ministry at the Amsterdam Mennonite seminary and served as Mennonite pastor at Goes 1779-87, Bolsward 1787-88, and Leeuwarden 1788-98. Particularly after 1795 Staal, an ardent Patriot and admirer of the principles of the French Revolution, engaged in politics and became a member of the provincial government of Friesland in 1796 and soon after a judge in the provincial court. Having been temporarily suspended in 1797 because of his political activity, he resigned in 1798. In 1794 Staal insisted on the establishment of a foundation for pensioning the widows of Mennonite ministers in Friesland; it was, however, not established until 1804. vdZ.

Staal, Pieter, a Dutch Mennonite preacher, born at Gouda, who after studying at the Mennonite seminary in Amsterdam served as preacher in the Mennonite congregation of Burtscheid-Vaals and Maastricht 1747-68, living at Burtscheid (q.v.). In 1768 he moved to Maastricht (q.v.); this was such a disappointment for the members living in Burtscheid and Vaals, that they resolved to dismiss Staal and to call another preacher to serve only in Vaals and Burtscheid. Staal now served the Maastricht congregation until 1787, in which year he retired because of bad health. The years of birth and death are not known. Apparently he was an uncle of Abraham Staal (q.v.). (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2077-81.)

Stäbler (bearers of the staff, i.e., instead of the sword), the name given to the completely nonresistant party of Anabaptists at Nikolsburg (q.v.), led by Jacob Widemann and Philip Jäger, in contradistinction to the party of Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.) who defended the use of the sword under certain circumstances as well as the payment of war taxes. The Hubmaier party was called the "Schwerdtler" (q.v.). The Stäbler became the Hutterites, while the Hubmaier party died out by 1529. As late as 1576 Caspar Franck's Catalogus Haereticorum (Ingolstadt) lists the Stäbler as follows: "Stäbler teach that a Christian cannot with a clear conscience and according to the Word of God bear a sword or wage war, but shall let a staff suffice. They are usually reckoned among the Anabaptists, who arose in our time." This does not necessarily mean that they were still in existence in 1576. The Hutterite Chronik (Zieglschmid, 86) attributes the name Stäbler to Hans Spittelmair's (q.v.) action.
H.S.B.

Stadler, Ulrich (d. 1540), a Hutterite leader, one of the strongest personalities of the first generation of Anabaptism, next to Riedemann the best theological thinker of the Moravian groups, a man of stern conceptions of true discipleship. He was born in Brixen (q.v.), Tirol, and became a mining official in Sterzing (q.v.). In the early 1520's he turned Lutheran, but soon joined the Anabaptists of Sterzing. When persecution became unbearable, he moved to Moravia (date not known). At first he became a member of the Austerlitz (q.v.) Bruderhof, which (when a group of Tiroleans left it for Auspitz) came under the leadership of Jakob Wideman (q.v.) in 1531. In 1535, when persecution also set in in Moravia, Stadler and his co-worker Leonhard Lochmaier (q.v.), together with a group of Austerlitz brethren, sought refuge in Poland (q.v.). Two Bruderhofs were established there under his supervision in 1535-37: in Lodomir in Podolia (south of Volhynia) near the Galician border and in Krasnikow (in the sources Krasnicktau) in Lodomeria, then a small independent principality in the Volhynian area. A letter "To the Authorities, in Poland" shows that he encountered much tribulation here too, in spite of the renowned tolerance of Polish nobles. In 1537, when persecution in Moravia had ceased, he and Lochmaier returned there with about one hundred persons, surviving many dangers on this return march. In Bucovic (q.v.), east of Austerlitz, he established a Bruderhof of his own. At that time Hans Amon (q.v.) was the Vorsteher of the Hutterites and their only leader; Stadler visited him and after long talks organically joined the Hutterite brotherhood. He then served as the Vorsteher of the Bucovic Hutterite settlement 1537-d.40.

Stadler's numerous writings can be found in many Hutterite codices both in Europe and in America.

Their numbering is difficult since pieces are put together or separated as the copyist felt moved. Here is the list as complete as possible:

(1) Vom lebendigen Wort und geschriebenen, ein kurzer Unterschied und Bericht (Lydia Müller, Glaubenszeugnisse I, 212-15). (2) Eingang ins Christentum, written in the form of an epistle: "Unsere herzlichen Brüdern und Geschwisterten, wo sie seind nach Gottes Willen, zu Handen" (Glaubenszeugnisse I, shortened, 227-28; Alker in ARG 1955, 233-36, complete). (3) Was der Tauff sei . . . auch vom Bundt unsres Herrn Jesu Christo mit seiner Braut. (4) Gott der gnädige und langmütige Vater . . . (only in the codex of Vienna, fol. 1-14).

Two church regulations: (5) Eine liebe Unterrihtung Ulrich Stadlers der Sünden halben, auch des Ausschlusses und wie er darin steht, auch der Gemeinschaft der Güter halben (Glaubenszeugnisse I, 215-27). (The last part of this piece, called "Von der Ordnung der Heiligen in ihrer Gemeinschaft und Leben mit den Gütern ihres Vaters allhie," was published twice: in Glaubenszeugnisse I, 222-27, and in Wolkan, Die Huterer, 153-60.) (6) Was die Gemeinschaft Christi heisst in seinem Leib und Blut, eine Ordnung im Haus Gottes (found only in manuscript copies in Canada). This piece contains also a section: Vom ehelichen Stande—sechs Artikel (to be published in Glaubenszeugnisse II).

(7) Four epistles "geschrieben von Lodomir in Podolien gen Krasnicktau auf Grenz Polen": (a) An den Bruder Michael, von der Erbsünde, ein kurzer und doch gründlicher Bericht (Glaubenszeugnisse I, 228-32). (b) Ein ander Sendbrief über die Erbsünde, Red und Widerred (ibid., 233). (c) Ein Sendbrief den Fremdlingen und Bilgramen gen Crasnicktau in Polln, am Lichtmess 1536 (February 2) (ibid., 235 f.). (d) Ein kurzer Mahnbrief (found only in Canadian copies).

Stadler's Teachings: (A) Theological Issues: (1) Original Sin. Stadler is one of the very few Anabaptists ever to discuss this doctrine. He knows that the term itself cannot be found in the Scriptures. Although he strongly pleads for a life of purity ("Be pure as newborn babes," I Peter 2:2), he condemns those who think that life without sin is possible. Man, however, can fight the tendencies toward sin, if only he allows the spirit to dominate and to discipline the flesh. Tribulations are the disciple's way to this end. "Whatever does not come out of faith, is sin." (For further details see Original Sin.)

(2) Inner and Outer Word. Stadler might be called the foremost authority on this central issue of early Anabaptism, having written a special tract on this subject (item 1 above). One might call his position "Biblical Spiritualism," something distinctly different from both "pure" Spiritualism (q.v.) and later legalism. Also in his second tract above he stresses the primacy of the inwardness of Christ in the believer (Alker's text, 235). For a full exposition of Stadler's understanding of this point, see Bible, Inner and Outer Word.

(B) The Church: (1) Community of Goods. Stadler's tract "Von der Ordnung der Heiligen" (above 5) might be regarded as the classical expression of this idea of full Christian sharing in the brotherhood-church. It is an original contribution of high spirituality, quite independent of Jacob Hutter's teaching on that point. Stadler's main argument here is the idea of Gelassenheit (q.v.), a term more often used by him than by any other Anabaptist (except perhaps Haffner, q.v.). Of a true disciple of Christ he expects a "free, detached, resigned heart," which had died to the world and is dedicated alone to the Lord and the brethren (Glaubenszeugnisse I, 225 f.). That a life of that kind needs rigid discipline he stresses time and again, quite in accord with his idea of purity and fighting sin.

(2) The functions of the "Servant of the Lord" (Diener des Herren), Stadler's term for "Vorstehrer" or "bishop." The classical exposition of his concept of such a leader and shepherd is found in his paragraph concerning excommunication (Ausschluss, in Glaubenszeugnisse I, 220-21): "The servant ought to have the power to punish all self-willed, disobedient members." One gets the strong impression that his conception of leadership approximates that of a prior or abbot of a medieval monastery. His ascetic ideals fairly correspond to such a life, with the exception of

(3) Married Life. Few Anabaptists have dealt more often and more thoroughly with this theme than Stadler. In his tract Vom ehelichen Stande—six articles (to be published in Glaubenszeugnisse II) he begins with the motto: "Whoever lacks the gift of chastity [meaning the ability to stand life-long celibacy] ought to marry according to the will of God." Somewhere else he states that "God will wink at our marital work (Gott aber sihet durch die finger umb unsers zerstörlichen leibs willen im ehelichen werk) . . . for the sake of the children, and He will not count it against us, if it is performed in the fear of the Lord" (Glaubenszeugnisse I, 228)—a typically puritanical thought. In two of his epistles he elaborates further on this topic, which certainly was a foremost one in a brotherhood-church as strict as the Hutterites (see Marriage, Hutterite).

(4) Finally the over-all ordering of the church, the church discipline or regulation, again a major concern for a leader of Stadler's stature. We know two such Gemeindeordnungen from his pen (items 5 and 6, the latter still unpublished), forerunners of Riedemann's much larger work of 1541 (see Rechen-schaft). No details can be offered here; that he sets an ascetic ideal as his model goes almost without saying. A man who wants to discipline his flesh has, of course, not too much appreciation of "Geschleck und gute bitten und trünklein" (delicacies and a good drink, Glaubenszeugnisse I, 219). But no work should ever be construed as proof of sinlessness. In all our doings we are always under temptation and must never slacken in our "good fight." If we continue in it, however, we may eventually be saved from "eternal death."

No other Hutterite brother is known to have expressed so radical a viewpoint as Stadler. The numerous copies, however, of his writings prove the high regard for teachings of this kind, which later Hutterites called "sharp preaching" (see Sermons, Hutterite). R.F.

Stadnitski, a former Dutch Mennonite family, found from about 1700 particularly at Amsterdam, where they were members of the Lamist congregation, Jan Stadnitski being a deacon in 1734-40 and 1752-57. In the 18th century members of this family conducted a big business under different names (Handelshuis Stadnitski en Zoon; later, Stadnitski en Cuperus; about 1800, Stadnitski en van Heukelom), trading with Germany, Switzerland, Spain, and the Caribbean islands and equipping ships. They were also bankers. vDZ.

Stadskanaal, a village in the Dutch province of Groningen, is the seat of a Mennonite congregation founded in 1848 with 13 members. At first it was combined with Veendam (q.v.), but by 1850 it was independent. In that year the present meetinghouse was built. An organ was installed in 1904. The baptized membership numbered 32 in 1852, 56 in 1861, 106 in 1900, and 82 in 1958. Its first preacher was L. F. Goting Vinnis, serving here 1852-55; he was followed by A. S. Hoitsema 1856-98, J. Wuite 1898-1903, and J. J. Heep 1904-13. After a few years of vacancy, it was served in 1917-50 by the pastors of Assen (q.v.). Since 1952 Miss H. G. Zijlstra has been the pastor of Stadskanaal. There is a Sunday school for children and a ladies' circle. Some members of the Panman (q.v.) family living at Stadskanaal have served the congregation well. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, Nos. 2248-51; DJ 1850, 55, 60-62.) vDZ.

Staffelstein, Georg von, an Anabaptist elder, active at Heerenhof near Schmalkalden, Germany, in 1530.

Stähelin, Rudolf (1811-1900), a Swiss Protestant historian, professor of theology at the University of Basel. His most important work, Huldreich Zwingli (1895 and 1897), presents the beginnings of the Anabaptist movement in Zürich and in Switzerland; it is a very valuable book. Other works of particular interest to Mennonites are Die ersten Märtyrer des evangelischen Glaubens in der Schweiz (1883), his treatise on Vadian in Beiträge zur vaterländischen Geschichte (Basel, 1882), Das theologische Lebenswerk Johann Oekolampads (Leipzig, 1939), and Briefe und Akten zum Leben Oekolampads I und II (Leipzig, 1927-34). Stahl, a Hutterite family name, occurring the first time in 1663, when Johannes Stahl was taken away as a prisoner from Zobelhof, Hungary, by attacking Turks and Tatars; he never returned to the brotherhood. Since then this name has always been found among the Hutterian Brethren, in Hungary, Transylvania, Rumania, and Russia, from where this family immigrated to America with the Hutterian Brethren in 1874, and is also found on the Bruderhofs in South Dakota, Montana, Manitoba, and Alberta. D.D.

Stahl, Michael, chosen to the Hutterian Brethren ministry May 8 and confirmed June 22, 1865, in Russia. He was chosen elder on Oct. 21, 1867, and confirmed on the following day by Peter Wedel, an elder from Alexanderwohl. He died Dec. 29, 1900, in the Tschetter Bruderhof in South Dakota, having served in the ministry thirty-five years. D.D.

Stahl Mennonite Church (MC), located 6 miles south of Johnstown, Pa., a member of the Allegheny Conference, had its first meetinghouse erected in 1882, called "Stahl" because the land was donated by John Stahl. Its first minister, Levi A. Blough, was ordained in 1890. The point at which it can be considered a separately organized congregation is difficult to determine. The conference minutes speak of a "Johnstown congregation" as late as 1896, although there were at that time four meetinghouses (Blough-1836, Weaver-1855, Thomas-1874, and Stahl-1882), and not until 1900 was mention made of 5 "congregations" or meetinghouses in the Johnstown district (Elton was added in 1899), with a total membership of 487. The first Mennonite Yearbook and Directory (1905) lists Stahl with 176 members and S. G. Shetler (ord. 1897) and S. D. Yoder as ministers. Down to c1940 all the congregations of the Johnstown district had one bishop. Stahl was S. G. Shetler's home congregation, and it was in its meetinghouse that he established (1922) and for many years (1925-35) served as principal of the Johnstown Bible School. Near the church the Johnstown Mennonite School was established in 1944, offering elementary and high-school work. In 1957 the Stahl congregation had a membership of 154, with Sanford G. Shetler as pastor and bishop (ord. 1952). H.S.B.

Stähli (Stahly), a Mennonite family of Swiss descent. Heini Stähli, of Seehof, then belonging to the Catholic bishopric of Basel, Switzerland, was imprisoned in 1622 because of his Mennonite convictions. After 1670 some Stählis moved to the Palatinate, Germany, and among the Swiss emigrants moving to the Netherlands in 1711 there was a Jacob Stähly (b. c1676), of Hilterfingen in the area of Thun. His son Jacob Stähly was an elder of the Swiss congregation at Kampen (q.v.), Holland, in 1736-57. The Stählis usually belonged to the Amish branch. Apparently the first of this family to emigrate to America were the brothers Johann and Jakob Stähli, of the Palatinate, who went to Ohio in 1829, and ten years later to Elkhart, Ind. vDZ.

Stahlville Hutterian Bruderhof, near Rockyford, Alberta, was founded in 1918 by the brotherhood of Lewistown, Mont. Their preachers in 1947 were Johann Stahl, chosen in Montana in 1917 and confirmed in Canada in 1924, David Waldner, chosen in 1933 and confirmed in 1938, and Elias Stahl, chosen in 1944. In 1950 this Bruderhof, belonging to the Dariusleut (q.v.), numbered 75 baptized members. D.D.

Stamperius, Abraham, a Reformed pastor of Sommeldijk, Dutch province of South Holland, engaged in a public debate with the Mennonite elder François de Knuyt (q.v.) in 1617 concerning the Scripturalness of infant baptism. Stamperius published an account of this dispute entitled Waerachtigh Verhael van't Gespreck ghehouden tot Somelsdijck . . .. De Knuyt answered with a refutation Verantwoordinghe (1617). Stand-Off Colony, near Macleod in southern Alberta, a Bruderhof of the Hutterite kinship group known as Dariusleut (q.v.), was founded in 1918 as the first Hutterite colony in Alberta and in Canada, the land having been bought on May 12, 1918. It was a transfer of the Spink County (S.D.) Bruderhof which had been founded in 1905 from the Wolf Creek (S.D.) Bruderhof. Its founder was the noted Elder Elias Walter, Jr. (q.v.), who had been chosen elder (and thus head of the Dariusleut) in 1903 at Wolf Creek Bruderhof, a post which he held till his death on Jan. 1, 1938. Walter's unusual historical sense and great energy led him to edit or sponsor several publications, a number of which after 1923 bore the publication place "Stand-Off Colony bei Macleod Alberta." The first to carry this legend was Rudolf Wolkan's edition of the Geschicht-Buch, printed at Vienna in 1923. The first edition of the small hymnal (Gesangbüchlein) compiled by Walter was published at Scottdale, Pa., but the second (1930) was published at Stand-Off Colony. Stand-Off Colony operated a bookbindery on behalf of all the colonies, hence was a logical place of publication in addition to the fact that it was the residence of the head of the Dariusleut. It was to the Stand-Off Colony also that Eberhard Arnold, the founder of the New Hutterites (Society of Brethren), came from the Rhönbruderhof in Germany in 1930 to be ordained as a Hutterite minister by Elias Walter. Two daughter colonies have been established by Stand-Off, Granum (Alberta) in 1929, and Riverside (Alberta) in 1939. Elias Walter, Jr., was elected elder of the Dariusleut at Stand-Off in 1928, which office he filled until his death there in 1938. His son Jacob Walter, who follows in his grandfather's steps in historical interest, was elected preacher in 1939 and has since then been the leader of the Bruderhof. In 1958 the population was 88. Staneke, Johannes Pieter (c1747-Jan. 17, 1808), the son of Reformed parents, reared in the Amsterdam city orphanage, joined the Amsterdam Zonist (q.v.) congregation and served as a (untrained) preacher at Middelie 1768-77, Den Burg 1777-90, and Enkhuizen 1790-1806. Descendants of his are still found in the Mennonite Church of Rotterdam. (Naamlijst 1808, 67 f.) vDZ.

Stanislaus II, August, the last king of Poland (1764-95), on Dec. 20, 1764, confirmed all former privileges (q.v.) to the Mennonites of Elbing, Marienburg, Bärwalde, and Tigenhof.

Stanley Old Order Mennonite Church in Huron County, Ont. This area borders the east shore of Lake Huron directly north of Hay Township and Zurich. The Steckle families and a few others living in this area held to the Old Order group following the division of 1889 in Ontario. Worship has been held in the homes. Visiting ministers from Waterloo County have served the worshippers. In 1955 two families remained, one with the Markham Wisler group, the other with the Waterloo Woolwich Old Order congregation. Stapel, Claes, a Remonstrant (q.v.) public notary at Hoorn, Holland, and leader of the "college" (see Collegiants) in his home town, compiled a hymnal, Lusthof der Zielen (Pleasure Garden of the Soul), of which there were at least seven editions: 1st, Alkmaar 1681; 2d, Harlingen 1686, supplemented by an "Achterhofje" (i.e., Back Garden); 3d, enlarged, Rotterdam 1692; 4th, enlarged, Rotterdam 1697; 5th, Amsterdam 1713; 6th, Amsterdam 1726; 7th, Amsterdam 1743. All editions but one are without notes. It contains 300 hymns in its first edition; the supplement has 80; the 7th edition numbers 461 hymns. The hymns are partly borrowed from older songbooks, but there are also a large number of hymns composed by contemporaries of the editor—12 by Stapel himself, others by Jan Luyken (q.v.), Hugo de Groot, Jodocus van Lodensteyn (q.v.), and many well-known Collegiants, e.g., Adam Boreel, Barend Joosten Stol, Johannes Bredenburg, and Frans Kuyper. Mennonite authors of hymns found in this hymnal are Menno Simons, the martyr Joos de Tollenaar, Claes Claesz, T. J. van Braght, Pieter Pietersz, Galenus Abrahamsz, and others.

The Lusthof der Zielen was undoubtedly the most popular of the numerous Dutch hymnbooks. It was used not only in the Collegiant meetings, but also in many Mennonite congregations; it was used at Grouw, Friesland, until the early 19th century. Marten Schagen listed it among the Mennonite books, but this is wrong. The later Dutch Mennonite hymnals, including the present Doopsgezinde Bundel (q.v.), contain hymns borrowed from Stapel's Lusthof.

In 1672 Stapel wrote a booklet in which he defended the necessity of Christian baptism against the Socinian Frans (de) Kuyper. Though not a Mennonite, Stapel was on friendly terms with many well-known Mennonites of his time. In a letter to him, Een brief van Dr Galenus Abrahamsz, seer nut en stichtelijck in dese tijdt om gelesen en betracht te werden (Alkmaar, 1677), Galenus (q.v.) Abrahamsz states that salvation rests entirely on the true following of Christ, which was also Stapel's main idea.

H. W. Meihuizen is of the opinion that Stapel may have been the author of the book Klaar Vertoog (n.p., 1689), which defended Foecke Floris (q.v.) against the indictments of F. Elgersma, and which was formerly generally ascribed to Galenus Abrahamsz.

Stapel, who always stressed the great importance of Christian morals, particularly of sobriety and mercy, left behind a fine memorial by founding the Stapelshofje (home for aged women) at Hoorn, in which act of charity he was supported by two other Collegiants, one Mennonite and one Reformed.

Stapper, Pieter Jansz (d. 1693), was an elder of the Waterlander congregation of Wormer-Jisp, Dutch province of North Holland. Like many Waterlander ministers in North Holland, Stapper was averse to the progressive Collegiant (q.v.) ideas which were at this time very influential among the Dutch Mennonites, affecting both their way of thinking and their practice. He induced his own congregation and some others to join the conservative Zonists (q.v.). He tried—and not in vain—to maintain the authority of the old Mennonite confessions of faith in the Waterlander congregations, in this point co-operating with Engel Arents van Dooregeest (q.v.), an influential Waterlander leader. He and van Dooregeest, Jacob Jansz Mol (q.v.), and others settled a quarrel which had arisen in the Wormerveer Waterlander congregation concerning the authority of the confessions.

Stapper is particularly known for his initiative in drawing up a schedule according to which Waterlander preachers were to conduct regular services in the many vacant Waterlander pulpits. (Inv. Arch. Amst. I, Nos. 900-5; DB 1872, 55, 67 f.) vdZ.

Staprade (Stapraet), Hermann, a "Wassenberg Predikant," born at Mörs, Lower Rhine, Germany, where he was very likely a priest. In 1533 he reached Münster, where he was connected with the St. Lambert Church and joined Henrik Rol and Bernhard Rothmann (q.v.). He promoted the Reformation and was one of the first to attack infant baptism, and was criticized for this by the city of Münster. In response to a statement from Marburg in this matter he and his associates gave in writing their reasons for denouncing infant baptism. On Sept. 7, 1533, Staprade refused to baptize children. It is likely that he had to leave the city because of this. However, on Jan. 5, 1534, he was in Münster and was baptized by the Anabaptist leaders. Little is known about his later fate. C.K.

Starck, Johann August (1741-1816), chaplain at the court in Darmstadt, Germany, author of the Geschichte der Taufe und Taufgesinnten (Leipzig, 1789). Starck wrote his book in 1785 before being attacked by the rationalists as a secret Catholic and Jesuit, but points out that the book itself refutes such an aspersion because it claims to show that the Anabaptists (terrible "Schwärmer") arose because of Catholic errors and abuses.

The contents of the 438 pages fall into four parts: (1) A history of the concepts of baptism from the New Testament to the Reformation, pp. 1-131. (2) A history of the Anabaptists to Münster, pp. 132-258, which devotes 23 pages to Müntzer, the Zwickau prophets, and Carlstadt, and claims that Müntzer, transmitted Anabaptist ideas to Hubmaier, Manz, Grebel, and Reublin at Waldshut on his personal visit there, and then treats the Peasants' War. The history of Anabaptism in Switzerland occupies pp. 167-219, followed by the Münsterite story on pp. 219-58. (3) Anabaptism after Münster, pp. 259-391. This last section includes the English Baptists, and the Dutch Remonstrants and Collegiants. (4) A final "Beschluss," pp. 392-438, gives a summary of Anabaptist principles, and a complete(?) list of all Mennonite congregations in Europe and Pennsylvania.

The sources upon which Starck chiefly depends are Bullinger's writings, Ottius' Annales, Füssli's Beyträge, Meshovius' Historia, Jehring's Historie, and Arnold's Kirchen- und Ketzerhistorie. Starck's attitude is fairer than most other writers on the subject, although he is still quite confused on various points. H.S.B.

Starewitz (now Steurovice), a village near Auspitz (q.v.) in Moravia (q.v.). Here the Anabaptists who emigrated from Austerlitz (q.v.) with Wilhelm Reublin (q.v.) founded a Bruderhof in 1531 on land granted them by Johana of Boscovice. In it lived about fifty members, most of them sick or children.

Stark County (Ohio) Amish Settlement. At least four branches of the Amish Mennonites are found in Stark County—the Old Order Amish, consisting of three districts, with 215 members, the King group (now a district of the Old Order Amish) with 118, the Beachy congregation with 132, the Maple Grove Conservative Mennonite congregation with 126, and the Roman Miller group with some 200 members. The settlement is located in the northwest corner of Stark County and lies mostly within Lake Township, near Hartville. The first Amish settlers came to Stark County in 1905 from Gauga County. They were the families of Joseph D. Coblentz, their first minister, David C. Troyer, and John J. Stutzman. They at once organized a congregation. Daniel J. F. Miller was ordained minister in 1909, joined the Zook group in 1912, then returned to the Old Order, and was installed as bishop in 1918. David Schlabach, from Howard County, Ind., served as bishop of the South District 1918-28, and then returned to Indiana. Seth H. Byler (ord. bishop in 1931) and Henry Sommers have charge of the King group, Jonas J. Coblentz (ord. bishop in 1937) serves the South District, Noah J. Coblentz (ord. 1941) the East District, and Wallace Byler the West District.

The King Amish group was formed in 1907 as an affiliate of the Zook branch of the Amish, found in Mifflin County and in Ontario, by settlers from Lawrence County, Pa., Joshua King being their minister. In 1912 the preachers Daniel J. F. Miller and Phineas V. Yoder led a schism from the O.O.A. and with the assistance of Bishop John P. Zook of Mifflin County organized a new congregation. The withdrawal was due largely to differences on the application of the ban to members who joined other Mennonite branches. After six years, however, Phineas Yoder joined the King group and later the Conservative group. Joshua King (d. 1937), the first minister and organizer of the King church, was ordained bishop in 1909.

The Pleasant View Beachy congregation was formed in 1947. Their ministers in 1957 were Alvin Wittmer, Ely Beachy, and Bishop Samuel Ott. The Maple Grove Conservative Mennonite Church was organized in 1922. In 1957 Roman H. Miller (ordained minister in 1935 and bishop in 1939) withdrew with his followers from the Conservative Conference to start a new unaffiliated congregation at Bethesda, about a mile west of Maple Grove. Until then all of the Amish groups had co-operated in the Lake Center Christian Day School, built in 1947, having an attendance of 129 in grades 1-10 in 1956. Since Miller's new start his group has established a small congregation at New Franklin east of Canton on the Columbiana County border and a mission in Canton. N.A.K.

Stark (N.D.) Mennonite Brethren Church was a substation of the McClusky M.B. Church, located 28 miles southeast of it. It was organized under the leadership of a deacon, Jacob Sattler. In 1916 a church was built and dedicated. In 1924 it still had 16 members, but when some of these moved away, the meetings were discontinued and the meeting-house was moved to Goodrich; here the meetings continued for some time, but then the building was sold, and the members joined the McClusky church. M.A.K.

Starter, Jan Jansz (1594-1626), was born in Amsterdam of English Brownist (q.v.) parents. He joined the Waterlander Mennonites, was a bookseller at Leeuwarden in Friesland in 1614-20, back in Amsterdam in 1621, and soon after accepted an administrative office in the army of Ernst von Mansfeld. During a military campaign he met his early death near the Hungarian border in September 1626. Starter was an artist, poet, and engraver. His best-known work is Friesche Lusthof, a volume of poems published at Amsterdam in 1621 (reprints 1622, 1624-25, 1627). Concerning his connections with the Mennonite Church there is not much information. They probably were rather loose. Starter's Menniste Vryage (Mennonite Courtship) satirizes the "fijne" Mennonites. vdZ.

State, Anabaptist-Mennonite Attitude Toward. While it has long been known that the Anabaptists rejected participation in the magistracy, i.e., state office-holding, a comprehensive and systematic analysis of the Anabaptist basic attitude toward the state based upon the sources has been lacking. The resulting unclear and partial understandings have resulted in considerable confusion which has often been compounded by the attempt to include the revolutionary Anabaptists such as the Münsterites and Batenburgers in the general picture and the frequent assumption that the Anabaptist position toward the state was an irresponsible one, the incidental by-product of a Biblical naivete unaware of the complexities of a social order. Recent research, particularly the doctoral dissertation of Hans Hillerbrand, has shown on the contrary that the Anabaptists had a coherent and consistent position toward the state which was deliberately taken and was based upon a thorough, systematic, and basically consistent attitude toward the Scriptures. In short the Anabaptists had a sound theology of the state and a consistent view of the Christians' attitude toward and responsibility to the state based upon a consistent view of the church and the world.

Theology of the State. The beginning of all Anabaptist consideration of the state is the affirmation of its divine origin, an affirmation made specifically, emphatically, and repeatedly. This is true of all governments, whether good or bad. "Even Nero," says H. Schnell, "... and Pharaoh ... and Pilate ... were servants of God." Ambrosius Spittelmair said in 1527, "Every government that has existed since the time of Adam and exists today has been instituted by God." This position is grounded in direct Scripture quotations, especially Romans 13. The necessity for the state is human sin, but the ordination of the state expresses both God's wrath against sin and His gracious love. In such a theology of the state the Anabaptists are essentially one with the Reformers. Mennonites have followed their Anabaptist forebears in this position and have always held it.

A major consequence of such an understanding of the nature of the state is that rebellion against the state is impossible for the Christian regardless of how evil it may be in performance. The notion of revolution was of necessity utterly foreign to the Anabaptist mind in general, granting of course the reality of the exceptions in the case of the revolutionary type. Any "left-wing" element in the Reformation which advocated or practiced overthrow of the state at any time and place must therefore be considered non-Anabaptist or deviationist in central character, regardless of any practice of adult baptism or any genetic connection with original peaceful Anabaptism. Among some early Dutch Anabaptists eschatological views and the expectation of the coming of the day of the Lord in the very near future made them consider the state a negligible matter. But this was a question of practical attitude, not of principle.

But the Anabaptist theology of the state went further in concretely defining the tasks of the state and the limitations placed upon it by the divine governance. Its essential function is to maintain order and thus make possible a decent human society. Thus the work of government in punishing the evildoer and protecting the good is proper, good, and necessary, and shows "God's grace and love toward man" (Aufdeckung, Bii b). According to a Hessian Anabaptist Confession of 1571, the office and power of the state were ordained for the good of mankind. The Schleithem Confession of 1527 is very pointed in its sixth article, "On the Sword." "The sword is ordained of God outside the perfection of Christ. It punishes and puts to death the wicked, and guards and protects the good." Menno Simons (Krahn, 165 f.) clearly held that the state is ordained of God with its task assigned by God. This task he understood to be "to punish the evil, to protect the good, to administer a righteous justice, to care for the widows, the orphans, and the poor, and to provide a police force that is not against God and His Word." The government must exercise its office in "pure fear of God ... and Christian moderation ... with honorable means ... without tyranny and blood-shedding." Menno goes so far as to consider capital punishment not allowable.

But the Anabaptists placed a major limitation on the authority of the state: it had no right or jurisdiction to function in the spiritual realm; a government attempting to rule the hearts of men was overstepping its functions and tasks. Several times the martyrs, charged with transgressing the imperial mandates, admitted the charge, but added that the emperor had no right to make such a mandate. Christ alone is the Lord of conscience. Here the Anabaptists and the Reformers parted. For the latter the state was to be the Defensor fidei, with the power and duty to maintain religious and ecclesiastical uniformity and suppress dissent. The Anabaptists broke completely with the state-church system with its corpus christianum, which the Reformers retained. Hence the Anabaptist concept of religious liberty and religious pluralism, advanced far beyond its time, was in direct clash with both the Catholic and the Protestant concept. It is true that commonly the Reformers' rejection of the Anabaptist position was attached to the concept that religious pluralism would lead to social disorder and ultimate chaos, and that therefore the idea of religious freedom and independence of the church from the state was against God and man, was both blasphemous and seditious. But as early as 1524 the Zürich Anabaptists had replied to Zwingli's charge that rejection of infant baptism would lead to the breakdown of order in society (Wer ursach gebe zu Aufruhr) by challenging this fear as groundless (Protestation, by Felix Manz)—nothing of the like would happen.

A major consequence of the Anabaptists' positive acceptance of the state as a divine institution with a divinely assigned task to perform was the doctrine of full obedience to the state, except in the spiritual realm. Here obedience is not required, since when the state enters this realm it exceeds the divinely set bounds of its authority. But even here, only passive resistance and suffering are allowed, no active rebellion. That in spite of the repeated affirmations of the Anabaptists of their readiness to obey and promise never to resist, the charge of sedition and rebellion was widespread and persistent even before Münster (1535) is a mystery. That the impact of the latter and the propaganda made of it by the enemies of the Anabaptists would naturally tend to support and intensify the charge is clear. But the coolheaded and objective Sebastian Franck called this fear completely groundless (Chronica, 153, 449), saying, "Even if I were the pope, emperor, or Turk, I would have less fear of a rebellion from these people than from any other." In no respect then were the Anabaptists negative toward the state.

In spite of their positive evaluation of the state and their position of obedience toward it, however, the Anabaptists did reject completely all participation in government or holding of government office.

The Anabaptists, as Hillerbrand has shown, had a reasoned and consistent basis for their rejection, and gave four major reasons for their rejection of office holding.

(1) Scripture gives no authorization for it and Scripture was the supreme authority for the Anabaptists. No Christian may use the sword to punish or to kill, "for he has no Scripture for it," as Felix Manz said in 1525.

(2) Christ's example is against taking part in government. "If the governmental authorities wanted to be Christians," says one Anabaptist, "they would actually need to manifest and maintain the nature and manner of the life of Christ." Another says, "Christ Himself says in John 15, If they persecute me they will also persecute you—that is an open testimony that you will not find any government officers among the Christians." A frequently cited example was that Jesus refused to be a judge over the two brothers who had a dispute over their inheritance, hence Christians cannot be judge. Still more frequently cited, Jesus refused to let the people make Him king; He rather fled from them. So we should do likewise and follow Him, says the Schleithem Confession of 1527. A speaker at the Zofingen debate of 1531 said, "Jesus gave us an example as is stated in I Peter 2, that we should follow His footsteps under the cross." Repeatedly Anabaptist writers refer to the suffering of Christ, whose nature is so different from that of the dominating and proud (prunkvoll) authorities. The Schleithem Confession's article on the sword was frequently quoted by later Anabaptists in rejection of participation in the magistracy.

(3) Indirect teachings against "lording it" over others are given as a ground for rejection of governmental office. The most commonly quoted teaching of Jesus, the locus classicus, is Matt. 20:25-27. "Ye know that the princes of the Gentiles exercise dominion over them, and they that are great exercise authority upon them. But it shall not be so among you; but whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister; and whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant." This passage was taken to prove that there are two diametrically opposed principles in the world which can be stated thus: government rule means might and lordship; to be a Christian means to serve, suffer, and be persecuted. This is a difference that cannot be bridged. When the opponents produced the case of Cornelius as an illustration of a government officer who became a Christian and thus justified Christians holding office, the Anabaptists countered that of course Cornelius was converted to Christ and thus received new ethical principles for his life and could not have continued as a government officer.

Two other Anabaptist arguments against participation in government fall under the heading of the teaching of Jesus. One was that the government is essentially the bearer of revenge and the pursuit and punishment of the evildoer, whereas the message of Jesus stands diametrically opposed to this: the Christian is not to resist evil or take revenge. In the kingdom of Christ all revenge is forbidden. The second is the Lord's Prayer which indicates that God will forgive us only as we forgive our enemies. If we use revenge, the sword, and prison, what else can we expect from God? If the government officers really love and forgive transgressors, how then can they execute them?

(4) A final basic Anabaptist argument against participation in government is that of the necessary radical separation of the church of Christ from the world. Did not Paul say, "For what have I to do to judge them also that are without" (I Cor. 5:12)? This verse was used to justify the concept that the Christian has no responsibility for maintaining law and order in the world. The world is the "civitas Diaboli"; those who belong to the church of Christ and are concerned to follow Christ dare not have anything to do with it, although of course the Great Commission will lead them out into the world to proclaim the message of Christ. "World" and "kingdom of Christ" are two completely separate realities for the Anabaptist. He was not to be concerned with what goes on in the world.

To the charge of the Reformers that such a denial of responsibility for the social order could mean a disruption of the functions of government and ultimately lead to chaos, the Anabaptists answered that there would always be sufficient available persons to fill the governmental offices. In any case, the state's ministry at this point is not necessary for the Christian, and the Christian does not need to render to the state the oath, nor military service, nor war taxes. The church will discipline its own members for their misdeeds, using only the ban. Of course gross sins are rightly punishable by the state, even if the criminals have been church members.

To the protest of the opponents that the Old Testament saints occupied government offices, that David, for instance, was a king, the Anabaptist answer was simple, the New Testament has replaced the Old. Christ is now the norm, not the Old Testament.

The Anabaptist political ethic with its dualism of holding that God ordained the state with its sword, yet claiming that the state's operation involved non-Christian principles, remained finally unresolved in Anabaptist thinking. The state operates on principles of its own, ordained by God, which parallel the principles of Christ's kingdom, and are not in accord with it. But what of that? Paul Glock's answer to the problem was simply, "Who will quarrel with God's ordination?"

Thus we see that the early Anabaptists faced squarely the issues involved in participation in government, that they took deliberate conclusions based upon Biblical foundations, and that they were consistent in their position. They did not simply yield to the force of circumstances or develop an ex post facto justification for what they could not do anyway.

The principle of nonparticipation in government having been established historically at the beginning of the Anabaptist movement, it is necessary to note the record of actual participation in the functions of government (the magistracy) in legislative, executive, or judicial functions, or in subsidiary office holding of a political nature, excluding the welfare functions. In this review we shall omit the revolutionary Anabaptists of Münster who took over the city government in 1534 and established an Old Testament theocracy which was suppressed by military force a year later.

The Anabaptists universally rejected participation in government with one exception. This was the large congregation at Nikolsburg in Moravia, founded by Balthasar Hubmaier in July 1526 and led by him until his arrest and imprisonment at the end of 1527. Hubmaier did not teach nonresistance but found a place for the sword in the hands of the Christian in support of the government; hence his followers were called "Schwerdtler." The local ruler, Lord Leonhard von Liechtenstein, was baptized in 1527 and became a member of Hubmaier's congregation without surrendering his governmental authority. He even used his authority to expel the nonresistant Anabaptist part of the congregation from Nikolsburg in 1528, most of whom later became known as the Hutterites. The Hubmaier congregation was short-lived; no trace of it is found after 1529. The expelled nonresistant part, however, survived in two major groups in Moravia, the Swiss Brethren (founded as late as 1615 in this area) and the Hutterites, who continued in Moravia until expelled in 1622.

The first Anabaptists-Mennonites to open the door to participation in government were the Waterlanders, the more open-minded party in Holland. They permitted their members as early as 1570 to hold government offices (van der Zijpp, Doopsgezinden, 148), and after that time many of them held such offices, but this was always limited to minor local offices, not involving capital punishment. Often they were semiofficials such as inspectors of the market or trustees of a polder. Only from the early 18th century when the conservative Dutch Mennonites like the Old Frisians still refused to accept any state office did some Waterlanders and progressive Lamists occasionally serve as sheriff or alderman, but only in small towns and in the country where the population was so predominantly Mennonite that scarcely any Reformed could be found to serve in such places. It was not only the duty but also the privilege of the Reformed to govern the country, both in the top offices and in the lower magistracy, and this prerogative was maintained long after the Dutch nation had successfully ended a bitter war with the Spanish for independence. Not until 1795 when complete freedom of religion was achieved in Holland did Mennonites occupy high governmental positions, but after this they entered every level of state offices except that of prime minister, often serving with distinction. Numerous Dutch Mennonites have entered politics and several have served as cabinet ministers. Among them was C. Lely, who laid the plans for the reclamation of the Zuiderzee. Albertus van Delden of Deventer served for 40 years (1858-98) in governmental functions, both in legislative and executive posts, for a time as minister of finance. The minister of reconstruction after World War II was a Mennonite. Another was minister of the navy in the early 20th century. Several Mennonites held the very high post of governor of the Dutch East Indies. There have been numerous Mennonite burgomasters, including the largest cities of Holland such as Amsterdam, The Hague, and Haarlem. Mennonites have also served frequently as judges of the high courts. There have been Mennonite generals in the army. It is almost two hundred years since any but a small minority of Dutch Mennonites have been opposed to full participation in the life of the state. From 1796 on, the Mennonites used their right of voting, and there never was any hesitation or even religious question about voting, as is sometimes still the case among American Mennonites.

The German Mennonites, both North and South, have followed a pattern similar to that of the Dutch Mennonites, only several decades later. In one case, the city of Friedrichstadt in Holstein, the change came even earlier. This was the earliest city in Europe to give complete toleration to Mennonites. Here from 1711 to 1786 one of the two burgomasters was continuously a Mennonite. In the 19th century Mennonite Jan Jelle Schuett served a half century as burgomaster, receiving knighthood in 1856 from the King of Denmark for his extraordinarily long and meritorious service.

The Mennonite congregations of Crefeld and Emden each furnished a member of the famous first all-German Parliament of 1848 at Frankfurt. One was Hermann von Beckerath of Crefeld, who served a short while as minister of finance in the Prussian cabinet, but retired because of his difference with the politics of the king. He was leader of the Liberal Party in the Prussian parliament 1850-53. The other member of the Frankfurt parliament was Isaac Brons, a deacon of the Emden congregation, who incidentally was an enthusiastic promoter of what is known as Great Germany and one of the founders of the East Frisian Navy League in 1862.

In South Germany it was largely the Palatine Mennonites who entered politics. Peter Eymann, who had been burgomaster of Frankenstein for some years, was elected to the Bavarian parliament in 1848. Much later Heinrich Stauffer, who had been serving in several local government posts, was elected to the German national parliament (Reichstag) in 1903. Jakob Finger, a lifelong member of the Monsheim congregation in Rheinhessen, was an outstanding political leader in Hesse, serving as minister of state for 14 years, 1884-98. He was jokingly referred to as "the little finger by which the Grand Duke of Hesse ruled" his state. The last president of the Berlin Mennonite Church before World War II, a van Dühren, was a judge of the Berlin Supreme Court.

In Russia, apart from the local civil autonomy by which the Mennonite colonies governed themselves under the Fürsorgekomitee at Odessa it should be reported that the noted Johann Cornies (d. 1848), an outstanding agricultural and educational leader in the Molotschna Mennonite settlement, actually was given considerable authority by the Russian governor, which he used effectively, sometimes in almost dictatorial fashion. No Russian representative national parliament was set up until 1905. Very early, however, two Mennonites were elected to serve in that parliament. Abraham Bergmann served in the third and fifth Duma, and Peter Schroeder served in the fourth Duma. When the constitutional assembly was called in 1917 under the Kerensky regime, the Mennonites undertook vigorous organization and joined with other German colonists in a strong but vain attempt to elect a representative. B. H. Unruh, writing in the Mennonitisches Lexikon in 1921-22, advocated regular political action by Mennonites working through a political party: "The Mennonites in Russia, remaining true to the principles of their forefathers in this point, will never be in politics for politics' sake, but the life needs of the Mennonite society in Russia and the public welfare in the largest sense, will nevertheless lead them to a moderate political action program." In Siberia the Slavgorod Mennonites sent Franz F. Froese as their representative to the Siberian Duma following the Revolution of 1917, and in the second Siberian Duma they had four representatives—F. F. Froese, Johann Penner, Peter Boldt, and Heinrich Boldt. They also joined the movement to establish an independent German state within an autonomous Siberia.

In Switzerland there was no participation in government until the 20th century. An outstanding case was Elder Samuel Nussbaumer of Basel (d. 1944), long-time president of the Swiss Mennonite Conference, who served many years in the legislature of the half-canton of Baselland.

Thus in the 19th and 20th centuries in Europe the old Anabaptist rejection of participation in the magistracy had completely disappeared among the Mennonites everywhere. Along with the abandonment of the ancient position, the process of assimilation into the national culture meant also the gradual abandonment of nonresistance everywhere except in Russia (and in part in Switzerland).

The history of the attitude and practice of the American Mennonites on participation in government is substantially different from the record in Europe.

The Mennonite immigrants to America came in successive waves from Switzerland-South Germany 1707-56 to Pennsylvania, Amish from Alsace Lorraine, Hesse, and Bavaria 1815-60 to the central states and Ontario, Mennonites from Switzerland and South Germany 1815-60 to the same area, Mennonites from Russia to the western prairie states and provinces 1874-80, and Mennonites from Russia to Canada 1922-25, 1930-31, 1948-53. These groups brought with them attitudes on participation in government reflecting their state of mind and practice in Europe at the time, and naturally perpetuated them in the groups which they constituted in America. The first two immigrant groups later constituted the Mennonite Church (MC), the Amish, and related conservative groups. Here the attitude of complete nonparticipation was established. It has been fixed in the legislation of the conferences and has been maintained uniformly. The only exceptions have been a few cases of participation in local government. For instance, T. M. Erb, a bishop at Hesston, Kan., and long business manager of Hesston College, served on the Hesston town council, and the mayor of Souderton, Pa., was a lay member of a local Mennonite congregation a generation ago. There have no doubt been other cases of participation in town councils. Many Mennonites and Amish have served on local elected school boards, and some have served as township trustees.

In all the other Mennonite groups established in America, the General Conference, the Mennonite Brethren, etc., there has seemingly never been any tradition or regulation forbidding participation in governmental functions at any level, except participation in the police function. Even here there were in the 20th century two cases where General Conference Mennonites served as sheriff, one a member of the congregation at Deep Run, Bucks Co., Pa.

In many communities where the Mennonite immigrants have constituted a large part of the local population, they have as a matter of course accepted local office and operated the government. A good illustration is Mountain Lake, Minn., where according to the historian of the community, F. P. Schultz, "the Mennonites took over the affairs of the village and township government as soon as they were settled in the community." The following additional statements by Schultz give a more complete picture. "From the time of its separate organization as a municipality in 1886 the village of Mountain Lake was governed by Mennonite officials with the exception of the constable, who was usually an American." "Since 1901 various Mennonites have held different county offices and a few have served as members of the state legislature." John R. Rempel served as Justice of the Peace for 25 years in Mountain Lake (d. 1933). "In recent years, particularly since World War I, village politics rapidly developed into a more typically American setup." In World War II, it might be noted, Mennonites (GCM) also served on local draft boards since the war, at least one at Topeka, Ind., one in Kansas, and one at Mountain Lake, Minn.

Steinbach, Man., is another community which has been almost continuously run by Mennonites in the local government, although the Kleine Gemeinde does not participate. In Goshen, Ind., Frank S. Ebersole, a member of the Eighth Street Mennonite Church (GCM), served a 4-year term as mayor during World War II.

General Conference Mennonites have been elected to provincial and state legislatures. Known cases are Kansas—H. P. Krehbiel, a minister and conference leader, and J. A. Schowalter; Minnesota; Nebraska—Peter Jansen; South Dakota—D. D. Wipf two terms as Secretary of State, J. J. Wipf six terms in the House, P. P. Kleinsasser two terms in the Senate, eight others served in the House and four others in the Senate; Manitoba; and Saskatchewan. Others have entered the political lists only to lose at the ballot box. At least two Mennonites were elected to the United States Congress, E. W. Ramseyer, a member of the church (GCM) at Pulaski, Iowa, who served 18 years in the House of Representatives (1915-33) and then as Commissioner in the U.S. Court of Claims at Washington, D.C., and E. C. Eicher, a member of the Eicher Mennonite Church (GCM) at Wayland, Iowa, who served 6 years in the House of Representatives (1933-39), then for a year as member of the Securities and Exchange Commission, and finally as Chief Justice in the District Court of the District of Columbia at Washington, D.C., where he died in office in 1944. Both men were prominent figures in Congress, the former a Republican, the latter a Democrat.

The most noted politically active Mennonite in America was probably Peter Jansen, born in 1852 in Russia as the son of the noted Cornelius Jansen, who was for a time Prussian Consul in Prussia and South Russia and emigrated to Beatrice, Neb., in 1873. Mr. Jansen began his political career in 1880 as Justice of the Peace. As early as 1884 he was elected an alternate delegate to the National Republican Convention in Chicago. In 1898 he was elected a member of the Nebraska State Legislature, and in 1899 was appointed U.S. Commissioner to the Paris Exposition by President McKinley. In 1910 he was elected to the State Senate of Nebraska. He states in his memoirs that he was frequently urged by friends to become a candidate for governor, but that his pronounced opposition to war and all that was military never permitted him to seek this honor, since as governor of the state he would also be an officer of the militia. He was also conscientiously opposed to the death penalty.

The situation at Germantown, Pa., is unique in American Mennonite history. This settlement was established in 1683 by thirteen families from Crefeld, Germany, who at the time of their arrival were for the most part Quakers, but up to a few years before had been Mennonites. In essence their attitude on political matters therefore was the Mennonite attitude of their home church in Crefeld. During the course of the next 25 years at least 40 or 50 Mennonite families, mostly from the Lower Rhine area, a few from Hamburg-Altona, settled in this Germantown village community. They together with Quakers constituted the corporate members of the Germantown village government. The village had been incorporated in 1691 under the laws of the province of Pennsylvania, receiving a special charter. Since the Mennonites and Quakers who had settled here were the corporate members of this borough which was a closed corporation, they had the exclusive right of franchise, of legislation, and of admitting new members into the corporation. They were therefore under obligation to establish and maintain a local municipal government. So long as the village ordinances and local litigation concerned itself chiefly with stray pigs and line fences, there was little difficulty in securing Quaker and Mennonite officials to serve, but with the building of a jail and the introduction of stocks and a whipping post they lost their desire for office. As early as 1701, Pastorius, the non-Mennonite and non-Quaker civil leader of the village, complained to Penn that for conscience' sake he found it increasingly difficult to find men who would serve in the general court of Germantown and that he hoped for relief through the arrival of new immigrants. Several men declined to accept offices to which they had been elected. Finally in 1707 the village lost its charter, chiefly because it was unable to carry on the government which its charter required, and it was merged for political purposes with the township of which it was a part. In this interesting Germantown political experiment, we have a situation where the Mennonites and Quakers were in the majority and had the franchise and were unwilling to admit others to the franchise, but at the same time were unwilling to hold the offices necessary to operate the village government.

An altogether different phase of the problem of church and state in Mennonite history, one which has escaped the attention of most Mennonites interested in this problem, occurs in those instances where Mennonite colonies have been granted local political autonomy by the state under whose sovereignty they reside. These cases involve in actual effect the erection of Mennonite states.

The first instance of this in Mennonite history is the autonomy granted to the Mennonite settlements (also to other ethnic immigrant groups) in South Russia by the government 1789 ff. The supervision of affairs in all the settlements was placed in the hands of a Russian governmental committee, with seat in Odessa, placed directly under the national cabinet in Moscow. Within the Mennonite settlements, however, all strictly local village and settlement affairs were given over to the Mennonites themselves. They were given the right to elect their own officials, to establish their own local laws, and thus to govern themselves quite freely. Since all the inhabitants of the Mennonite districts were either baptized members of the Mennonite church or unbaptized members of Mennonite families, and no non-Mennonites were permitted to live in the settlement, this was a purely Mennonite state. (It should be noted that in time the unbaptized proportion of the population became substantial in size but participated fully in civic affairs. To the Russian government the term "Mennonite" was a cultural or racial concept, not necessarily religious.) The actual conduct of government fell largely to the local village assembly and the village magistrate (see Schulze). To the Mennonite magistrate fell the lot of administering local discipline, with whipping a common method of punishment.

A closer examination of the situation reveals that actually the government approached a form of theocracy. Even though the elders or bishops were not at the head of civil affairs, yet as heads of the church they exercised great influence over matters of government, especially over the schools. Frequently also the magistrates requested the elders to assist them in many local affairs. Later on the strong influence of the elders in the village government declined. It is needless to say that it was not always easy to carry out the principles of nonresistance and opposition to the use of force which all the Mennonites of Russia firmly believed in, and at the same time maintain the discipline necessary for a stable order. To lead a fellow member to the whipping post required considerable rationalization of the injunction, "Resist not evil." Worst of all was the attempt of certain Mennonite leaders to have the Russian government banish to Siberia some of the leaders of the new (MB) movement of 1860.

When the Russian government in 1870 attempted to cancel most of the privileges of the Mennonites as well as the other German colonists of Russia a large number of them were prepared to leave the country. Under the pressure of the threatened emigration the Russians withdrew part of their proposals, especially that canceling exemption from military service. A compromise was reached, according to which the Mennonite population, through the Mennonite civil organization of their autonomous government, undertook to provide a substitute service for the state in the form of a voluntary forestry service, which was set up in 1880. This furnished the suggestion and inspiration for the American Mennonite proposal for Civilian Public Service in World War II.

The second instance of Mennonite self-government, on a reduced scale to be sure, and of shorter duration, is found in the Russian Mennonite settlements made in Manitoba in the East and West Reserves in 1874-80. The third instance of Mennonite self-government, fully equal to that in Russia, is found in the Mennonite colonies in Paraguay. The autonomy of the Mennonites in the Paraguayan Chaco is greater than that accorded the Mennonites in Russia. As a matter of fact the Mennonites of the Chaco constitute an absolutely independent state. There has never been any application of any of the laws of Paraguay to them in the Chaco, there has never been any police officer or government officer in the colony to exercise any authority on behalf of the national government, except in the case of the suppression of the Nazi movement in 1940(?), the courts of the land have never interfered with the Mennonites of the Chaco, and the army during its occupation of the Chaco never presumed to exercise authority. Since each Mennonite colony in Paraguay is independent, there are 5 Mennonite states: Menno, Fernheim, Friesland, Volendam, and Neuland.

On the whole this form of Mennonite self-government in Paraguay has been very successful to the present date. It has been possible to maintain law and order without using force with the exception of one or two instances where it was necessary to administer corporal punishment to recalcitrant stripplings. It is true of course that those who are dissatisfied with the social order in the colony can leave, and are probably under so much social pressure that they voluntarily leave before they become serious problems to the authorities. But in any case, for thirty years these Mennonite states have existed in the heart of South America without the use of force, and have maintained a good degree of law and order, industry, sobriety, and peace.

It is difficult to say whether the former Mennonite settlements in South Russia and the Mennonite colonies in South America present a form of union of church and state or not. It is true that in these colonies the church governed or governs itself without interference or support from the civil government. That is, the Mennonite churches in these colonies have not been subjected to or made a part of the civil government. Nor has the church in its organized form, that is, in its regular meetings or conferences, dictated on the other hand to the government. The functions of church and state have been maintained as completely separate functions, the functions of the state being exercised by the civil assemblies, and the functions of the church being exercised by the ecclesiastical assemblies. Yet the same people are members of both the civil and ecclesiastical assemblies, with the exception of those church members who have been excommunicated or those who have grown up without being baptized and joining the church. However, it is true beyond the shadow of a doubt that the actual leadership of this joint life in the Mennonite colony, both in Russia and South America, has usually been largely in the hands of the elders and ministers. It is inconceivable that anything could be done in these colonies that would be basically contrary to the teachings and wishes of the church leaders. Thus in effect if not in form there is an amalgamation of the church and state. Is this not an ideal solution to the problem? However, this solution seems to be possible only in a state which is not well developed nor prosperous and which has large open spaces in which it is possible to settle blocks of foreign population without interfering with the national life in general. Paraguay is a poor country with a small population and with large unoccupied areas. It is very anxious to secure settlers and it is willing to pay the price of granting practical independence to such foreign groups as the Mennonites in order to secure the benefit of their service in the development of the state, at least in the Gran Chaco territory.

In recent years study conferences have been sponsored in several North American Mennonite groups to deal with the Christian's relation to the state, which have produced valuable series of papers. The Peace Problems Committee (MC) held such a conference at Laurelville, Pa., on Sept. 21-22, 1956, under the title "Nonresistance and Political Responsibility." The MCC Peace Section sponsored an all-Mennonite Conference on "Christian Responsibility to the State" in Chicago on Nov. 15-16, 1957. The Department of Social Science of Bethel College (GCM) sponsors annually (since 1955) a "Conference on Education and Political Responsibility." The essays from Mennonite Life listed in the bibliography below were among the papers read at one of these conferences. H.S.B.

Mennonites in the Netherlands in the early period after 1530 likely still held government office. In so doing they acted in line with the later Menno Simons, who in 1554 still declared, "I should not like to compel a Christian to lay down his office; I would commit him to his own conscience and the guidance of the Holy Spirit" (Kühler, 342). But not long after this Anabaptists are no longer found in office, in the first place because it was no longer possible in the face of the growing persecution, and also because the Mennonites themselves took the position that they must absolutely not hold office. Two confessions of faith, the Olijftacxken (1626) and that of Jan Cents (1629), say that government office does not fit into the church. The other old confessions are silent on this point. In the confession of Cornelis Ris (1766) we read, "If such an office should be committed to us, then we should be greatly concerned about it and not prepare to take it, for the will of Christ to rule thus is quite unknown to us." In 1585 the States General released the Mennonites from the duty of holding office, and between 1607 and 1612 there are several resolutions which released them in return for payment, since they were well-to-do. The Waterlanders did not consider an office in government necessarily to be at variance with the Gospel. At the conference of preachers and elders held at Amsterdam in 1581 it was decided that a position on the city council (vroedschap-sambr) and on the tax commission (belastingambtenaar) were permissible. Jan van der Beest, a Mennonite, became a notary at Schiedam on Sept. 29, 1622. He was released from the usual oath of office by the States General, after his petition to this effect had once been refused. Nevertheless many Waterland Mennonites in North Holland until after 1600 frequently refused to hold office and were fined in consequence. This happened, for example, when the Waterlander preacher of Rotterdam, Eduard Nabels (q.v.), was appointed sheriff in 1629; he was exempted from this office by paying a "gift" of 25 guilders to the poor of the Reformed Church.

But by degrees the Mennonites frequently accepted office, especially the "lower" ones in which the shedding of blood was not involved. In the course of the 17th and 18th centuries the aversion to public office disappeared among the Mennonites, though the strict group ("fijne") held to the principle until about 1790. Thus in 1719 Pieter Zwart, a deacon in the Frisian congregation of Oude-Niedorp, was nearly excommunicated for accepting the office of schepen (alderman). That few public offices were held by Mennonites in the 18th century is also due to the fact that these offices were considered the prerogative of members of the established church; on the whole Mennonites were excluded. Even in places where the Mennonites were in the majority, such as North Holland, they were hardly ever in public office. As soon as this ban was lifted the Mennonites went into the offices, and by the time of the French occupation we find many Mennonites as mayors and as members of city councils. In Hengelo it was, for instance, decided that the city council should consist of three Catholics and two Mennonites. Since 1800 many Mennonites have held important posts in the government, up to the very high positions; thus there was a relatively high number of Mennonite ministers of state; at one time four of the eleven members of the cabinet were Mennonites.

That obedience to the state is an obligation of the Christian is expressly stated in all Dutch Mennonite confessions of faith where the subject is treated at all. The very first one, the Waterlander confession of Hans de Ries (about 1580) says (Article 37): "The temporal power or government is a necessary ordinance of God, ordained and instituted for the preservation of the state and of a good, natural, civil life, to the good for protection, to the evil for punishment. We confess ourselves obliged and bound by God's Word to fear the government, to show it honor and obedience in all things which are not in conflict with the Word of the Lord. We are bound to pray to the Almighty God for it, to thank the Lord for good, honest benevolence, and to give without murmuring the tax, tithe, and fees due it." The other confessions agree with this, especially the Dordrecht Confession and that of Cornelis Ris.

"All the doctrines and confessions of faith of the Mennonites," writes Maatschoen (p. 321), "contain nothing that gives the least appearance or suggestion to sedition or revolt against any princes or governments, or say nothing of inciting men to commit them, but they teach and command the opposite. For their instructions and confessions state clearly, and earnestly instill into the hearts of their pupils and followers, that it is not free to any subject to set up a distinction between the legality or illegality of the supreme authority or to pass judgment on its institutions and laws, but to render complete and faithful obedience to all to protect oneself from threatening evil and money fines, but also and especially for the sake of conscience, as they have learned from the Apostle Paul, Rom. 13:1-7." "No church praises obedience to the supreme authority more emphatically than the Mennonites," a statement that is corroborated by various confessions, in which the author points out the great contrast between them and the fanatics in Germany and the revolt in Münster.

Statenvertaling is the common title of a Dutch translation of the Bible, thus called because this translation was ordered by the States General of the Netherlands. It was made in 1626-37 by a number of learned men and first appeared in 1637. At first the Mennonites, particularly the more conservatives among them, were opposed to the Statenvertaling, preferring their Biestkens (q.v.) Bible; but gradually they introduced the new translation, which was more exact than the Biestkens Bible. Among the Frisian and Flemish Mennonites the Statenvertaling was generally used from about 1650, but not until the 12th edition of T. J. van Braght's Schole der Deugd of 1719 were the Bible texts quoted from the Statenvertaling. The Jan-jacobsgezinden (q.v.) and a few other strict groups did not use the Statenvertaling until the 19th century. After World War II the Statenvertaling was generally replaced by a new translation published by the Dutch Bible Association (Bijbelgenootschap).

Staudach(er) (Staudtach), Hans, a Hutterite martyr of Kaufbeuren (q.v.), Bavaria, Germany, was seized in Austria with Anthoni Keim (q.v.), Blasius Beckh (q.v.), and Leonhard Schneider (q.v.) when they with their wives and children were on their way to Moravia. After a steadfast cross-examination he was beheaded on Nov. 22, 1546, in Vienna. The Lieder der Hutterischen Brüder contains two of his songs (pp. 128 ff.), "Hilf Gott, das uns gelinge" and "O Christe rein du bist allein," while a third, "Ich freu mich dein, O Vater mein," is to be found in Pressburg, Codex 236 (according to the Lieder, p. 128). Songs were written about him by Hans Gurtzham (q.v.), Wolf Sailer (q.v.), and Christoff Scheffman. The first of these appears in Lieder, p. 136 f.

Stauffer, a Mennonite family name, meaning cup-bearer, or perhaps steep hill, comes from the Aar River valley and the Emmental, Switzerland. Christen Stauffer, an "obstinate" Anabaptist preacher, was in prison at Bern in 1644. About 1700 a Swiss Stauffer family settled in Alsace; in the 18th century some Stauffers lived in the Bernese Jura, and c1670 Christian and Ulrich Stauffer emigrated from Eggswil, canton of Bern, to the Palatinate, Germany. Here some Stauffers were ministers, Christian Stauffer being a deacon or preacher at Gerolsheim (q.v.) c1740, Daniel Stauffer, of Guntersblum, serving 1739-c67 as elder of the Altzheim congregation near Oppenheim, and Heinrich Stauffer, a preacher 1758 and elder 1765-1805 of the Ibersheim (q.v.) congregation, followed in this office by his relatives Johann Stauffer, preacher from 1787, and Daniel Stauffer, serving until 1842. Hans Stauffer was a Mennonite and was expelled from Switzerland soon after his marriage in 1685 to Kingst Heistand-Risser and settled in the Palatinate. On Nov. 9, 1709, he began his emigration to America. He was in London on Jan. 20, 1710, with his wife and children—Jacob, age 13, Daniel 12, Henry 9, Elisabeth, who was the wife of Paul Friedt, and Maria, ready to sail for America. They came to Colebrookdale, Berks Co., Pa., and were the ancestors of John Stauffer (1762-1822), a preacher of the Franconia Conference (MC), and Bishop John L. Stauffer of Virginia. Ulrich Stowpher and Uldrich Stoupher, probably father and son, arrived in America on Sept. 18 and 30, 1727. Vincent Stauffer, probably a son of Ulrich Stowpher, who settled in York County, Pa., qualified on Aug. 24, 1728. Vincent was the ancestor of the preachers Daniel Stauffer (1807-31) and Moses Stauffer (1842-1927) and Bishop Frederick Stauffer (1813-84). Jacob Stauffer (1713-68) arrived in Philadelphia in 1732 and settled in Dauphin County, Pa. Jacob Stofor (b. c1712) arrived in 1732 with his brother Daniel Stiffor. Daniel Stauffer (b. c1708) and his wife Magdalena Hess, of the Pequea Colony, established a mill site on Hammer Creek, four miles north of Lititz. They were the progenitors of the preachers Noah Stauffer (1842-1928) and Norman B. Stauffer (1871-1927), both of Canada. Christian and Johannes Stoupher, aged 28 and 20, arrived in 1737. Undoubtedly the last four, Christian, Daniel, Jacob, and John Stauffer, were brothers, the sons of Daniel Stauffer, who died in the Palatinate in 1735. The widow, Veronica, came with Christian and John, traveling on a cart to northern Lancaster County, where both boys settled. Christian Stauffer was the ancestor of Benjamin B. Stauffer (1855-1928), a preacher of the Kaufman church, Benjamin E. Stauffer (1864-1918), the first superintendent of the Old People's Home at Maugansville, Md., and Bishop Elam W. Stauffer, a Mennonite bishop in Africa. Johannes Stauffer was the ancestor of John H. Stauffer (1818-92), a preacher who donated the ground for the Stauffer meeting-house near Bachmanville. Matthias Stauffer, reputedly an older son of Daniel and Veronica Stauffer, came with his uncle, Hans Stauffer, in 1710, settling at Caernarvon; he was the ancestor of Jacob W. Stauffer (1811-55), the founder of the Stauffer fer Mennonites (q.v.). Christian and Johannes Stauffer, who arrived in America in 1744, were probably brothers of Ulrich and Vincent Stauffer. They settled in Donegal Township, Lancaster County, and Ulrich became the father of Abraham Stauffer (1752-1826), a preacher in Fayette County. Christian Stauffer arrived in 1749, settled in Lampeter, and was the father of Johannes Stauffer (1737-1811), also a preacher. Later arrivals include the preachers Johannes Stauffer (1791-1861) and his son Christian Stauffer (1823-87), who served at Indian-town. Other ordained men were Bishop John Stauffer (1746-1836), of Beaver Creek and Stauffer's church in Washington County, Md., Bishop Michael Stauffer, the first in Augusta County, Va., and Joseph R. Stauffer (1852-1918), of Milford, Neb. Abraham Stauffer (1752-1826) was a pioneer Mennonite bishop in Fayette County, Pa. The Pennsville meetinghouse was near his home. He was the great-grandfather of Henry C. Frick and Abraham O. Tinsman, who were prominent in the coke and iron smelting industry of Western Pennsylvania.

Henry Stauffer (1781-1851) was an early leader in the Columbiana-Mahoning congregation. Born near Hagerstown, Md., he accompanied his parents to Fayette County, Pa., in 1790 and in 1801 he walked through the woods to Mahoning County, Ohio, where he settled. In 1806-9 he served in the Columbiana County militia. He was ordained to the ministry soon after the arrival of Bishop Jacob Nold in 1817, whom he succeeded as bishop after Nold's death in 1834. He was one of the signers of the minutes of a church conference held 1843-44 at the Chester meetinghouse in Wayne County, Ohio.

Jacob Stauffer (1832-99), an early Mennonite preacher of Ohio, was born in York County, Pa., came to Columbiana County, Ohio, with his parents in 1834. He married a daughter of Deacon Jacob Nold. In 1882 he was ordained a minister. He had a concern for small congregations, occasionally preached for the declining congregations at North Georgetown, Columbiana County, Ohio, and Harmony, Butler County, Pa., both of which are now extinct. Rudy L. Stauffer is bishop at Wooster, Ohio, and J. B. Stauffer bishop at Tofield, Alta. (Unless otherwise indicated, the above ordained men are M.C.)

A (non-Mennonite) descendant of this Stauffer family is Ethelbert Stauffer, professor of New Testament at the University of Bonn, Germany.

Stauffer, Jacob W. (1811-55), the founder of the Stauffer Mennonite Church (q.v.), was born in Earl Twp., Lancaster Co., Pa., on Sept. 3, 1811, the son of David and Anna Weaver Stauffer. On Nov. 18, 1833, he married Lydia Martin (1817-97). He lived on the home farm between the Linden Grove School and the Pike Mennonite Church. Here they reared their nine children. Of his sons, David M. Stauffer (1834-89) was a bishop, Moses M. Stauffer (1849-99) a preacher, John S. Stauffer (1867-?) a bishop, and Phares O. Stauffer a bishop, all in Snyder County, Pa., in the Stauffer Mennonite Church. His son Enos had two ordained sons-in-law—John A. Weaver (1881-1954), a bishop, and Peter Weaver, a preacher. Martin S. Weaver, a son of the former, was ordained by the Weaver Mennonites (q.v.) at the Pike Mennonite Church. Of the Daniel M. Stauffer line is Bishop Jacob S. Stauffer at the Pike Stauffer Mennonite Church.

Jacob W. Stauffer was ordained to the ministry at Groffdale on Nov. 29, 1840, and served until 1845. Then trouble arose in the congregation, which became a church issue involving the ban. The bishops, with the exception of Jacob Brubaker of Juniata County, sided with the minister Joseph Wenger (1766-1851) and the deacon Benjamin Wenger (1807-84). Thereupon Jacob W. Stauffer and Jacob Weber (1796-1860) withdrew with Bishop Brubaker (above) to form the Stauffer Mennonite Church. He defended his position and tried to show the decline of the old church in a book with the title, Eine Chronik oder Geschicht-Büchlein (Lancaster, 1855, 2d ed. 1859). He formulated the principles of discipline and order for the new group. He rejected all attempts to heal the schism. I.D.L.

Stauffer, John Gehman (1837-1911), Mennonite (GCM) publisher of Quakertown, Pa., was born near Spinnerstown, Milford Twp., Bucks Co., Pa., on Sept. 18, 1837, a direct descendant of the immigrant Hans Stauffer (arrived 1710 at Valley Forge), and the son of Jacob O. and Elizabeth Hiestand Stauffer. In November 1856 he entered the employ of the Mennonitischer Druckverein in Milford Square, soon becoming manager of the small business, as well as compositor, printer, and assistant editor. The chief business of the shop was the publication of Das Christliche Volks-Blatt (first issue June 30, 1856). Stauffer continued as an employee in the shop until in 1867 when he apparently bought the shop and continued to print the publications of the Druckverein and its successors on a job basis. In 1881 he moved his shop and family to Quakertown, calling the shop the Quakertown Printing and Publishing House. He printed most of the books, pamphlets, etc., for John Oberholtzer (q.v.).

After he bought the print shop in 1867 Stauffer started publishing a German weekly local newspaper, Independent Reformer, later changed to Der Reformer, then to Patriot und Reformer, for a time also apparently as Der Bucks County Patriot und Reformer und Agriculturist (see Reformer und Agriculturist); it is very difficult at this date to secure a clear idea of these various publications and their relation to each other. In August 1881 he started an English weekly, the Quakertown Free Press, which he sold in July 1882.

Stauffer's strong religious interest was expressed in his publication of the German and English monthly Sunday-school papers, Himmelsmanna (q.v., 1876-1906) and Manna (1879-1908), and the monthly Die Kirche (soon changed to Gemeinde) unterm Kreuz (q.v., 1885-91). He published the last paper as a staunch Mennonite journal, with a circulation of about 2,000, until about 1889, when he seemingly lost interest in the Mennonite Church. Die Gemeinde unterm Kreuz was of course in direct competition with the General Conference Mennonite Church organ, Christlicher Bundesbote, and it may be that he found it impossible to secure the necessary Mennonite support to keep it going. An evaluation of Stauffer's work is given in the article Kirche unterm Kreuz. Daniel G. Stauffer was a brother. The Uriah S. Stauffer (b. 1859) who took charge of J. G. Stauffer's shop in 1880 and soon bought out the Quakertown Free Press and the Patriot and Reformer was a son of Enos Stauffer, a relative of J. G. Stauffer. J. G. Stauffer married Sarah Geissinger on June 11, 1870. They had two children, Berend G. and Anna. He died in 1911 at the home of his daughter in California. H.S.B.

J. Battle, History of Bucks County (Philadelphia, 1887) 1067 f., contains a biographical sketch of J. G. Stauffer.

Stauffer, Noah (1842-1928), a prominent minister in the Ontario Mennonite (MC) Conference, serving in the Weber congregation near Strasburg, one of the first to advocate evangelism and missions, a leading promoter of the Mennonite General Conference, and probably the first to use English regularly in his preaching of a half century. H.S.B.

Stauffer, Norman B. (1870-1927), the outstanding leader of the Alberta-Saskatchewan Mennonite (MC) Conference, ordained preacher in 1901 and bishop in 1911 at Aldersyde, Alberta. He had moved from Waterloo, Ont., to Alberta in 1900 in the early days of the colonization there. He died Sept. 13, 1927. H.S.B.

Stauffer, Otto, b. 19.. at Obersülzen, Palatinate, Germany, was sent out as a missionary of the Dutch Mennonite Mission Association in 1934; his field was at Kudus (q.v.) on the Indonesian island of Java. Here he was a successful missionary until 1940, when he was interned in the course of the war. On Jan. 18, 1942, the ship on which Stauffer and his brother-in-law and fellow missionary Hermann Schmitt (q.v.) were transported was torpedoed and both Schmitt and Stauffer found their graves in the waters of the Indian Ocean. Otto Stauffer was married to Martha Klaassen, a daughter of missionary Johann Klaassen (q.v.). vOZ.

Stauffer Mennonite Church (MC), a member of the Lancaster Conference, is located near Bachmanville in Conewago Twp., Dauphin Co., Pa. Michael Shenk, Benjamin Longenecker, John Risser, and the Lehmans were in this area in the latter half of the 18th century. The first meetinghouse was built about 1780. This was a part of the Risser congregation in Lancaster County, sharing its ministry. Before the meetinghouse was built Peter Risser preached for them in private dwellings. It early became a part of the present Noah W. Risser-Clarence E. Lutz Bishop District, with John Mumma as the first resident bishop. The present church was built on the same site in 1918. A well-kept cemetery adjoins the churchyard. The membership (1957) is 163, with J. Frank Zeager as pastor. An outpost at Sand Beach has developed into a permanent Sunday school and mission at East Hanover. I.D.L.

Stauffer Mennonite Church, a small Mennonite branch, began in 1845 as a schism from the Lancaster Mennonite Conference on the question of the treatment of an orphan child adopted by one of the members. Bishop Jacob Brubaker, of Juniata County, and Jacob Stauffer and Jacob Weber, preachers of Groffdale, could not concur in the decision of the bishops of the conference. Stauffer wrote a book of 430 pages of small format in self-defense and as an attack on the bishops of the conference. Its title is Eine Chronik oder Geschicht-Büchlein von der sogenannten Mennonisten Gemeinde. Zum Dienst und Lehre für alle Liebhaber der Wahrheit, durch die Gnade und Segen Gottes. Aus Geschichten, Vorfällen, Begebenheiten oder Exempeln, und aus heiliger Schrift zusammengezogen (Lancaster 1855, 1859, Scottdale 1922). Jacob Stauffer and Jacob Weber became the leaders of the new group, their membership being mostly in East and West Earl townships of Lancaster County and in Snyder County, Pa. The Pike meetinghouse (on the Lakes-to-Sea Highway, east of Hinkletown) was granted to the new group. It was later enlarged and is today their chief meetinghouse. Subsequently the following bishops also served: Michael Brubaker, David Stauffer, and John Stauffer, of Snyder County; Samuel Weaver, Moses B. Weaver, Aaron Sensenig, Jesse Bowman, John A. Weaver, and Weaver Zimmerman, the present bishop, from the Pike congregation.

In the spring of 1887 a group from four different Stauffer communities started a utopia near May City, Osceola County, Iowa, with Jesse Bowman, of Ontario, as the leader. This lasted about 27 years, and had 30 members at its peak. Elam C. Martin served as its bishop. In 1916 John A. Weaver led a schism from the Bowman group in Pennsylvania on the extent of shunning, dividing the congregation 101 to 102. In thirty years the old group dwindled to 40 members. Through social contacts of the young people with the young members of the Groffdale Old Order Mennonites many of the Iowa group, who settled near Myerstown, as well as those in Lancaster County, joined the Groffdale O.O.M. group.

Another schism, called the Rissler schism, occurred in 1860-80, because this group believed that all their children should be church members and in the order of the church by the age of twenty-one. This group, by losing their children, is now almost extinct.

In the early 1950's a three-way split occurred in Snyder County. The smallest group has three members, all Risslers, who meet in the home of the deacon, Moses R. Rissler. A larger group of 60 members uses the German language, prohibits automobiles, and has few conveniences. Their bishop is Weaver Zimmerman, and their minister Martin S. Weaver. This group is known as the Weaver Mennonite Church. The third or Bowman group also worships at the Pike meetinghouse and at Loveville in St. Mary's County, Md. It has 224 members. At the Pike meetinghouse the ministers are Jacob S. Stauffer bishop and Joseph O. Brubaker preacher. At Loveville the ministers are John M. Brubaker and Harry Stauffer. Three additional small groups in the Selinsgrove rural area of Pennsylvania are headed by Phares Stauffer, Aaron S. Martin, and Titus B. Hoover as bishops, and Jacob B. Stauffer, Noah W. Hoover, and Ira S. Martin as ministers. Locally the larger faction worshipping at the Pike meetinghouse are called Weaver Mennonites, the smaller one Stauffer Mennonites, and both are often called Pike Mennonites. All told, the descendants of the 1845 schism, now divided into six groups, number barely 300 members.

The children of this group are dressed plainly from childhood, somewhat like the Old Order Amish, the girls wearing aprons and bonnets, although the bonnets are slightly different.

The boys' clothing resembles that of the Amish, except that it has buttons instead of hooks and eyes. From the age of sixteen to twenty-five the boys often indulge in wild behavior and lose their plainness. Frequently they buy cars and are lost to their own church. The prosperous farms of the group have no tractors nor conveniences. They have no Sunday schools. Their worship services last about three hours. I.D.L.

Staveren, a small town in the Dutch province of Friesland (pop. 1,166 in 1947, with 112 Mennonites), has been the seat of a Mennonite congregation since early times. Elder Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized 20 persons here in 1551-54, about 9 in 1557-61, and 32 in 1563-65. These numbers indicate that there has been a congregation here since the middle of the 16th century, about whose history, however, there is only very scarce information. In the 17th century it belonged to the Waterlander branch. In 1612 the strict practices of its elder Rijk Jacobs (q.v.), who wanted to have all transfers from the Reformed Church rebaptized even if they had been baptized as adults, caused a serious conflict in the congregation. It seems to have led to a division of the congregation, one wing calling itself Frisian (i.e., more conservative) and the other High German (more liberal). When this schism was healed is not known, but it must have taken place before 1647, in which year the congregation was represented at the large Waterlander delegates' conference at Amsterdam. Some old record books (baptisms, death of members, resolutions) go back as far as 1643. In the 16th-18th centuries the congregation was always served by lay ministers chosen from the membership. The last of these was Abraham van der Werff, serving 1764-1807. Because his talents were very mediocre, and also because he was too conservative for most of the members, a resolution was passed in 1765 to call a second (lay) minister from outside. This was Cornelis de Jongh, a physician, who served at Staveren 1765-84. He was followed by Pieter Klomp 1784-98, J. W. van Douwen 1798-1812, and J. van der Boogh Bleeker 1815-20. In 1822-64 the congregation was served by the pastors of the neighboring church of Warns. In 1866 it obtained a pastor of its own, from 1873 at the same time serving at Molkwerum (q.v.), C. Leendertz serving 1866-73, G. Vrijer 1873-75, J. A. Oosterbaan 1876-78, P. K. Bijl 1879-81, A. A. Deenik Mz 1881-99, G. Wuite 1899-1901, H. Hooghiemster 1902-8, J. M. Erkelens 1908-13, J. G. Frerichs 1914-21, H. J. Busé 1922-27, Miss A. J. van den Ban 1927-32, and Miss M. de Boer 1932-39. Miss S. E. Treffers, serving at Staveren 1941-46, also had charge of the Hindeloopen (q.v.) congregation from 1942, as did also L. Laurensen, pastor of Staveren 1949-53. In 1953-57 the congregation was served by the pastor of Warns. In 1958 the congregations of Staveren, Hindeloopen, and IJlst (q.v.) decided to call one minister for the three congregations, and called J. Wieringa, who lives at IJlst.

Concerning the membership the following figures are available: in 1695 about 110 baptized members, in 1764 100, in 1838 25, in 1861 49, in 1900 89, and in 1958 50. The present meetinghouse dates from 1858; an organ was acquired in 1901. The congregation possesses three silver communion cups obtained in 1745. There is a Mennonite ladies' circle, a Sunday school for children, and a youth group.

Stecklin Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, located in Whitchurch Twp., York Co., Ont., was founded by several Steckley families living near Bethesda "store corners." Ministers supplied at eight-week intervals in one of the homes from about 1850, alternating with Huber (q.v.). It was common among the Tunkers of this county for most of a century to have periodic house services in homes remote from the church, a custom which the Mennonites of the area must also have followed. Stecklin and Huber discontinued after the building of the church at Almira in Markham Township in 1860. (See Bethesda). J.F.C.

Steel City Mennonite Church (MC), Bethlehem, Pa., is a mission congregation sponsored by the Franconia Mennonite Conference district mission board. Established in 1951, it had 40 members in 1957. M.G.

Steelton Mennonite Gospel Mission (MC) began in 1936, when a club building on South Second Street was rented for Sunday morning services. Tent meeting in the fall of 1936 with Stoner Krady as evangelist resulted in a number of responses. At the first baptismal service five were received.

Within a year another place for worship was provided in an Episcopal parish house on Pine Street. As the greater part of the growing Sunday school was from the west side of Steelton a store building was purchased on the west side at 304 Myers Street, by the Eastern Mission Board. The superintendents have been Ira Miller, Warren Metzler, Samuel Longenecker, Isaac M. Baer, and Russell J. Baer, who has been serving since 1953. The membership in 1957 was 45. F.N.H.

Steen (Het Steen, Den Steen), a castle on the Scheldt River at Antwerp, Belgium, was in the 16th century a prison and execution place of a large number of Anabaptist martyrs. At present it is a museum. The old dark cellars in which the martyrs were kept, often in heavy leg irons, may still be seen. (Antw. Arch.-Blad VIII, 355, note 1; DJ 1952, 21-29.) vdZ.

Steen, van (von), a Mennonite family of Dutch descent found in West Prussia, Germany, and particularly in Danzig from at least 1678. To this family belonged the Danzig elder Hans von Steen (q.v.). Willem van Steen, b. 1698, was expelled from the Tilsit Lowlands, East Prussia, in 1724, and moved to Dannenberg (q.v.), from where he was driven away in 1732. With a number of other families he then moved to the Netherlands, living at Wageningen (q.v.) in 1733-44, where the Dutch Mennonite Committee of Foreign Needs had established a settlement for twelve East Prussian Mennonite families. Willem van Steen, who administered the houses and the properties of these colonists at Wageningen, earned his living by weaving linen. After all his compatriots had gradually returned to Prussia, Willem van Steen also returned (1744). At Ershorst in the Prussian district of Schardau he wrote two letters to the Committee in Amsterdam. vdZ.

Steen, Hans von (1705-81), a Mennonite minister in West Prussia, was born March 9, 1705, in Neugarthen near Danzig, where his parents belonged to the Frisian Mennonite Church. His parents sent him to Amsterdam for business training; he was baptized there in 1726. After his return he joined the Flemish Mennonite Church of Danzig, married Sara Siemens in 1726, and established a small business and a brewery in Danzig. In 1738 von Steen was elected deacon, in 1743 minister, and was ordained as elder by Elder Hans Buhler on June 23, 1754. He did much to defend the legal rights of the Mennonites, who in those days were constantly threatened in various ways. The survival of the church during the difficult years of 1748-60 was due mostly to his efforts. His sermons were popular and attended by non-Mennonites. He was married three times and had seven children. Only three survived him. His first wife died in 1749 and the second, Elisabeth Tiessen, in 1751, after which he married Christina Loewen. In 1773 he suffered a stroke and in 1779 he was succeeded as elder by Peter Epp (ord. Jan. 30, 1780). On Sept. 21, 1781, he died.

Hans von Steen preached in Dutch and carried on an extensive Dutch and German correspondence. His archives were probably destroyed during World War II. In his later years he instructed the catechetical candidates in the German language. After von Steen the shift from the Dutch to the German language in worship, which he had opposed, made rapid progress. The customary funeral song for Hans von Steen was one of the first to be composed in the German language. C.K.

Steenkiste, van, a former Dutch Mennonite family, whose members came from Belgium to the Dutch province of Zeeland (Aardenburg, Middelburg, Vlissingen) about 1600; some lived at Haarlem, where a Pieter van Steenkiste, apparently a deacon of the Flemish church, was involved in the controversies between Lucas Filips (q.v.) and Vincent de Hondt (q.v.) about 1600. vdZ.

Steenwijk, a town (1947 pop. 8,677, with 171 Mennonites) in the Dutch province of Overijssel, the seat of a Mennonite congregation. This congregation had formerly its seat at Zuidveen (q.v.), a hamlet about two miles south of Steenwijk. For the early history of this church see Zuidveen. In 1848, since most of the members were then living at Steenwijk, a new meetinghouse and parsonage were built at Steenwijk, dedicated on May 4, 1848, by Koenraad Hovens Greve, then the pastor of the congregation. He served until 1862, and was followed by A. J. Bijl 1862-1904, E. Engelkes 1905-13, G. Fopma 1913-42, W. I. Fleischer 1942-46, Miss J. H. van der Slooten 1946-54, and H. J. de Wilde 1954.

The meetinghouse of 1848 is still in use; in 1896 it was provided with an organ. The membership, which was about 135 in 1848, was 129 in 1861, 190 in 1900, and 167 in 1958. Outstanding families of the Steenwijk congregation were the Rijkmans and Veen families. There is a ladies' circle.

During the 16th century there was some Anabaptist activity at Steenwijk. Elder Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized five persons here in 1552. (DJ 1850, 40; DB 1878, 1, 37; 1882, 118; 1896, 204.) vdZ.

He apparently was a follower of David Joris (q.v.). vdZ.

Steiger, Georg (b. 1814), came to the Emmental (q.v.), Switzerland, in early 1835 as an adherent of the revivalistic Samuel Fröhlich (q.v.). Steiger was very active among the Emmental Mennonites, who were at this time divided by the work of Fröhlich in 1832. Both Fröhlich and Steiger emphasized baptism by immersion, Steiger saying that "all are spiritually dead as long as they are not baptized by immersion." Among others he rebaptized Christian Baumgartner and Christian Gerber, both preachers of the Langnau Mennonite Church. Steiger worked among the Mennonites and also the Reformed, forming the Neutäufer (q.v.) movement. vbZ.

Steinabrunn, a village of Lower Austria, not far from Nikolsburg on the Moravian border, the seat of a Hutterite Bruderhof founded in 1537 following the great persecution of 1535. The group immediately chose Mathes Legeder, Gutenhenn Hans, Michel Blauer, and Michel Kramer as deacons. On Dec. 16, 1539, the brotherhood met to discuss the question of union with a group of Swiss Brethren led by Philipp Plener (q.v.). But the plan could not be carried out. The royal provost surprised them at night with troops and took 136 persons in chains, men, women, and youths, and imprisoned them in the Falkenstein (q.v.) castle, which at that time, together with Steinabrunn, belonged to the barons of Fünfkirchen. After eight days the marshal of Ferdinand appeared with several priests and the executioner and demanded information concerning their faith and the location of their money. They made a confession of their faith. The priests tried in vain to "convert" them. The prisoners were finally told that they would be tolerated if they would live in groups of not more than eight persons; but they refused these terms. At the beginning of the new year the provost returned and again challenged the Brethren to desist from their faith. Those who refused would be delivered to the imperial admiral Andrew Doria to serve as galley slaves on his warships in the Mediterranean in the war against the Turks. Ninety of them, most of them fathers, were taken away chained in pairs; then the sick and the women were released. The men were taken to Trieste; here they managed to escape by making a rope of their chains to let themselves down over the wall facing the sea. On their return journey twelve of them were seized in Lai-bach in Carinthia and taken back to Trieste; nothing more was ever heard of them. The brotherhood sent Jörg Meyerhofer to Trieste to look for them, but he did not find them. The rest of the fugitives reached Moravia, but three of them died soon after arrival.

The sufferings of the Anabaptists at Steinabrunn are described in several songs: Antoni Erfordter's (q.v.) "Geschichte der Verfolgung zu Steinabrunn" (14 stanzas), and Leonhard Roth's similar hymn (15 stanzas), and also in a hymn "To the imprisoned brethren in the Falkenstein" (29 stanzas). (ML IV.) Steinbach, a Mennonite village name found in Borozenko, Ukraine; East Reserve of Manitoba; Cuauhtemoc, Mexico; and Menno in the Paraguayan Chaco. (See Villages.) C.K.

Steinbach was the name of a large private estate near the Molotschna Mennonite settlement, Russia, established by Klaas Wiens, the first Oberschulze of the Molotschna settlement. Alexander I visited this estate in 1818 and was impressed by the successful planting of trees on the bare steppes. This was one of the reasons for the founding of the Molotschna Mennonite Agricultural Association (q.v.). The nephew of Klaas Wiens, Pieter Schmidt (q.v.), was also a successful cultural leader. He established a secondary school on the estate. His son Peter Schmidt continued the tradition. (Friesen, Brüderschaft, 158 ff., 167, 615.) C.K.

Steinbach is a Mennonite town located in the southeastern section of Manitoba. It almost totally occupies section 36 of township 6 and range 6E., with a part of the town outside of the section immediately to the west, and lies in the municipality of Hanover, near its eastern boundary. According to the 1955 census, Steinbach had a population of 2,350, of which 1,837 or some 82.7 per cent are Mennonites. The greater Steinbach area augments this figure to about 3,000. Steinbach was founded in 1874 by Kleine Gemeinde settlers who had just arrived from Russia. Today it has eight Mennonite churches all of Russian Mennonite origin, each with its own house of worship: the Evangelical Mennonite Church (Kleine Gemeinde), the Evangelical Mennonite Brethren, the Mennonite Brethren, the General Conference, Berghaler, Chortitzer (Steinbach branch), Immanuel Mission Church, and the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite (Holdeman). Three non-Mennonite churches have located in Steinbach in the last few years.

The town was incorporated in 1946. It is now the shopping center of a large community of Mennonites, serving some 10,000 Mennonites of the East Reserve. The town also has a Mennonite hospital (leased to a public hospital administration in 1957), Bible Institute, invalid home, MCC clothing depot, a Bible camp association, and a child welfare home. Steinbach Bible Institute, located at Steinbach, Man., is a school with a three-year course in Bible and a three-year course in secular secondary education accredited by the Department of Education of the Province of Manitoba. Its primary purpose is to prepare Christians for effective Christian service. The Steinbach Bible Institute had its beginning in the fall of 1931 as the Steinbach Bible School with classes, both day and evening, conducted by a Mennonite Brethren minister, Jacob W. Reimer, and a Mennonite Alliance minister, Isaac Ediger. The following year an Evangelical Mennonite Brethren minister, Henry P. Fast, replaced Ediger. Four years later (1936), under the sponsorship of seven men of the M.B. Church, classes were again begun in the local M.B. church under a new staff of two teachers.

In the fall of 1938 a Bible School Association (Bibelschulverein) was organized, composed of members of four Mennonite churches of Steinbach and vicinity, which elected a board of directors to operate the school. This meant that the school was now to be interdenominational. The following year the Bible School moved into its own property and classroom building, and by 1942 had some 42 students.

In the fall of 1946 a high-school curriculum was introduced, and the name changed to Steinbach Bible Academy. After a few years the high-school department was dropped, but was reinstated in the fall of 1953, when a new constitution was written and the administration changed from the Verein to a corporation of directors or self-perpetuating board, and the name was changed to Steinbach Bible Institute. The emphasis has also shifted from the building of Christian character and training Sunday-school teachers, to the training of young people for Christian service, especially missions, both home and foreign. As a result a large percentage of students and graduates are entering mission work.

In 1955 the school was moved to a new campus of some thirteen acres just outside Steinbach, with completely new classroom, laboratory, dormitory, dining, and library facilities. The school is now offering a three-year course in Bible and theology, a two-year course in Christian education, and grades ten, eleven, and twelve. Grade twelve is an accredited first-year college course. During the school year 1954-55 the school had 12 teachers, 98 students in the day classes, and 42 in the evening classes. In 1957-58 the day enrollment was 154. More housing has been provided since 1956. B. D. Reimer was long principal, followed by Archie Penner in 1958. † A.P.

Steinbach (Man.) Church of God in Christ Mennonite Church was organized in 1881 when a large part of the Kleine Gemeinde (q.v.) in this area, with the elder and half of the preachers, joined the Church of God in Christ, Mennonite. Worship services were conducted in homes and then in a school building until 1911, when a church building was erected which has a seating capacity of 400. Wilhelm Giesbrecht was in charge of the services from the beginning until his death in 1917. Neighboring ministers then served the congregation until 1921, at which time Gerhard F. Giesbrecht and Jacob F. Barkman were ordained to the ministry. The services, conducted in both German and English, include regular Sunday morning and evening services, Sunday school, midweek Bible study, Christian Endeavor, hospital services, and singing practices. The sewing circle takes an active part in missionary efforts. The membership in 1957 was 160, with A. P. Barkman as minister in charge, assisted by Gerhard F. Giesbrecht and Ronald Wiebe. J.F.Ba.

Steinbach (Man.) Evangelical Mennonite Brethren Church had its beginning in 1897, when four families organized a congregation, three of whom had previously been members of the E.M.B. Church in Minnesota and the fourth, converts from a series of meetings held in 1897 by H. E. Fast of Bingham Lake, Minn. A. F. Friesen was ordained as the first minister. After serious difficulties the very small congregation was reorganized and made a fresh start in 1908, followed by the coming of P. B. Schmidt as pastor in 1909. In 1912 a meetinghouse was built, and H. S. Rempel and P. B. Janz added to the ministry. Internal difficulties again arose and not until 1925 was the congregation on the way to sound prosperity. In 1939 it had risen to 250 members; in 1957 the number was 351. G. S. Rempel served as pastor for many years, being succeeded in 1957 by Sam Epp. H.S.B.

Steinbach Evangelical (Kleine Gemeinde) Mennonite Church, located at the east end of Steinbach, Man., was erected in 1912. Formerly meetings were held in the school building. The total baptized membership in 1955 was 400. A new church to seat 850 is in process of building near the 1912 church. Services are conducted in both German and English, sometimes concurrently. The baptized membership in 1958 was 490, with Archie Penner as the leading minister, assisted by P. D. Friesen, Jacob P. Dueck, and Benjamin D. Reimer. Heinrich Toews and David Schellenberg are serving in traveling evangelism and missionary work. D.P.R.

Steinbach Mennonite Brethren Church, located in Steinbach, Man., a member of the Manitoba and Canadian district conferences, was founded by immigrants from Russia in the 1920's. It was organized in 1927 with about 65 members; the first leading minister was G. H. Unruh, assisted by J. W. Reimer (q.v.). The first meetinghouse was a remodeled school. Later a church was built, which was enlarged in 1957 to seat about 550. In 1958 the leading minister was H. A. Regehr, assisted by William Schroeder, with a membership of 285. J.We.

Steinbach Mennonite Church (GCM), located at Hanover St., Steinbach, Man., a member of the Canadian Mennonite Conference, was organized in 1942, composed of 39 members of various congregations, but all of one conference, with 2 preachers. The meetinghouse was built in 1952, 80 x 38 ft., offering 500 seating places. In 1958 the congregation had 5 preachers and a deacon, with 233 baptized members; Henry P. Friesen was the pastor. Most of the older generation of the congregation are immigrants from Russia of the 1922 ff. immigrations. Most of them are farmers, some have trades, and one is the publisher of the Steinbach Post.

Steinbach Post, Steinbach, Man., an 8-page 15 x 32 in. (before 1947, 12 x 18 in.) weekly, published every Tuesday by Derksen Printers Ltd., was started in 1913 by Jacob S. Friesen. In 1924 Arnold (A. B.) Dyck became publisher and editor of the paper. In 1936 G. S. Derksen purchased the paper and became its editor. The Post contains world news as well as news from the Mennonite settlements of Manitoba and other provinces, and is read by Mennonites of Canada, Mexico, and Paraguay. The paper claims to be "the oldest Mennonite weekly founded in Canada." Since the death of G. S. Derksen (1957) Jacob H. Block has been the editor.

Steiner (Stoner), a Mennonite family of Swiss origin, found early in the communes of Signau, Langnau, Trachselwald, and Eggwil, in the canton of Bern. The first mention of a member of the family as Anabaptist was in 1538 when a Margaret Steiner was brought before the officials at Signau. Members of the family have figured in each of the Swiss Mennonite migrations. Christian Steiner (b. c1661), a deacon of Diesbach, was one of the emigrées to the Netherlands in 1711. In the early 18th century some moved to the Jura. By 1750 members of the family were found near Florimont in Alsace. A minister of the Swiss Mennonite congregation there, Hans Steiner, made several trips to the Palatinate with other ministers 1767-80 in an attempt to bring peace to two factions that had arisen in the Mennonite church there (see Amish Division).

In the 18th century some Steiners came to Pennsylvania. Most of their descendants have anglicized their name to Stoner. Descendants now live chiefly in Westmoreland, York, and Lancaster counties, Pa., and Virginia and Iowa. In 1825-35 several brothers and cousins, grandchildren of the above Hans Steiner of Florimont, settled near Kitchener, Ont., the Chippewa (now Crown Hill) settlement in northern Wayne County, Ohio, and in Putnam County, Ohio. Daniel Steiner became the first bishop of the Chippewa Swiss Mennonite congregation, and Christian Steiner was the first bishop of the Putnam County Swiss Mennonite congregation.

Christian P. Steiner (1832-1910), minister of the Riley Creek (q.v.) (later called Zion) Mennonite Church, Ohio, was one of the early instigators of a general conference in the Mennonite church (MC). Menno S. Steiner (q.v., 1866-1911), a son of Christian P. Steiner, was a Mennonite (MC) evangelist, missionary, leader, author, and first president of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities. He lived near Cranberry (now Rockport), Allen County, Ohio, and served with his father as minister of the Zion Mennonite Church. Another son of Christian P. Steiner was Albert Steiner, a bishop (MC) in Columbiana County, Ohio. Two of A. J. Steiner's sons are now serving as bishops, David at North Lima, Ohio, and John at Pleasant View near Goshen, Ind., while a third son, James, is pastor at Wadsworth, Ohio.

Ulrich Steiner (q.v., 1806-77) was an influential Mennonite elder in the Emmental (q.v.) Church. He had a glorious vision of heaven and wrote a pamphlet on this entitled Angenehme Stunden in Zion. This came into nearly every Swiss Mennonite home in the canton of Bern and America. D.L.G.

Steiner, Ezra Burkholder (1877-1955), a Mennonite (GCM) missionary, was born in Richland Twp., Allen Co., Ohio, on June 8, 1877, the oldest of the seven children (five sons and two daughters) of Sem and Barbara (Burkholder) Steiner. He married Elizabeth Geiger on Aug. 26, 1913. He attended Wheaton College, Wheaton, Ill., and Taylor College, Upland, Ind. He and his wife entered mission service under the General Conference Mennonite Mission Board in India in 1914. They left this mission in 1924 to work in a higher altitude in India which was more suited to his health. They built an independent mission at Dharchula, Almora District, U.P., India, near the Nepal and Tibet borders, supported by friends as well as the churches of their home community, and later by the Evangelical Missionary Association. They appealed especially to the Tibetan and Nepalese traders and residents of the area and built a thriving Christian church. Mrs. Steiner died in 1954 and he died Nov. 4, 1955. Their two children are now missionaries in India; Dr. Bradford Ezra Steiner is the superintendent of the Landour Community Hospital at Landour, and Anita Elizabeth (Mrs. Charles Warren), born 1921, and her husband carry on the work at Dharchula.

Steiner, Georg (also called Goldschmidt, i.e., Goldsmith), a goldsmith of Salzburg (q.v.), in whose house the local Anabaptists met in 1527. Hans Hut (q.v.) preached here several days and baptized Steiner among others, and lived with Steiner for ten days. Steiner became the treasurer of the congregation. Later Steiner was seized by the authorities of Salzburg. He recanted and was therefore put to death by beheading. His 16-year-old daughter, however, remained steadfast and died as a martyr by drowning.

Steiner, Menno Simon (1866-1911), a Mennonite (MC) preacher and leader, was born near Beavertown, Ohio, on April 30, 1866, a son of Christian Peter Steiner, a farmer-preacher, and Barbara Thut. He graduated from the Bluffton (Ohio) High School in 1887. Two years previously he had united with his home congregation, the Riley Creek Church (later called Zion), and soon felt a special call to the ministry.

While Steiner was teaching school (1887-90), John F. Funk (q.v.) in 1889 persuaded him to work for the Mennonite Publishing Company at Elkhart, Ind. During several summer vacations he traveled for this company among various branches of Mennonites. In letters, diaries, and in numerous articles in the Herald of Truth he revealed many of the needs and problems he discovered. In 1889 he became the first secretary of the Mennonite Book and Tract Society. He interrupted his career at Elkhart to attend Oberlin College for theological training (1891-92). In 1892 he helped John S. Coffman (q.v.) promote the important first general Sunday-school conference, held near Goshen, Ind. He was chosen moderator of the conference.

Early in 1893 Steiner was ordained to the ministry at Elkhart by Bishop John F. Funk. At the second general Mennonite Sunday-school conference in 1893 he was appointed to establish a mission in Chicago, also to edit a young people's paper. The Home Mission, which he founded in 1893, was the first city mission of the Mennonites in America. On April 8, 1894, he married Clara Daisy Eby. They opened a mission at Canton, Ohio, in January 1895, but remained there for only one year. Meanwhile, he began to hold evangelistic meetings, which occasioned his visits to many states and Canadian provinces. He was also the moving spirit (and sole president) in the organization of the Mennonite Board of Charitable Homes (q.v., 1889), which merged in 1906 with the Mennonite Evangelizing and Benevolent Board (q.v.) to become the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities (q.v.), of which he was the first president, serving until his death in 1911. He sought without success to include several smaller Mennonite branches (EMB, Central Conference) in this mission organization.

After 1897 he lived on a small farm east of Columbus Grove, Ohio, where he eked out a modest living, aided by his loyal wife and friends. He helped his father in ministering to the Zion Church, but he was often busy away from home on church work. Here four of his five children were born, namely, Esther A. (Mrs. J. C. Meyer), Luke E., Paul E., and C. Grace (Mrs. Ivan Hostetler). The oldest, Charity E. (Mrs. Lester Hostetler), was born at Canton, Ohio.

Steiner wrote two books, Pitfalls and Safeguards (1899), and a biography, John S. Coffman (1903). He was the first editor of the Young People's Paper (Elkhart, Ind.), serving from January 1894 to March 1895. He carried on a heavy correspondence in his capacity as president of the Mennonite Board of Missions and Charities and two antecedent boards, from 1899 until his death. He helped to organize several charitable institutions, particularly the Mennonite Old People's Home, established in 1901 near Rittman, Ohio.

He died at the Bluffton Sanitarium on March 12, 1911, and was buried in the Zion cemetery, west of Bluffton, Ohio. An obituary was published in the Gospel Herald on March 23, 1911.† E.S.M.

Steiner, Ulrich (1806-77), an elder of the Langnau congregation in Emmental, canton of Bern, Switzerland, was born near Trachselwald on Sept. 6, 1806. Later his father, Peter Steiner, bought a farm in the Lauperswil community, which Ulrich took over after his father's death. His ancestors had belonged to the liberal (?) group of Anabaptists in the Emmental while persecution was still raging. His parents did not join until in their later years. Ulrich attended catechetical instruction in the Reformed church at Trachselwald. When his parents joined the Mennonites he also began to attend their meetings, and at the age of nineteen he also joined the Mennonite congregation. Five years later he was chosen as preacher. In 1834 he married Elisabeth Wüthrich of Trub. In the following year he was ordained elder. This was soon after the schism in the Neutäufer (q.v.). He wrote about these difficulties in his booklet Angenehme Stunden in Zion. The light of the rising sun with its golden beams seemed to him a symbol of the old church, since it had through all the storms of persecution shone as a bright light, whereas he saw as a symbol of the Neutäufer (or Fröhlichianer) the light of the full moon.

In accord with the Anabaptist regulation of 1823 only the children of Anabaptists were allowed to join the Mennonites, and they were not to make any proselytes. But since others also came to Steiner's baptismal instruction he was accused by the Reformed pastor of proselyting and was imprisoned for several days. On another occasion he was fined on a similar charge. He presented a petition of complaint to the authorities, whereupon he was released.

Steiner's effectiveness in the brotherhood was richly blessed. His preaching was heart-winning, edifying, earnest, but gentle. Through his friendly nature he won many hearts. "Steiner Uli" was respected and loved far beyond the borders of his own brotherhood. He kept up an active correspondence with the Swiss Mennonites in America, especially with the Sonnenberg congregation in Wayne County, Ohio. His booklet Angenehme Stunden in Zion was also widely spread in America. A poem of his published in the Gemeinde-Kalender (1931) describes the state of those who have finished their course with blessing.

After a prolonged illness, Ulrich Steiner died on July 10, 1877. At his grave the Reformed pastor of Lauperswil recalled how much he had learned and received from this mature father in Christ.† S.G.

Steinman Amish Mennonite Church, located one mile west of the village of Baden on highway 7 and 8, in Waterloo County, Ont., is a member of the Ontario Amish Mennonite Conference, and with the St. Agatha congregation had a combined membership of 520 in 1957. The congregation, first called Wilmot, was organized about 1826.

In 1822 Christian Nafziger, of Bavaria, Germany, purchased land in Wilmot Township for settlement; he returned to Germany and brought his family and others of his congregation to Canada. During his absence a number of families from Pennsylvania moved to Wilmot and a congregation was organized. Most of the settlers however came directly from Europe, mostly Alsace and Lorraine. Names of some early settlers include Fahrni, Roth, Litwiler, Gardner, Miller, Gingerich, Steinman, Wagler, Oesch, Lichti, Gascho, etc.

The congregation worshipped in homes until 1884, when the Steinman meetinghouse was built. A year later another church was built one-half mile west of St. Agatha, and services were held alternately in the two buildings until 1939. Since then services have been held every Sunday in each church. The old Steinman church, a white frame building, was removed and replaced in 1946 by a new brick structure, with a seating capacity of 600. Pennsylvania-Dutch is still spoken at home, but church services are all in English.

The congregation is active in the support of missions, evangelism, and church schools.

The ministers serving the congregation in 1958 were: Moses O. Jantzi and Orland Gingerich, bishops; Peter Nafziger and Elmer Schwartzentruber, ministers. O.G.

Steinmetz, Georg (Jurriaen Steenmetser in Dutch Martyrs' Mirror), a German Anabaptist martyr, was beheaded in 1530 at Pforzheim in Württemberg. He left an effective admonition "for the comfort of all believers," found in the Martyrs' Mirror. It is not certain that he is actually the author of the hymn (No. 35 in the Ausbund), "Wir danken Gott von Herzen." (Mart. Mir. D 31, E 439; Wolkan, Lieder, 10; ML IV.) NEFF, W.W.

Stei(n)peck(h), Hanns, an Anabaptist martyr, a master mason, was beheaded and burned with Hans Neumair (q.v.) and six other Anabaptists, L. Haslinger and his wife, Jörg Zacherle and his wife, M. Perger, and Jörg Kreutzinger, on July 8, 1528, at Wels, Austria.

Steinreich Mennonite Brethren Church, located near Peabody, Marion Co., Kan., a member of the Southern District Conference, began in 1905 as an extension project of the Ebenfeld M.B. Church. Various ministers from Ebenfeld served the young church, among whom were H. W. Lohrenz and J. W. Lohrenz. The membership in 1957 was 40, mostly rural, with Franz Dick as pastor. The meetinghouse has recently been remodeled. M.L.W.

Steinsdorf, Hans, a German Anabaptist martyr, a master tailor of Schneeberg, Saxony, who could neither read nor write, was baptized by Peter Reusse (q.v.). He parted from his wife and five children who refused to accept his faith, left them the house and settled in another part of Schneeberg, and became the close friend of Hans Hamster (q.v.), a peasant with whom he discussed their common faith. In 1538 he was arrested with Heinrich Tritschel of Saalfeld, his apprentice, who had accepted the Anabaptist faith and attracted the attention of the authorities by his irrational demeanor. They were questioned. The apprentice recanted, and Hans Steinsdorf was led to the castle prison in Zwickau. Here he was frequently visited by the local clergy, who tried in vain to convert him. He asked to be banished from the country, promising never to return. The elector refused to grant this wish, but on Aug. 28, 1538, ordered Wolf Böhm in Zwickau to re-examine Steinsdorf on a number of points on which he had already given specific information. Steinsdorf remained true to his faith. When he was asked where he would go if he were released he replied, "wherever he were commanded by the Heavenly Father, there he would gladly be. If it should be God's will he would stay with his wife and children. But if he was obliged to die for his faith, he would willingly submit." The examination revealed that Steinsdorf thought infant baptism nothing; children, born with a pure spirit, need no baptism. If they die young they are saved. Christ was not baptized as a child. Likewise also all the apostles. Body and blood have a spiritual meaning in the communion service. Elector John Frederick sent this confession of the two Anabaptists, Steinsdorf and Hamster, to the court at Wittenberg for decision. The court was unable to arrive at a decision, but ordered that the Anabaptists be questioned once again. Nothing more is known about the case, but it can be assumed that Steinsdorf and Hamster were beheaded. NEFF.

Stemen (Stehmann), Henry (1775-1855), one of the first Mennonite settlers to move from Rockingham County, Va., to the Rush Creek region in Richland Twp., Fairfield Co., Ohio, was ordained preacher there in 1809 and bishop in 1820. Christian Stehmann, Henry's father, had moved to Rockingham County from Pennsylvania. Before leaving Rockingham County, Henry Stemen had married Mary Beery, whose brothers were among the charter members of the Dunkard congregation organized in Fairfield County in 1809. Henry and Mary Stemen followed the usual route traveled by Virginia settlers "going West"—up the Potomac and into Pennsylvania along "Braddock's trail," and after stopping for a year or two in Greene County, Pa., arrived in Fairfield County, Ohio, in 1803. The county grew rapidly; the first actual settlers arrived in 1798, and in 1806 the county listed 1,551 taxpayers. In 1841 Stemen moved to Allen County, Ohio, where a Mennonite congregation had been organized several years earlier. For a number of years he seems to have been the only Mennonite bishop in the central, western, and northwestern sections of the state. His ministry was noted for his earnest and expressive sermons. In a very real sense he became an itinerant preacher. Saddling one of his well-kept horses, he would ride through wilderness, mud, and storm from settlement to settlement in Wyandot, Wood, Seneca, Williams, Clark, Logan, Fairfield, and Franklin counties. On these tiring pastoral trips he preached, baptized, held communion services either with an outlying congregation or with a single family living far from a congregation of their own faith. He preached funeral sermons over the graves of those who had been quietly laid away months before because no minister could be called in time for the burial. He ordained bishops, preachers, and deacons and organized congregations on the frontier. In 1843-44 he attended a church conference in the Chester meetinghouse, in Wayne County. On at least one occasion he rode horseback to the Ohio Mennonite Conference in Mahoning County. He made numerous trips to Fairfield County until he ordained John M. Brenneman (q.v.) bishop in Franklin County. In 1853 he ordained George Brenneman bishop as his successor, but shortly before his death in 1855 he persuaded John M. Brenneman to move to Allen County and formally installed him as his successor. Most of Henry Stemen's descendants, impatient with the conservative policies of the "unlearned" John M. Brenneman, united with other denominations and rose to prominent positions in the professions in Allen and Van Wert counties. His son Nicholas Stemen (1802-78), however, was a deacon in the Fairfield County Mennonite church. J.S.U.

Stemen Mennonite (MC) Church (now extinct), located near Pickerington, Franklin Co., Ohio. The meetinghouse was built about 1890 by Benoni Stemen, a wealthy farmer and successful breeder of Galloway cattle. He settled his children on farms around his own and sought to revive the declining interest in the Mennonite faith. But efforts to establish a Sunday school failed; the young people preferred the services in the "English" churches, and the building, falling into disuse, was sold and the benches removed to the Turkey Run Mennonite Church (q.v.) in Perry County. Stenfort (Stenfoort, Stenvoort), a former Dutch Mennonite family, apparently had its origin in (Burg)Steinfurt, Westphalia, Germany. Members of this family lived at Haarlem, Holland, in the 17th-18th centuries, and Salomon Stenfoort was a preacher of Amersfoort and Bunschoten about 1700. (Inv. Arch. Amst. II, No. 1522.) vdZ.

Stenvers, a Dutch Mennonite family descended from a family of (Burg)Steinfurt, Westphalia, Germany.

Since the early 17th century a branch lived at Enschedé (q.v.) in the textile business, and later textile manufacture; a number of them served as deacons of the Mennonite church. Sometime later its members were also found in other Mennonite congregations. Kl. Stenvers was treasurer of the Deventer (q.v.) Mennonite congregation about 1900. In the 17th century the name Stenvers was also spelled Stenforts or Stenvorts. They may have belonged to the same branch as the Stenfort (q.v.) family. vdZ.

Stenz, Hans, a Mennonite preacher in Aargau, Switzerland, a native of Setzwyl, but living in Kulm, a peasant, the father of five children, was arrested and sent to Bern, where he was tried with Martin Bruger (q.v.) on March 1 and 6, 1645, and March 2, 1646. On Jan. 7, 1648, he had to answer to nine questions which were sent to him: separation, proclamation of the Word through preachers of the established church, the significance of the Old Testament, infant baptism, attitude toward government, holding of government office, interest, tithes, taxes, etc., the right to wage war, the oath, and the punishment of wicked persons. He gave excellent replies, which can be taken as the position of the Mennonites of the time. On Jan. 13, 1648, they were again examined and asked whether they would not return to the church. Then Stenz replied that he could not burden his conscience, but would rather give his blood, if the Lord would give him grace; but he asked the government to be merciful. The council of Bern (q.v.) was determined to send them to the galleys as obstinate heretics; but "to spare their souls" they were put into the penitentiary in Zürich. Hans Stenz escaped and was caught; he was expelled and forced to promise that he would never return. He left with his wife and children; nothing more is known of him. NEFF.

Sterling Evangelical Mennonite Church (EMC), Sterling, Kan., had its origin in 1880, when members of the Defenseless Mennonite congregations of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois moved into Kansas. They began meetings in the homes, and in about 1883 organized a church with Jacob Schmucker and John Doetsch as ministers. In 1885 a church was built 11 miles southwest of Sterling, which was used until 1912, when the present church was built. In 1933 the church celebrated Jacob Schmucker's fifty years as pastor of the church. In 1948 the name was changed from Defenseless Mennonite to Evangelical Mennonite Church. The membership in 1955 was 152, with Arthur Enns as pastor. A.Sc.

Sterling Mennonite Church (GCM), Wayne County, Ohio, was founded by Peter Rich and his friends after he had been excommunicated by the Oak Grove Amish Mennonite Church (q.v.) in 1869 for refusing to quit his business of brewing beer. After his excommunication Rich attended services in Butler County, Ohio, and between 1896 and 1901 while H. P. Krehbiel was attempting to revive the Canton Mennonite Church as a G.C.M. congregation he attended there. Finally in 1900 the Rich-Krabill group in Sterling was organized as a congregation by G.C.M. ministers and held services in a small church near the Amwell (Sterling) cemetery where Rich and a number of his relatives are buried. When that building was sold and moved away the congregation in 1906 erected a small church at the south edge of Sterling but depended on supply ministers sent by the Home Mission Committee of the Conference or on the ministers of the Wadsworth First Mennonite Church. The congregation is first listed in the 1905 Mennonite Yearbook and Almanac as a member of the Middle District Conference. In H. P. Krehbiel's statistical computation of 1911 (Mennonite Churches of North America) the congregation appears without a minister but with Peter Krabill as deacon and with 40 members. From that time until 1920 the membership fluctuated between 38 and 43. During the decade following 1920 the congregation disbanded, sold their meetinghouse to a Progressive Brethren congregation, and most of the members united with the Wadsworth Mennonite (GCM) Church. Their strong Swiss-Alsatian Mennonitism brought new emphasis and strength to that congregation. J.S.U.

With him two other men, Sijbrant Jansz and Hendrik Gijbsbertsz, and two women, Femmetgen Egberts and Welmoet Jans, were put to death, the three men by beheading, the women by drowning in the Zuiderzee, with heavy stones around their necks. They were arrested in March 1535; all remained steadfast, refusing to yield their faith in spite of the efforts of Catholic clergy. They declared that they did not regret their baptism after the order of Christ, i.e., being baptized unto remission of sins, putting on the Lord Jesus Christ (Rom. 13:14), and obtaining a good conscience toward God (I Pet. 3:21). Their execution shocked the citizens of Hoorn, and even some of the city magistrates, who knew them as good people, were greatly excited. vDZ.

Stevensz, Jan (also called J. S. van Nyeveen), b. May 1634 at Nijeveen, Dutch province of Drente, d. after 1686, a weaver of Kampen. In 1672 he moved to Amsterdam, where he was the city lamplighter. He was always in need, and he was often generously aided by the deacons of the Amsterdam Lamist (q.v.) Mennonite congregation, of which he was a member. Stevensz was a difficult and quarrelsome person. For some time he was an ardent follower of the Amsterdam Lamist preacher Galenus (q.v.) Abrahamsz, but still greater and more lasting was his veneration of the German theologian and mystic Jakob Böhme. About 1682 Stevensz left the Mennonite Church.

Stevensz wrote some books; e.g., Apocalypsis ofte Het geopende Boeck met seven segelen (Amsterdam, 1675), Fondament-boeck, of Grondigh bewijs van de Kennisse Godts en de Christelijke Godsdienst (Amsterdam, 1683). In this book Stevensz published two letters of Menno Simons—the one to the brethren in Franeker and the one to the congregation of Emden. In one of the appendices to this book he accused Galenus Abrahamsz of false teachings and unchristian conduct. A third book by Stevensz is Onderwys door Exempelen ofte Spiegel der lijdsame Heyligen (Amsterdam, 1686), of which there is a second enlarged edition under the revised title Aenhangsel ofte Vervolg van het Martelaers-boeck van Tieleman van Braght (Amsterdam, 1686), in which he contributes a number of items on Luther, Menno Simons, and some persons of his own time who met with revilement because of their religious convictions. This book, like its author, is not very important. vdZ.

Stevensville Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct, located 10 miles west of the Niagara River in the northern part of Bertie Twp., Welland Co., Ont., grew out of a settlement of Mennonites early in the 19th century. Among these are the names of Haun, Baker, Barnheart, House, Beam, Danner, Carver, Eberly, Schisler, Learn, Johnson, and Winger. There was a community-built church a few miles west of Stevensville where Mennonites took chief interest. Jacob Krehbiel of Clarence Center came regularly to preach from about 1872 and continued during his more active years. John B. Hershey of the Sherkston congregation about 6 miles south conducted some services; also David Sherk of the United Brethren Church. After Jacob Krehbiel withdrew from the Mennonite Conference (MC) in Ontario to the General Conference Mennonites about 1880, this group organized under him and built a new church in Stevensville. Abram Johnson conducted singing schools in the old log church in the interval before it was dismantled about 1885. The family names may be identified in two cemeteries, one on the Barnheart property (log church), the other in the Haun cemetery on the west outskirts of Stevensville. After Krehbiel discontinued regular services the Church of God congregation took over the use of the church. J.C.F.

Steyr, a city in Upper Austria, famous as a center of the Austrian steel industry ever since the Middle Ages, with a wealthy and proud citizenship. During the 14th and 15th centuries there existed in this city large and influential Waldensian congregations. Although no recorded ties between Waldensians and Anabaptists can be produced, connections are most probable. It is noteworthy, for instance, that an Anabaptist congregation existed in Steyr as early as 1526, of unknown origin, for when Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.) passed through the city on his way from Zürich to Nikolsburg he found a small congregation shepherded by the chaplain of the "imperial castle," Johann Portner. Portner one year later (1527) introduced Hans Hut to the patricians of this city. Hut had arrived from Nikolsburg and Vienna on his big mission trip (ending in Augsburg in the same year), and immediately began an intensive activity among the well-established burghers of this city. Meetings were held in the house of the respected patrician Veith Pfeffel; another patrician, Leonhard Khoberer, was converted. When Hut was on trial in Augsburg and questioned about his activities, he claimed to have baptized 10 or 12 persons "in Eysenstadt" (Steyr) (Meyer, 226), but the number of converts was certainly far greater than that figure. The city council became disturbed, imprisoned several persons without much ado, and reported the whole situation to Vienna. King Ferdinand I (q.v.) was shocked and decided to eradicate the evil. On Oct. 31, 1527, the royal procurator Magister Wolfgang Künigl (q.v.) arrived in Steyr and began at once with examinations in an attempt to reverse the trend. Some men remained steadfast; others were willing to recant but were repelled by the brutality of the "Penance of Horb" (q.v.), the prescribed ritual of renouncing the Anabaptist faith and all the subsequent penalties connected with it. Even Künigl sensed that this formula was utterly disreputable and petitioned the king not to insist on it; he feared rebellion and foresaw that many would escape only to continue their "heresy" elsewhere.

The court passed the surprisingly mild sentence of several months' imprisonment, deeming this lenience necessary for new attempts at reconversion. Six men yielded not a whit, a few others expressed doubt concerning the deity of Christ, while the majority confessed the simple Apostolic Creed. The king overruled the mild sentence and asked for the names of the jurymen who had not voted for the death penalty. He ordered the execution of all who were obstinate; consequently six men were martyred during Lent and nine more in May 1528, a total of 15 executions. It was expected that this measure had broken the strength of the Steyr Anabaptists.

But ten years later, in 1537-41, Anabaptists were again in Steyr, when the Hutterite chronicle reports the presence of "Philippites" (q.v.). Riedemann and other Hutterites visited them now and then, and a few men went to Moravia to discuss a possible merger. Among those mentioned was Wolf Brandhuber, apparently the son of the former leader of the Linz congregation (see Brandhuber). Whether or not community of goods was practiced remains undisclosed. Unfortunately these Philippites had no real leader, thus disorder set in and in 1541 the group broke up. Some went to the Hutterites in Moravia; the majority, however, turned either Catholic or Lutheran. The Chronicle, in its table of martyrs of the year 1542, records for this city of Steyr a total of 30 martyrs, the greatest number in Upper Austria next to Linz.

For some thirty years after this the records are mute concerning Anabaptism. But then, all of a sudden, new troubles arose in this thoroughly Lutheran city. Around 1570 the records mention "subversive" activities, even among members of the city council. The trouble is blamed on missionaries from Moravia, though it cannot be proved. There is mention of secret meetings for adult baptism and the celebration of the Lord's Supper, but things remain somewhat obscure. Particularly embarrassing to the city fathers was the case of the two patrician families of Fäbl and Khoberer in 1575. Hans Fäbl, a goldsmith, refused to have his child baptized, and even abused the Lutheran preachers. In this he was supported by his friend Wolf Khoberer, son-in-law of an influential and wealthy council member. It is reasonable to assume that Anabaptist teachings prompted this attitude. The city council felt it necessary to put them into the Tower, primarily to avoid any impression that Lutheranism meant liberty of conscience. Soon, however, influential personalities intervened and the two men were released. Khoberer made his peace with the city fathers, but the more stubborn Fäbl was eventually expelled from the city in 1580. It was the last record in Steyr of Anabaptist ideas or activities. Stichting Voor Bijzondere Noden in de Doopsgezinde Broederschap en Daarbuiten (Foundation for Special Needs in the Mennonite Brotherhood and Beyond) is a Dutch Mennonite foundation founded on June 3, 1947, upon the instigation of A. P. van de Water, who was its first president. This foundation aims to give relief in special needs, both material and spiritual, which are the result of world conditions; it also continues the work formerly done by the Committee for Foreign Needs (see Fonds voor Buitenlandsche Nooden). It is administered by a board (present director is R. de Zeeuw); there are a number of subcommittees for the different branches of the work and contact persons in every Dutch Mennonite congregation. This foundation represents the Dutch Mennonites in the International Mennonite Relief.

Its activities include the Children's Home at Oud-Wulven (q.v.) near Houten (1947-58, and now at Schoorl); the care of a number of displaced persons from Eastern Europe; continued care for fatigued housewives, who are temporarily lodged in one of the Mennonite brotherhood homes; since 1958 the care of 30 aged repatriating Dutch Indonesians, lodged in a special house at Baarn. During 1953-54 extensive relief was given to the victims of the flood which struck large areas in Holland on Feb. 1, 1953.

Among the international relief projects are to be mentioned aid to the Mennonite refugees everywhere; material and spiritual aid to the Mennonite congregation of Berlin (q.v.) through the Mennoheim; and support to the Mennonites behind the Iron Curtain. The foundation also supports the activities of Mennonite Voluntary Service and co-operates with other churches and groups in the Foundation of Ecumenical Relief to Churches and Refugees operating in Hungary, Greece, Poland, and Italy. It receives its funds from the Pentecost offering held in all the Mennonite congregations (annual proceeds about 60,000 Dutch guilders) and collects food and clothing (processing center at Groningen) regularly for Berlin, and formerly in connection with the Dutch Peace Group also for Emden and Vienna. Stichtsche Presentatie. During the conflict between the Frisian and Flemish Mennonites in the Netherlands in 1566-68, a group of congregations "in't Sticht van Overysseel," i.e., in the northwestern part of the Dutch province of Overijssel, at first remained neutral, but in September 1568, after Frisians and Flemish had banned each other, they asked to have the whole matter reviewed. This reconsideration took place at a meeting of elders held in the fall of 1568. Thereupon the "Stichtschen" formulated their opinion in an extensive missive, the "Stichtsche Presentatie" (also called "Grote Stichtsche Presentatie," "Stichtsche Aenwys," or "Stichtsche Wtsprake"). This was a well-documented letter of advice of about 260 paragraphs, dated Jan. 3, 1569. The original is lost. Extracts are found in J. Outerman, Onder Verbeteringhe. Verclaringhe met bewijs (Haarlem, 1634). The Stichtsche congregations, though lamenting the schism, declared in this statement that they chose the side of the Flemish. (DB 1893, 72-79.) vDZ.

Stiens, a village in the Dutch province of Friesland, formerly the seat of a Mennonite congregation, which also was known as the Stiens and Hijum congregation. In 1635 this congregation numbered about 35 baptized members, most of whom, however, lived at Hijum (q.v.). These Mennonites of Hijum joined the Hallum (q.v.) congregation in the 18th century or even earlier. Then the Stiens congregation, which always was small and which never had a meetinghouse and no preacher after 1704, died out about 1725. Elder Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.) baptized one person at Stiens about 1552. Since Nov. 1, 1951, there has been a Mennonite circle (Kring) at Stiens, to which 20 Mennonites belong; they hold their meetings every two weeks. The pastors of the neighboring congregations of Oudebildtziyl (q.v.) and Hallum take care of the Stiens circle. (Blaupot t. C., Friesland, 244, note 95; DB 1912, 82.) vDZ.

Stignitz, a village in the district of Mährisch-Kromau, Moravia, in the domains of Sigmund von Zástrizl, in which there was a Bruderhof of the Hutterian Brethren. The inhabitants were attacked by soldiers and ruffians on Jan. 6 and 7, 1622, soon after the treaty of peace of Nikolsburg, and were severely mistreated. One brother was tortured, another was hanged, but cut down again; a third was set on burning coals and died in consequence, a fourth was cut down, and the women were raped. Finally they turned all the inhabitants, the sick, the aged, and the children out into the cold. Four feeble persons froze to death. The rabble escaped with the plunder and burned the house down. On Jan. 30, 1622, the Brethren were again attacked by troops and plundered. In October 1622 the Brethren were banished from Stignitz, leaving all their possessions behind. They found refuge in Hungary at Dubnitz and Zobelhoff (Soblahov). The Zobelhoff Bruderhof was bought of Hieronymus Thaus on Dec. 6, 1622, for 150 talers. (Beck, Geschichts-Bücher; ML IV.)

Stijl, a Mennonite family formerly found at Harlingen, Dutch province of Friesland. Its members, most of whom were engaged in trade and manufacture, were related by marriage to other Mennonite families of Harlingen like Hannema, Hanekuik, and Oosterbaan. Johannes Stijl, b. 1758 at Harlingen, d. there June 15, 1802, studied at the University of Franeker and the Amsterdam Mennonite seminary and served as pastor in the Mennonite congregations of Emmerich 1786-88 and Makkum 1788-92. The most prominent member of this family was Simon Stijl (1731-1804), a practicing physician at Harlingen, and the author of some important literary and historical works; he did not join the Mennonite Church.

Stijtngen van Aken, an Anabaptist martyr, was drowned at the Steen Castle at Antwerp, Belgium, on Dec. 12, 1558, after she had been severely tortured some days before. Stijtngen, whose official name was Stijtngen de Hont (or Honts), was a native of Antwerp. She died valiantly as did the three other women martyrs who were executed at the same time. Their names are found in the hymn "Aenhoort God, hemelsche Vader" (Hear, O God, heavenly Father), found in the Lietboeckken. Particulars are lacking.

Stijtngen Evertsdochter, of Deventer, a Dutch Anabaptist woman, who had also lived at Leiden and Gent, was arrested at Amsterdam in May 1552 together with some 20 other Mennonites. Most of them died as martyrs, but Stijtngen, who had not yet received baptism upon her faith, recanted and was banned from the city. There is no reason to mention her here except for some valuable information she gave the judges concerning the singing of hymns by the Mennonites. She quoted a number of these hymns.

Both Stijtngen and her daughter Guert Jansdochter (q.v.), executed at Alkmaar on Feb. 6, 1538, are thought to have been adherents of the revolutionary leader Jan van Batenburg (q.v.). (*Inv. Stijtngen Jans, of Rotterdam, Holland, was arrested there in 1558. During her trial on Feb. 20 and March 19 she admitted that for about three years she had belonged to the Rotterdam Anabaptist congregation, which met at the Houttuyn. She had been (re)baptized about 1552 at Utrecht by Elder Leenaert Bouwens (q.v.). Stijtngen, forty years of age and a native of Maurik in the Dutch province of Gelderland, boldly rejected the Roman Catholic doctrine of the Mass. On March 28, 1558, after Jan (q.v.) Hendriks, an Anabaptist martyr, had been put to death before the city hall of Rotterdam, a riot arose among the spectators against the executioner and the city officials; they took the corpse of Jan Hendriks off the scaffold and then attacked the city hall. On this occasion four Anabaptists imprisoned there were liberated by the rebelling crowd; one of the liberated prisoners was Stijtngen Jans, concerning whom there is no further information. (Mart. Mir. D. 191-96, E 575-78; DB 1903, 3; 1905, 172.)

Stijtngen Vercoilgen, an Anabaptist martyr, burned at the stake on April 22, 1569, at Kortrijk (Courtrai) in Flanders, Belgium. Van Braght's Martyrs' Mirror erroneously gives March 9, 1569, as the execution date. The official name of this martyr was Josyne Andries (dochter), wife of Rougier van Quoilge. Although she had wanted to join the Mennonite congregation of Kortrijk (q.v.) since 1567, she was not baptized until the end of 1568. She was tortured on March 1, 1569, but remained steadfast, and refused to name her fellow members. Though information is scarce, we may conclude that this martyr was well-to-do, since her property was confiscated. During the execution special measures were taken to guard the site, apparently because the magistrates feared intervention from sympathizing spectators. (*Mart. Stilstaanders, the designation of the Dutch Mennonites who, in 1566-68 during the Frisian-Flemish quarrels and schism, wished "to stand still," i.e., to remain neutral, siding neither with the Frisians nor the Flemish. They were banned by both groups. Most of them soon after joined the Flemish. According to V. P., Successio Anabaptistica, Stilstaanders were particularly found in Cleve, Germany, and in the Dutch provinces of South Holland and Friesland. Best known is the attitude of the Zierikzee (q.v.) congregation, which was also neutral, and presented its reasons for this position in the book

Een Christelijke Proeve, of 1570. They accused both parties of a lack of love and brotherliness and exhorted them to singleness of heart, sobriety, contrition, and peace. But this truly Christian admonition had no success at all; both parties were blinded and the schism lasted for nearly a century. vDZ.

Stinstra, a former Dutch Mennonite family, now died out. Its origin is at Harlingen, Friesland, where most of them lived and where they were found from at least the early 17th century. Until about 1680 this family bore the family name of Gerlof(s). Symon Johannes (1673-1743) was the first to take the family name of Stinstra. He was born at Harlingen, and conducted an important lumber business there. He was well-to-do, a member and apparently a deacon of the Harlingen Mennonite congregation, and in 1722-39 treasurer of the Mennonite conference of Friesland (FDS). He was married to Trijntje Gooijens Braam, of an old Harlingen Mennonite family. Among their children were the preacher Johannes Stinstra (q.v.) and Gooijten (Goethius) Stinstra (1705?-64), who was a physician at Harlingen. Their daughter Grietje Stinstra was married to Evert Heeres Oosterbaan and was the mother of the Mennonite professor Heere Oosterbaan (q.v.). Simon Stinstra (c1735-82), married to Anna Braam, was a son of Gooijten Stinstra and like his father a physician at Harlingen. Another son of Gooijten Stinstra was Pieter Stinstra (1747-1819), who studied theology at the University of Franeker and the Amsterdam Mennonite seminary and served as pastor of the Mennonite church of Franeker in 1770-1800. He was a man of great learning. In 1786 he was asked to take a professorship at the Amsterdam Mennonite seminary, but he refused. The Amsterdam archives have a number of handwritten sermons by Pieter Stinstra. In 1800 he retired and settled in Harlingen, where he died.

Other members of this Stinstra family were A. Stinstra, d. 1847, burgomaster of Franeker; both Johannes Stinstra of Franeker, d. 1842, owner of brickworks, and Simon Stinstra, a lawyer at Harlingen, were trustees of the Dutch General Mennonite conference (ADS), in 1840-42 and 1844-63 respectively. Miss Sytske Stinstra, d. Feb. 26, 1900, at Franeker, willed to the congregation of Franeker her stately house and a considerable sum of money.

By marriage the Stinstra family was related with other Mennonite families, particularly of Harlingen, such as Braam, Oosterbaan, Schellingwou, Wybenga, Huidekoper, Fontein, and Yzenbeek. vDZ.

Stinstra, Johannes, b. Aug. 10, 1708, at Harlingen, d. there Jan. 8, 1790, a son of Symon Johannes Stinstra and Trijntje Gooijens Braam, was a Dutch Mennonite pastor and theologian, studied theology, philosophy, and oriental languages at the University of Franeker 1726-c33. After his study he returned to Harlingen; in the fall of 1733 he was invited by the board of his home church to preach four sermons a year. In 1735 he was appointed full-time pastor of this congregation, serving it until 1785. He rejected two calls by the Amsterdam Lamist congregation and one by the Haarlem Peuzelaarsteeg church. In 1739-40 Stinstra, then the moderator of the Mennonite Conference of Friesland (FDS), presided at the meetings which considered the suspension of two Mennonite preachers, Wytse Jeens (Brouwer) and Pieke Tjommies (q.v.), by the Frisian States on the charge of some Reformed pastors that they had taught Socinian (q.v.) doctrines. They had refused to sign a formulary drawn up by the States of Friesland, because as a matter of principle they were not willing to sign formularies or confessions, the Scriptures for them as Mennonites being the only source of faith. In behalf of the two preachers and the maintenance of religious freedom Stinstra drew up a defense in the name of the conference, which was published (three editions, all at Leeuwarden, 1741) and presented to the government of Friesland. Its title was Request (q.v.) met bygevoegde Deductie voor het Regt van Vryheid van Geloove, Godsdienst en Conscientie op den naam van de Doopsgezinde Gemeenten in Friesland ingeleverd aan de E. M. Heeren Staaten der gemelde Provincie (Request with Following Deduction in Behalf of the Right of Freedom of Religion, Worship and Conscience, in the Name of the Mennonite Congregations of Friesland, Presented to Their Highness, the States of the foresaid Province). This request was opposed and attacked by D. Gerdes (q.v.), G. Kulenkamp (q.v.), A. Driessen, and some anonymous Reformed authors, whose publications urged the States of Friesland to take measures against the Mennonites of Friesland, since they were infected with the heresies of Socinus.

In the meantime Stinstra, wishing to supplement the Request by developing his ideas from the Scriptures, had published five sermons, entitled De natuure en Gesteldheid van Christus Koninkrijk ... (Harlingen, 1741, and reprinted) and a separate booklet Byvoegzel van Aanteekeningen over de vyf Predicationen (n.p., n.d.-1741). Now the attacks of the Reformed turned directly against Stinstra. A number of Reformed authors, including Gerdes and J. van den Honert (q.v.), tried to prove that the author of the "Vijf Predicationen" was a Socinian whose teachings should not be tolerated. Stinstra's book was also discussed in the Reformed synods and in the summer of 1742 an official Reformed charge was made against Stinstra. The government of Friesland ordered that the book by Stinstra be examined by the theological faculties of several Dutch universities. The judgment of all universities was that Stinstra's book did contain Socinian ideas; only Venema of the Franeker University, whose lectures Stinstra had attended while studying at Franeker, declared that the Christian views of his pupil were sound. Thereupon the government of Friesland on Jan. 13, 1742, forbade Stinstra to preach, and not withstanding several petitions by his church board, by the conference of Friesland, and by Stinstra himself, the suspension was not rescinded.

until 1757. During his enforced rest Stinstra regularly wrote and circulated sermons, which were published in two volumes under the title Vier en Twintig Leerredenen (Harlingen, 1746). He also devoted much time to study, his special field being the philosophy of ethics. Stinstra was a man of moderate views and was particularly drawn toward the contemporary liberal theology of English authors like J. Tillotson, James Foster, and particularly Samuel Clarke (q.v.), whose sermons Stinstra translated into Dutch: Predikatiën over verscheidene stoffen, 11 vols., 1739-49. Stinstra also translated into the Dutch three moralistic novels by the English novelist Samuel Richardson (q.v.), with whom he kept up a correspondence.

Besides these translations and the Vier en Twintig Leerredenen, he also published a few sermons on special occasions, three volumes of sermons, Oude Voorspelingen aangaande den Messias . . . toegepast op den Heere Jesus . . . (Harlingen, 1779-86), refutations of the books by J. van den Honert and other opponents, and together with his co-preachers the Harlinger Vraagboek (q.v.), a catechism published at Harlingen in 1751. Being opposed to the Moravian Brethren (in the Netherlands usually called Hernhutters, q.v.), and their doctrines, he published Waarschuwinge tegen de Geestdrijverij, vervat in een brief aan de Doopsgezinden in Friesland (Harlingen, 1750). Of this book a French translation appeared: Lettre Pastorale contre le Fanatisme (Leiden, 1752), which also contains an important survey of the origin of the Moravian movement (by an unknown author); a German edition Warnung vor dem Fanaticismus, also containing the introduction from the French edition, was published in Berlin, 1752; an English edition, without this introduction, A Pastoral Letter against Fanaticism Addressed to the Mennonites of Friesland, appeared in London in 1753.

Stinstra was repeatedly charged with Socinianism, not only by the Reformed theologians, but also by some Mennonites, particularly by the preacher Jacobus Rijdsdijk (q.v.), a strict Zonist (q.v.). Rijdsdijk attacked Stinstra in Godtgeleerde Aanmerkingen . . ., 2 volumes (Groningen, 1742-44). In general the charge of Socinianism was unfair; Stinstra was not an adherent of Socinus. Nevertheless there was in some points a striking similarity between Socinian concepts and Stinstra's views, particularly his concept of Christianity as a reasonable religious system, the value and truth of which can be recognized and proved by the ratio (reason) of man; and the emphasis put on morality, even to the neglect of sentiment and piety, easily makes it understandable that he was taken for a Socinian by many. His sermons, much admired during his lifetime, are for our taste much too prolix, too speculative, too rationalistic, and too moralistic; they are more like treatises or essays than like testimonies. His method of clear rationalistic thinking made him averse to pietism, because of its subjectivism and its overemotionalism. Stinstra, who had great authority among his church members, prevented Johannes Deknatel (q.v.), the well-known pietistic preacher of the Amsterdam Lamist Mennonite congregation, from preaching in the Harlingen Mennonite Church. By this partiality he estranged a number of his members who had religious needs that Stinstra could not supply and who began to organize separate meetings, including communion services, in a home. Stinstra was an influential precursor of 19th-century liberalism. vdZ.

Stirling Avenue Mennonite Church (GCM), located at Kitchener, Ont., was organized in August 1924 with a membership of 115, under the leadership of Urias K. Weber, who had for 17 years been the pastor of the First Mennonite Church (MC), of Kitchener, from which this group separated on a matter of polity. Without conference connection for a number of years, union with the Eastern District Conference in 1946 was followed by union with the General Conference Mennonite Church in 1947. The present church building of brown brick, seating approximately 400, was dedicated on Feb. 1, 1925. Until this time services were conducted in the First Mennonite Church on Sunday afternoons. A parsonage was bought in 1950, and the church enlarged in 1952. The membership is about one fourth rural, the remainder living in Kitchener and surrounding towns. U. K. Weber was succeeded in 1942 by Andrew R. Shelly, of Pennsburg, Pa., who was ordained as elder in 1942. Shelly was succeeded in 1951 by Wilfred D. Ulrich, the present (1957) pastor. Footwashing is optional and there is open communion. The membership in 1958 was 460. E.S.S.

Stirling Mennonite Church (MC), located near Stirling, Alberta. At the annual Alberta-Saskatchewan Mennonite Conference, in session at Creston, Mont., July 1946, Jacob and John Hofer, as representatives of a group who had left the near-by Hutterite settlement a number of years before, made application to the conference for spiritual help. On Nov. 10, 1946, 11 members of the group were received into the Mennonite Church, and on March 16, 1947, organized into a congregation. On the same day John J. Hofer was ordained to the ministry. In 1957 the membership was 26, with John Hofer still serving as pastor. The group continues to practice certain aspects of its former communal way of life. E.S.

Stobbe, a Mennonite family found since at least 1668 at Danzig and later also in Elbing, Montau, and other West Prussian churches. Some of its members were ministers; e.g., Isaac Stobbe (1712-88), a shoemaker, preacher 1751 and elder 1775 of the Frisian (Neugarten) congregation of Danzig; Erdmann Stobbe, a preacher of the same church 1786-1808; and Johann Stobbe, of Klein Lunau, preacher 1871 and elder 1875-1906 of the Schönsee (Sosnovka) Mennonite Church.

Peter Stobbe, of Tiegenhof, in the Gross-Werder, was the founder of a famous distillery, which was still in existence in 1945. From Prussia the name came to Russia and to Canada. vdZ.

Stockman(n), a Mennonite family formerly in the congregation of Hamburg (q.v.)-Altona, Germany. Its ancestor was Samuel (1) Stockman, who presumably was born at Antwerp, Belgium, and moved from there to Hamburg in the late 16th century. He was married to Louisjen Noë; he was at first a tailor, and later became a prosperous businessman. His son Samuel (2) Stockman, d. Hamburg 1678, a merchant like his father, was for a number of years a deacon of the Hamburg Mennonite Church. A descendant of Samuel (1) was Jan Stockmann, who was chosen preacher of this church in 1711, but served for only two years, dying of the plague in 1713. In the 17th century some members of this family left the Mennonite Church to join the Dompelaar (q.v.) congregation at Hamburg, including Isaac Stockmann and his sons Samuel and Jan. Samuel Stockman was a preacher of this Dompelaar church in the 1660's. vbZ.

Stoetenberen (Stutenbernt), a nickname of Bernt (Berend) Rothmann (q.v.) in Münster (q.v.). Stoet means a loaf of bread. He was given this name because he used ordinary bread in the observance of the Lord's Supper, contrary to the Roman Catholic practice of using a wafer. (DB 1888, 8 note; 1919, 8.) vbZ.

Stoffel (Stoffels), a Dutch Mennonite family, formerly at Zaandam, where Gerrit Stoffels was a member of the Old Frisian congregation in 1628, as was his son Pieter Stoffels, a shipbuilder; Jan Stoffelsz, probably Gerrit's grandson, was from 1683 a preacher of the Zaandam Oude Huys (Frisian) congregation. The Stoffels mentioned in the church books as members of the Zaandam Nieuwe Huys congregation may have been descendants. Most members of this family were blacksmiths and carpenters at Zaandam, and later on millwrights, the last of whom was Cornelis Pietersz Stoffel (1776-1836). His son Pieter Corneliszn Stoffel (1818-69) moved to Deventer, where he founded a lumber business. He and some of his descendants were trustees of the Deventer Mennonite Church; his son Pieter Stoffel (1848-1942) was president of the church board. Other sons of Pieter Corneliszn were Willem Stoffel (1859-1945), a lumber dealer and moderator of the Deventer church board, and Cornelis Stoffel (1845-1908), professor of English and Swedish at Amsterdam, later living at Nijmegen, a deacon at Amsterdam and Nijmegen. vbZ.

Stoltz Plateau, a region in Brazil (q.v.) where a number of Mennonite families from Russia settled in 1930. In 1934, however, settlement began to dissolve because of economic difficulties. By 1951 the last Mennonites had left the Stoltz Plateau. vbZ.

Stoltzfus is an Amish Mennonite family name. Nicholas Stoltzfus and his son Christian (1748-1832; said to have immigrated from Zweibrücken, Germany) arrived at Philadelphia on Oct. 18, 1766. Since they are the only persons by this name to be registered on the 18th-century ship lists, they are presumably the progenitors of all the family in America. Both acquired land in Berks and Lancaster counties by 1770. Nicholas died in 1774 and is buried in King's Cemetery in northern Berks County near Leesport, Pa. Christian, ordained an Amish bishop, moved to Lancaster County about 1800 and was buried in what is now Myers Cemetery in the Mill Creek section in 1832.

The Stoltzfus name has been most common in Eastern Pennsylvania, but it occurs also in Ohio and Iowa, mostly in the Amish Mennonite Church, though in recent years it has become more prevalent in Mennonite (MC) circles. The Fisher family history lists approximately 1400 persons with the name of Stoltzfus who are descendants of Christian Fisher. The 1958 Mennonite Yearbook lists 51 ordained men carrying the Stoltzfus name, 30 of whom are Old Order Amish preachers in Pennsylvania. Among the descendants have been Benjamin B. Stoltzfus (1861-1931), a minister and for 16 years superintendent of the Lima, Ohio, Mennonite (MC) Mission; the Christian Stoltzfus mentioned above; Eli B. Stoltzfus (1860-1942), bishop of the Plainview Church at Aurora, Ohio; his son, Elmer Stoltzfus (1896-), bishop of the same congregation; the latter's son, Edward Stoltzfus, pastor of the Bethel Mennonite Church at West Liberty, Ohio; and Nicholas M. Stoltzfus (1895-), minister in the Manson, Iowa, Mennonite Church. Grant Stoltzfus is a professor at Eastern Mennonite College.

Stolypin, Peter A. (1862-1911), became prime minister of Russia in 1906 and suppressed the Revolution at that time. He introduced agricultural laws to enable landless peasants and small farmers to acquire crown land. The Mennonites also benefited by this law when they obtained land in the Kulundian Steppes and established the Barnaul-Slavgorod settlement (q.v.) in Siberia. On Sept. 10, 1910, Stolypin visited the Slavgorod Mennonite settlement, on which occasion he was received by the Oberschulze Jacob A. Reimer (q.v.) and the minister Peter J. Wiebe. Possibly in part as a result of this meeting a post office and a hospital were erected in Orloff and a branch line of the Trans-Siberian Railroad built from Tatarskaya to Slavgorod. In memory of its benefactor, the Slavgorod Mennonites erected a memorial to Peter A. Stolypin in Orloff in 1912. Stolypin was killed by a revolutionary in Kiev in 1911. C.K.

Stony Brook Mennonite Church (MC), located on the Lincoln Highway, 4 miles east of York, Pa., had a meetinghouse by 1803, one block southwest of the present site, known as Witmer's. A deed of 1818 states that "David Sprenkle of West Manchester Township sold to David Witmer, Rudolph Forry, both of Spring Garden Township, and Michael Strickler of Hellam Township, Trustees of congregation worshipping at the Mennonist Meetinghouse at the stone ridge in Spring Garden Township 77 P for $72.18, for the Mennist Church, worshipping in and around Spring Garden Township, and for those permitted by said congregation to bury their dead on the Grave Yard, contained on same Lot and for no other purpose whatsoever." This was alongside an earlier family cemetery. The meetinghouse was enlarged several times and in 1884 it was enlarged and considerably renovated. In 1912 the congregation moved into the town, building a brick church, 50 x 75 ft. B. L. Bucher was the pastor in 1957, with a membership of 79. This was a part of the Strickler-Witmer-Liverpool circuit a century ago, but now it is a separate congregation. Winterstown is an outpost of this congregation.

Stony Brook Old Order Mennonite Church, York County, Pa., worshiped in the same meetinghouse, about 7 miles east of York, as the Lancaster Mennonites (MC) until 1912, when the Mennonites moved to the Highway. Then in 1913 the Old Order congregation built another brick church on the same ground, east of the old, well-kept cemetery. It is still called the Witmer church. The membership in 1955 was 12, with Emanuel Landes, deacon, as the only ordained man. Joseph Hostetter is bishop and the Lancaster County ministers take charge of the fortnightly services.

Stoppelaar, de, a Dutch Mennonite family, found in the 17th century in Rotterdam, where Daniël de Stoppelaar was a deacon of the High German Mennonite church in 1639. Later members of this family lived in Amsterdam, where Jan (Johannes) de Stoppelaar (d. 1740) was a physician. Both he and his wife Ida de Neufville were members of the Amsterdam Lamist (q.v.) church.

Jan de Stoppelaar (Hengelo 1855-The Hague 1919) studied theology at the Amsterdam Mennonite seminary and served the congregations of St. Anna-Parochie 1880-81 and Krommenie 1881-85. In 1885 he retired because of bad health.

Reinder Jacobus Taekema de Stoppelaar (Ureterp 1873-Enschedé 1948), after studying at the Mennonite seminary and the University of Amsterdam, served as pastor at Oost- and West-Grafdijk 1899-1901 and Warga 1901-38. He is known for a large number of excellent and attractive books of nature description, especially ornithology, particularly of Friesland.

Storch, Nikolaus, one of the "Zwickau Prophets" (see Thomas Drechsel), a weaver of Zwickau, Saxony, Germany, a member of a religious sect in Bohemia which held fanatical views concerning the Inner Word, revealed in visions and dreams. Thomas Müntzer (q.v.) was deeply impressed by his unusual knowledge of the Scripture. Storch won a large following among the common people. Summoned before the council of Zwickau to answer for his teaching, he left Zwickau in December 1521 and went to Wittenberg with Drechsel and Marcus Stübner (q.v.) where they had a number of conversations with Melancthon (q.v.). The Biblical basis they cited for their rejection of infant baptism confused the reformer.

But Storch did not stay in Wittenberg long. He parted from his companions and wandered through Middle Germany, especially Thuringia, preaching everywhere. In September 1522 he had a conversation with Luther in Wittenberg, chiefly on the subject of infant baptism. In 1524 he was for a short time in Strasbourg. In Hof he stayed longer. He may then have turned to South Germany. All trace of him is lost. In 1536 he was reported to be back in Zwickau. At any rate he remained quiet; his role was finished. He advised his followers to have themselves rebaptized. Did they do so? There is no evidence that either he himself or his followers were rebaptized.

Stordeur, Jean, an Anabaptist of Liège (Luik), Belgium, who, because of severe persecution, fled to Geneva, Switzerland, in 1533 with his wife Idelette van Buren (de Bure, q.v.), his father-in-law Lambert van Buren, the book printer Johannes Bomeromanus, and a few other Anabaptists. In Geneva Stordeur and Bomeromanus had two or three disputes with the Reformed pastors Farel and John Calvin (q.v.). On March 30, 1537, both Stordeur and Bomeromanus were banned from the town. In Strasbourg (q.v.) they again met Calvin in 1538, when Calvin was forced to leave Geneva. In 1539 Calvin succeeded in converting Stordeur, who died soon after of the plague. In August 1540 Calvin married his widow.

Storger, Jakob, an Anabaptist martyr of Koburg, who was baptized at Wels in Upper Austria in 1528 by Wolfgang Brandhuber (q.v.), lived at first as a gunsmith in Gittelde im Grund, a valley in the Upper Harz, Germany, but considering his trade sinful he left the region and settled with his family above Zorge near the Spitzenberge. Here he made troughs with other Anabaptists. He was chosen preacher at a meeting of Anabaptists at Langenwiese. In the middle of August he was expelled from Brunswick territory. For six weeks he wandered preaching and baptizing in Thuringia. In October 1537 he settled with his family in a suburb of Mühlhausen. There he was arrested and examined on the rack on Oct. 11. On Nov. 8, 1537, he suffered a martyr's death with three other Anabaptists; he was drowned in the Unstrut between Mühlhausen and Ammern. NEFF.

Story Friends, the name given to Beams of Light (q.v.) beginning with Vol. 53, No. 1, Jan. 5, 1958.

Story of the Mennonites, The, by C. Henry Smith and revised by Cornelius Krahn, originated when C. Henry Smith (q.v.) published his book under the title The Mennonites, A Brief History of Their Origin and Later Development in Both Europe and America, 340 pp. (Berne, 1920). In 1941 after Smith had written numerous other books The Mennonites appeared in an entirely revised and enlarged edition under the title The Story of the Mennonites, 823 pp. (Newton, Kan.). Of this edition a slightly revised reprint was made in 1945, without taking into consideration the great changes brought about by World War II. The day before C. Henry Smith died, on Oct. 18, 1948, he requested Cornelius Krahn to revise and edit The Story of the Mennonites. This was done in co-operation with the Board of Education and Publication of the General Conference Mennonite Church in the spirit of the author, leaving the book in general as it was conceived by the author. Chapters dealing with contemporary questions were brought up to date. Although the Mennonites of Europe had been most affected by World War II, the settlements of North and South America had also undergone great changes. In order to prevent an increase in size some chapters were reduced. Numerous corrections and changes were made. An index, a bibliography, and illustrations were added. This edition published in 1950 by the Mennonite Publication Office, Newton, Kan., consisted of 856 pages.

In 1957 a fourth edition containing some changes and corrections appeared. Some paragraphs were added to bring chapters up to date dealing with the present. Illustrations were exchanged for charts featuring the origin, spread, and immigration of the Mennonites the world over.

The popularity of C. Henry Smith's Story of the Mennonites is due to the fact that the author had the gift of narrating a very complex, long, and complicated history of a small group of people in an attractive, impressive, and nontechnical way which appeals to the average person not familiar nor interested in detail. This strength reveals at once also the "weakness" of the book, namely, the absence of a detailed presentation of theological questions, partly due to the fact that the author was not a trained theologian but a historian. Thus far the Story of the Mennonites is the most widely used history of the Mennonites produced anywhere in any language. A unique chapter in its history is that it was translated into the German language by A. Esau, a German scientist, while he was in prison in the Netherlands after World War II where P. S. Goerz contacted him and gave him a copy of the book. Esau translated the whole Story, after which Cornelius Krahn edited the manuscript, and the General Conference Board of Education and Publication in co-operation with D. H. Epp and H. Heese began to publish it in installments in Der Bote with the intention of publishing it in book form. About a third of the German edition has been printed in book form (1958). C.K.

Stouffer Mennonite Church (MC), located in the Ringgold District, Washington Co., Md., was organized in the Beaver Creek District, in a building later used by the Brethren Church. In 1828 a stone church was built on the present site. The name was doubtless given in honor of the minister John Stouffer (1746-1836), who later became the bishop. The old building was replaced by a brick church in 1895. This is said to have been the first organized Mennonite congregation in Washington County. The ministers who have served are John Stouffer, Abr. Stouffer, Christian Newcomer, John Martin, John Hoover, David Shank, Denton Martin, and the present (1957) minister, Amos J. Martin. The membership in 1957 was 104. J.D.R.

Straalman (Straelmans), a former Dutch Mennonite family. The origin and genealogy of this family is not clear. Its cradle is Vreden in Westphalia, Germany, where its members, Mennonites, were living in the 16th century. In the early 17th century they were found at Almelo and soon also in Amsterdam and other Dutch towns; in Amsterdam they were wealthy merchants. One of the mightiest merchant princes of 18th-century Amsterdam was Abraham Straalman, d. 1759. His first wife was Catharina Verhamme (1704-37), of an old Mennonite family of Haarlem; his second wife was Suzanna Catharina de Wolf, also a Mennonite. He lived in the stately manor "Vijverhof" on the Vecht River. He was a deacon of the Amsterdam Lamist (q.v.) church 1738-44 and 1755-59. Until the end of the 18th century his relatives and descendants were members of the Amsterdam Mennonite congregation. Some of them served the church as deacons, one of whom was his father, Matthijs Straalman (1693-98, 1703-9). Jan Straalman was a member of the Mennonite committee of Foreign Needs (Relief Committee) about 1730. By marriage the Straalmans were related to other well-known Amsterdam Mennonite families such as van Lennep, de Wolf, de Flines, Seijen, Kops, and van Meekeren.

In the second half of the 18th century some branches of this family died out, and a few of its members joined the Reformed Church. vWZ.

Straatman, Jan Willem (The Hague, Holland, 1824-82), studied at the Mennonite seminary at Amsterdam and became a ministerial candidate in 1849. He served the congregations of Wormerveer-Noord 1849-50 and Groningen 1850-67. Shortly after 1860 he adopted modern (liberal) theology, and soon became a radical exponent of it. From his new viewpoint he wanted to reform his Groningen congregation. Most members of the church board sympathized with the new ideas of their preacher, but a large number of the members of the church did not agree and avoided the church meetings. In 1865 the church board resolved that baptism was not strictly obligatory for those who wished to join the church. In 1867, Straatman and his colleague Cornelis Corver (q.v.), with approval of some members including Samuel van Houten (q.v.), made a number of proposals for a radical reorganization of the church life: (a) baptism to be optional and to be abolished in the future; (b) communion services to be done away with; (c) the preachers to be permitted to omit hymns, prayer, and Scripture reading during the services; (d) preachers to be given freedom to choose the content of their sermons (addresses) from themes outside the Bible; (e) Christian anniversaries such as Good Friday, Easter, Ascension day, Pentecost, and Christmas not to be observed. When these radical proposals were presented in an assembly of members of the church on Nov. 24, 1867, they were rejected by the majority (185 votes against 79) and both Straatman and Corver resigned. Straatman preached his farewell sermon on Dec. 22, 1867, which address was published: Broeders, ik bid u (Groningen, 1867). Straatman also published a volume of sermons, Tiental Leerredenen (Groningen, 1864). vZ.

Stralen, Gottfried, of Geldern, Rhineland, one of the "Wassenberg preachers" (q.v.), was a close friend of Johannes Kloppeis (q.v.), and shared his fate. In Münster he was the preacher at the Ueberwasserkirche and took an active part in the religious movement in the city. In October 1533 he was one of the editors of the evangelical Bekentnisse (Confession) van beyden Sacramenten. With Kloppeis he was sent to Warendorf (q.v.) as a Münsterite apostle in 1534 and was burned at the stake with him at Brühl on Feb. 1, 1535. (ML IV.)

Strasbourg (pop. 167,149) is a city in Alsace, France, at the junction of the Ill and the Breusch rivers, two miles west of the Rhine. Its strategic location between Switzerland and Wittenberg made it an important center during the time of the Reformation, but its importance derived also from prominent leaders in the city, first of all Jacob Sturm (q.v.), and in the ecclesiastical realm, Bucer (q.v.), Capito (q.v.), and Hedio (q.v.). All of these men were interested in the Anabaptists, and especially in the beginning had personal friends among them; Matthäus Zell (q.v.), and after his death his widow, championed the cause of the Anabaptists. No doubt the close friendship of the Zells with Schwenckfeld contributed to their kindness to the Anabaptists.

Strasbourg was the haven of refuge for Anabaptists from Switzerland, Holland, and North and South Germany. When persecution forced them to leave Augsburg (q.v.) and other localities they came in large numbers to Strasbourg. The Anabaptists called Strasbourg the "City of Hope," and the "Refuge of Righteousness."

Strasbourg responded to the Protestant Reformation as early as 1523 when Matthäus Zell expressed his views on the custom of having godfathers, and left the language of the ceremony of infant baptism as optional, either Latin or German. Through the agitation of Clemens Ziegler (q.v.), a layman, who wrote pamphlets against infant baptism stressing the importance of faith (in which he was greatly indebted to Luther), Bucer wrote to Zwingli on Oct. 31, 1524, to request Scriptural proofs to combat certain false prophets, probably including Carlstadt. That he had the opponents of infant baptism in mind is doubtful, since Anabaptism did not have its real beginning until January 1525. During the same month of October Capito entered the discussion between Luther and Carlstadt on the sacraments, insisting that it was merely a quarrel of words, and that the rites, being purely external, should not be a cause of division among Christians.

Capito at that early date stated the position of Strasbourg: tolerance in external matters. In November 1524 Capito and Bucer wrote to the preachers of Zürich that they had heard that Carlstadt was agitating against the practice of infant baptism, and declared themselves prepared to retain infant baptism as a mere external ceremony with the condition that instruction follow it later. About the same time Nicolaus Gerbel wrote a letter to Luther warning him of Carlstadt's influence on the Strasbourg Reformers, and on Nov. 23, 1524, the Strasbourg Reformers directed a letter to Luther in which they stated that they with Luther had hitherto retained the practice of infant baptism, even though it scarcely corresponded to the practice of the early church and to the Scriptures. In December of that year Strasbourg received communications from both Zwingli and Luther in reply to the Strasbourg statements about the place of infant baptism. In answer Bucer stated his position clearly for the first time, clearly discussing the issues of the ban and infant baptism. He idealized the ban and to some extent longed for it in the church, but thought it impossible in the present situation of the church. As for baptism, his favorite term is that it was an external thing, and hence not bound to any particular age in life. Since there are two baptisms, the inner and the outer, of which only the inner is of decisive importance, one should not overstress the time of baptism. He dealt in this writing with the arguments advanced by Ziegler, but most directly with those of Balthasar Hubmaier. The title of this writing, which is clearly composed by Bucer although it bears the names of all the Strasbourg preachers, is Grund vnnd ursach ausz gotlicher schrift der neuwerung an dem nachmal des herren . . . , tauff, . . . zu Strassburg fürgenommen (1525).

In May 1525 the Strasbourg preachers again had to take a stand on the matter of infant baptism and urged their people to place their trust in Christ alone and not in any of the ceremonies which had been done away with. Baptism they defined as a sign of faith and of entrance into the Christian life, by which the parents testify that they will train their child in a Christian manner. Parents were urged not to rush to baptism with weak infants, as though salvation consisted of external washing, and yet they were not to neglect baptism, since it had taken the place of circumcision.

In July 1525 Balthasar Hubmaier (q.v.) published in Strasbourg his important work, Von dem christlichen tauff der gläubigen. This book was the Anabaptist reply to Zwingli's book on baptism, and while it was written in Waldshut, Hubmaier himself says that it was published in Strasbourg.

In February 1526 the Strasbourg ministers appeared before the city council to indicate their position on infant baptism. The major point of consideration was that they did not wish to be innovators, and since infant baptism had always been practiced they wished this practice to continue, only that parents ought to wait until a convenient day and not rush their children to be baptized. In March another prominent Anabaptist, Wilhelm Reublin (q.v.), arrived in Strasbourg. When Michael Sattler (q.v.) arrived is not certain, but it was by early 1526 if not late 1525. Hans Denk (q.v.), arriving in November, had an open disputation in December 1526 with the Strasbourg ministers, as a result of which he was dismissed from Strasbourg. As far as is known this is the only open disputation ever held in Strasbourg, for later all requests for public disputations were rejected by the council. Before the close of 1526 other prominent Anabaptists arrived, e.g., Jakob Gross, Jorg Tucher, and Wilhelm Echsel, all of whom engaged in conversation with Bucer about baptism. While the affinities of Capito and Bucer to Anabaptism remained, Michael Sattler (q.v.) at this time (1526-27) wrote a letter to them in which he listed twenty differences between him and them, and requested prayer for the imprisoned Anabaptists. Here the basic difference in the view of the church becomes clear, Sattler insisting on a believer's church and separation between the world and the church. He signed the letter as a "brother in God the heavenly Father." This close relationship is evident also from Capito's letter to the authorities at Horb in 1527 expressing his consternation concerning the martyrdom of Michael Sattler.

In early July 1526 the Strasbourg preachers wrote the Getreue Warnung der Prediger des Euangelij zu Strassburg vber die Artickel, so Jacob Kautz Prediger zu Wormbs kürztlich hat lassen aussgohn . . ., in which the position of Denk was also attacked.

While these skirmishes were going on, Strasbourg as a city had not taken any official action on the issue of Anabaptism, and not until July 27, 1527, was the first mandate issued against the movement. This mandate indicates that the basic issue of the council against the Anabaptists was that they threatened the absolute right of government and were separatists. As a result they ordered no one to lodge or feed them. This mandate was not enforced very strictly, although in the spring of 1528 Lukas Hackfurt, Fridolin Meiger, and Pilgram Marpeck were all arraigned for giving shelter to the Anabaptists. During these years the Anabaptists worked very closely with the charities of the city which were directed by Hackfurt, who himself was sympathetic to Anabaptists. The Anabaptist group grew after 1527 because of persecution elsewhere, and their need for temporary material assistance was great.

For the Anabaptist group as a whole these years at Strasbourg were marked by tension. The composition of the group was in constant flux and what it lacked in stability it made up in diversity. There were also those who were on the fringes of Anabaptism, admiring it from afar but unable to bring themselves to shoulder the cross. Such were Ludwig Haetzer (q.v.), Caspar Schwenckfeld (q.v.), Cellarius (q.v.), and Sebastian Franck (q.v.). But there were also some who had joined the Anabaptists but could not integrate their past experience with this new view of the Christian life, and therefore soon left the Anabaptist fold. Such were Kautz (q.v.), Hans Bänderlin (q.v.), and Wilhelm Reublin (q.v.). Both Reublin and Christoph Freisleben (q.v.) differed, however, from Bänderlin and Kautz in that they had made lasting contributions to the Anabaptist cause, while the positions of Kautz and Bänderlin had always been rejected by the majority. Nevertheless the presence of all of these variant personalities in Strasbourg, many of them remaining only a brief period, others like Melchior Hofmann (q.v.) remaining for an extended period of time, caused a leavening to take place which threatened the very existence of Anabaptism. This resulted in a major parting of the ways during these years, from which developed the radical eschatological group with a Valentinian view of the Incarnation represented by Hofmann on the one hand, and on the other hand the quiet spiritualism of Kautz and Bänderlin with its depreciation of historical exegesis and forms. In the center stood what later became the Marpeck brotherhood in other parts of southern Europe, represented by Marpeck himself, Leupold Scharnschlager, Wilhelm Reublin, and probably Fridolin Meiger. It is significant that at this early date Scharnschlager was already opposing Hofmann's Valentinian Christology, and that effective means were used to combat the arguments of spiritualism advanced by Bänderlin as seen in the Clare verantwortung (q.v.), as well as the Zwinglian arguments repeated by Bucer, which stressed the difference between inner and outer participation in the ceremonies of the church. While this central party took over the missionary emphasis of Hans Hut (q.v.) and the tradition left by the Tirolese martyrs (Schiemer and Schlaffer, q.v.), they took over elements from Denk (q.v.) only with extreme selectivity.

After this period of stress and strain Marpeck was expelled from Strasbourg. His exile came about in part because the authorities concentrated their fire on the Anabaptist leadership, and after Reublin's dismissal Marpeck had become the leader of the Strasbourg Anabaptists, but in part also because Bucer exerted pressure upon the council to enforce the mandate of July 1527, which was renewed on Sept. 24, 1530. When Capito, a friend of Marpeck's, left town on Dec. 8, 1531, Bucer immediately started proceedings against Marpeck, which resulted in his expulsion at the end of January 1532.

For the next two years Scharnschlager was the leader of the Anabaptists. Just how active the group was at this time is not clear. About a year later, when Thomas Adolf came to be baptized by Scharnschlager, his request was not granted because Scharnschlager had been requested to temporarily suspend baptisms because of some unwholesome elements in the Anabaptist fold. The discussions of the council in 1530-40 were almost entirely occupied with Claus Frey (q.v.) and Melchior Hofmann (q.v.), who was arrested in May 1533 and died in prison there ten years later, at the end of 1543. On March 3, 1534, "Täuferherren" were installed, constituting a commission for handling Anabaptist matters. Scharnschlager was asked to leave Strasbourg after a hearing on May 27, 1534. At this hearing mention was made of Scharnschlager's desire that the city council as government should not rule over one's faith and decide for the individual what he should believe. He also refused to inform on his fellow Anabaptists, and was therefore imprisoned. On June 16, 1534, he wrote a defense of his faith, stating that since he had not yet fully explicated his position to the council, he would like to develop it further. This defense, found in the Strasbourg archives, is important for a number of reasons. It is one of the clearest extant testimonies to the belief of the Anabaptists that they were actually following in the footsteps of Martin Luther in a number of key points. Scharnschlager discussed Luther's position on the authority of government over matters of faith at some length and insisted that this is exactly what the Anabaptists believe. If government had jurisdiction over faith, said Scharnschlager, Strasbourg would still be under the Roman hierarchy. He stated that he was willing to submit to the council if they were questioning him as elders in the place of Christ, but if they were doing it as government officials he could not allow them to judge his faith. Finally this defense is of importance because it states clearly that Scharnschlager rejected the approach being used at Münster at that very time. Even if there were ten thousand Anabaptists in Strasbourg and only five others, Scharnschlager says that these five would not be compelled to become Anabaptists.

With the departure of Scharnschlager from Strasbourg the Anabaptist movement lost one of its finest leaders. While the movement continued there, the city became more of a meeting place for the series of Strasbourg conferences (q.v.) than the location of a strong continuing congregation.

During this decade, however, the influence of Strasbourg was pronounced in other cities of South Germany. Augsburg had as one of its most prominent ministers Wolfgang Musculus (q.v.), who had earlier been Bucer's secretary and who had always been more tolerant than Bucer. The relations of Strasbourg to Münster have never been fully clarified, but it is becoming increasingly clear that they were intimate and far-reaching. Rothmann (q.v.) had spent some time in Strasbourg in 1531, and had been tremendously impressed with the way in which "Christ and Caesar" were working hand in hand. The Strasbourg clergy received a stenographic report of the disputation between Rothmann and his colleagues in August 1533, and wrote the Bericht aus heiliger schrift . . . (1534), a 100-page reply to the ministers at Münster. The publication of this Bericht at the request of Augsburg indicates that many looked to Strasbourg for help in dealing with the Anabaptists in both the area of theology and practical suppression.

The mandate of March 3, 1534, stating that views not in accord with the Augsburg Confession would not be tolerated, and the synod of 1533 in which all were allowed to present their views to the ministers and a select group of the council, did much to weaken the Anabaptist cause in Strasbourg. On April 28, 1535, compulsory baptism of all infants was ordered. Before this, in 1534, Kilian Aurbacher had written a moving letter from Moravia to Bucer about the danger of compelling people in matters of faith (this letter has been preserved), but its contents were not heeded, and on March 23, 1538, the city council issued a new mandate with four harsh provisions: (1) all Anabaptists were to be banished; (2) in case of return, the offender was to be imprisoned for four weeks on a diet of bread and water, then exiled again; (3) upon a second return he should be punished by cutting off his fingers or by placing him in neck irons and branding his cheek; (4) if he returned a third time, he should be executed by drowning.

On Nov. 23, 1534, Hans Frisch, from Horb, said that there were three groups of Anabaptists in Strasbourg, the factions of Reublin, of Hofmann, and of Kautz, the latter two being somewhat intermingled. At the end of this decade, May 29, 1539, Ruprecht Schwarz, from Mainz, reported to the Strasbourg authorities that there were a number of gatherings in Strasbourg, and said that the Hofmannites and the Swiss Brethren could not attain agreement. The Swiss Brethren, he said, numbered about 100, while the Hofmannites did not exceed five.

It has been estimated that in 1534 the number of Anabaptists in Strasbourg was about 2,000. It is certain that this number did not increase, but rather decreased, for soon the meetings took place outside the city, and the church came to be known as the "Waldskirche." Bucer expressed satisfaction that he could now rest and concentrate on winning Anabaptists for the Reformed cause in Hesse through Peter Tasch (q.v.). John Calvin (q.v.), the Reformer of Geneva, who stayed at Strasbourg in 1538-41, took great pains to win over the Anabaptists, particularly the French-speaking among them. In a few cases he was successful; one of his converts was Jean Stordeur (q.v.).

On April 9, 1540, the Strasbourg Council issued the final mandate against the Anabaptists. Those refusing to take the oath were threatened with loss of life, and those sheltering Anabaptists with corporal punishment and loss of property. This mandate also contained the statement that from time to time large numbers of Anabaptists met in uncourtly places, such as out in the fields.

In later years Marpeck addressed a letter to the people around Strasbourg on the question of Christian liberty, which shows that he felt that they were abusing their Christian freedom and were not taking sufficient precautions to protect the weaker brother. Only he is truly free, who is free in Christ, Marpeck asserts. During that time and later the Strasbourg group was visited by Pilgram Marpeck, as is evident from a reference in one of Scharn-schlager's letters to the Strasbourg Anabaptist brotherhood contained in the Kunstabuch. This letter is not dated, but possibly belongs in the 1540's. The circular letters No. 3 and No. 35 of the Kunstabuch, dated 1544 and 1547, were addressed to those in Alsace. The last known writing of Marpeck, dated Jan. 22, 1555 (No. 15), was sent to a certain Abraham at Langnau in the Kinzig Valley, in which he adds the request to greet certain persons in the Leber Valley, mentioning them by name. The important leader of the Marpeck brotherhood in this area at this time was Sigmund Bosch (q.v.). It appears that Marpeck served as liaison for the Moravian, the Swiss, and the Strasbourg Anabaptists. According to court testimony of May 29, 1561, there were three groups of Anabaptists around Strasbourg then—the Bilgramites, the Gabrielites, and the Sattlerites.

An interesting testimony of the faith of the Strasbourg Swiss Brethren is found in a lengthy tract titled Concerning the Incarnation and Deity of Jesus Christ (extant in a Dutch print of 1666), written to counter the Socinian wooing of the Strasbourg group begun in 1590 by Voydovsky and continued by Ostorodt (q.v.), where particulars are given.

The importance of Strasbourg for Anabaptist history consists in the issues which were resolved there during the early years. Foremost of these were the issues of spiritualism and religious liberty. W.K.L.

* * *

Strasbourg was the scene of at least six important Anabaptist Conferences, 1554, 1555, 1557, 1568, 1592, and 1607. Strasbourg was also represented at the conference in 1591 which drew up the Concept of Cologne (q.v.). These conferences are described in the following article, Strasbourg Conferences. It is probable that the 16th-century congregation died out. If so, it was renewed by immigration later from other parts of Alsace. In 1796 a conference was held in the neighborhood of Strasbourg, of which little is known. Representatives from the Strasbourg congregation at the Essingen (q.v.) Conferences were Hans Rogi for 1759, and Christian Rub for 1779. The general letter of the French Mennonite congregations of 1808 concerning military service was signed for the Strasbourg congregation by Johann Rotacker and Hans Egli. Little is known about the congregation in the 19th century. It must have been small and without influence. Its meetings were held monthly, in places around the city, first at Robertsau, later at Neudorf in the home of an elder. The last known elders were Jacob Egli and his nephew Christian Egli. The latter moved to the region of Chalons-sur-Marne c1855; the former died in 1883. After his death the congregation dissolved, some moving away, while the rest joined the Reformed Church. Strangely, Strasbourg does not appear in any of the Dutch Naamlijsts or German Namensverzeichnisse or yearbooks.

Strasbourg Conferences. Strasbourg in Alsace, a more tolerant city than most places in Europe in the 16th century, was the scene of at least six conferences of Anabaptist ministers in 1554, 1555, 1557, 1568, 1592, and 1607.

1. The conference of 1554 is known solely through a note in the record of the Strasbourg city council meeting of March 9, 1554, reported by Hulshof (p. 218), which reads (in translation): "On the previous Saturday a meeting of Anabaptists was held at the Long Bridge, at which 600 are supposed to have assembled."

2. The conference held Aug. 24, 1555, is known solely through a letter sent to Holland, containing the "Agreement Made by the Brethren and Elders at Strasbourg, Assembled Because of the Question of the Origin of the Flesh of Christ." This document of about 800 words was first published in Hans Alenson's (q.v.) Tegen-Bericht of 1630 (pages 124 f.) who says he "took it from the copy which had been faithfully translated from the High German into the Netherlands language by I.H.V.P.N. [Carel van Gent?] in Amsterdam, Sept. 1, 1610." A copy of the Tegen-Bericht is in the Zürich University Library. The Agreement is also found in the reprint of the Tegen-Bericht in BRN VII, occupying pages 226-28. S. Blaupot ten Cate published it from a copy in the Amsterdam Mennonite Library, since lost, in his Geschiedenis der Doopsgezinden in Groningen, Overijssel en Oost-Friesland I (Leeuwarden, 1842), pp. 254-57. Hulshof reprinted it from ten Cate in his Geschiedenis van de Doopsgezinden te Straatsburg van 1525 tot 1557 (Amsterdam, 1905), pp. 220-22. The Agreement clearly states that the meeting was called because the brethren had repeatedly been requested and urged to speak about the Incarnation, and now recently again by the Hofmannites and by the brethren in the Netherlands. They had "gathered from many places." The concern of the Agreement is to bring harmony into the brotherhood by holding to the simple statements of Scripture regarding the Incarnation and going no further. It is more important to keep the commandments of Christ than to press to an understanding of the mysteries of how Christ became flesh. Hulshof assumes that Dutch and High Germans (Swiss Brethren) took part in the meeting. He rightly rejects several statements by Ottius (Annales Anabaptistici, 120) who knew about the meeting from the Alenson report, and claims, clearly without foundation, that Moravians (Hutterites) and Germans were together, and that the parties in the dispute excommunicated each other, here basing erroneously on a statement in the Protocoll of the Frankenthal disputation of 1571, p. 14, which makes no reference to the Strasbourg Conference of 1555.

3. The conference of 1557 is known solely through a letter written to Menno by two High German ministers, Zylis and Lemke, on behalf of the Strasbourg conference, giving a report of the conclusions. Hulshof printed the rather lengthy epistle (some 1600 words) in full, because so many incorrect statements about the conference had been made by German historians, who apparently had never seen the text of the letter. He used the reprint by J. G. de Hoop Scheffer, "Opmerkingen en mededeelingen betreffende Menno Simons, VIII," DB 1894, 10-70. The letter is reprinted on pp. 47-53 from a handwritten copy (now in the Amsterdam Mennonite Archives) made by J. Cuperus (q.v.) in November 1769 from a printed book, Een gansch duylic ende bescheyden antwoordt . . . door L.D.W. According to this letter, some 50 elders and ministers assembled from Moravia, Swabia, Switzerland, Württemberg, Breisgau, and Alsace, as far as 150 miles away, among whom was a preacher in whose house the Schleithem confession of 1527 had been drawn up. The occasion for the meeting was a controversy between two elders, Theobald of Worms and Farwendel of Kreuznach, over original sin and the sin of the soul and of the flesh, a controversy which had seriously divided the brotherhood. The controversy was overcome at Strasbourg and harmony was restored. The second topic for discussion was the question of the severe application of avoidance or shunning in connection with the ban, including marital avoidance, as advocated by Leenaert Bouwens, who had also won Menno to his view. Bouwens and Menno had called a meeting of Dutch and High German leaders at Cologne in the spring of 1557, at which they had hoped to win the High Germans for their position. But very few High Germans had appeared, and the attempt was a failure. The epistle from the Strasbourg conference, addressed to Menno and the Dutch leaders, was actually a reply to the letter from Menno to the High Germans. It rejected in a kindly spirit the proposals for a strict application of the ban, and expressed the strong hope that differences regarding this matter should not be the cause of a break. Unfortunately their hope was to be disappointed, for this break came in 1559; Menno rejected the proffered hand of reconciliation, and the Dutch elders pronounced the ban on the High Germans at a meeting of delegates of both sides held in that year.

Hulshof reports that the large gathering of Anabaptists at the conferences of 1554 and 1555 led the city council of Strasbourg to renewed action against the brethren, but that the examination of arrested persons by the newly appointed (August 1555) Anabaptist Commission produced no information about the conferences. Petrus Novesianus, a schoolteacher, but not an Anabaptist, reported that there were many Anabaptist sects, naming five, Huterites, Hofmannites, Swiss, Bilgrammites (Pilgram Marpeck), and Zabites(?).

J. J. Kiwiet, in his Pilgram Marbeck (Kassel, 1957), interprets the conference of 1555 as a gathering whose purpose was to unite all the divergent Anabaptist groups, holding that it was really the fruit of Pilgram Marpeck's efforts to unify the groups, and that it succeeded. He offers no documentary proof for his claim, grounding it rather on the evidence of Marpeck's long campaign for unity. It is possible, as he suggests, that Marpeck was present at the conferences of 1554 and 1555. Since he died in 1556 he could not have attended the conference of 1557. The conference of 1557, as the above report shows, was indeed called to bring about unity between the groups in controversy over the doctrine of original sin, and it succeeded. In this sense the conference of 1557 would better fit Kiwiet's thesis than that of 1555, which was called to deal with a theological difference which separated the Dutch and the Hofmannites from the High Germans. However, no unity was achieved at this conference between the disputing parties. It is of interest to note that at this conference it was reported that there were "50 congregations from the Eiffel to Moravia, some of which had 500 to 600 brethren and sisters."

4. The conferences of 1568 and 1607 are known solely through a discipline adopted at the 1568 conference and confirmed at the conference of 1607. It is called "Agreement of the Ministers and Elders of Many Localities in Conference at Strasbourg in the Year 1568, and Reaffirmed at the Strasbourg Conference of 1607." The discipline is known only from handwritten copies handed down from the past, several of which are to be found in the Goshen College and Bethel College Mennonite historical libraries. An edition was printed in 1905 at Elkhart, Ind., together with the disciplines adopted at several later conferences in Europe and America. The oldest manuscript copy extant in America was made in 1836 by Peter Unsicker at Beissenhofen, Germany. H. S. Bender edited and published in German and in English translation a manuscript copy of 1860, "The Discipline Adopted by the Strasbourg Conference of 1568," MQR I (1927), pp. 57-66. Here he reports an earlier text in the possession of Peter Kipfer of the Emmental congregation near Langnau, Switzerland, which had been published in paraphrase by Mathias Pohl of Sembach, Palatinate, Germany, in the Christlicher Gemeinde-Kalender for 1906, pp. 134-43. Ernst Müller's report in his Geschichte der bernischen Täufer (Frauenfeld, 1895), pp. 50-52, apparently was based on the Kipfer copy. The twenty-three articles of the 1568 discipline deal largely with practical questions such as the provisions for traveling ministers to visit the congregations, for selection and ordination of ministers and bishops to fill vacancies, the care for orphans of the brotherhood, moderation in the practice of shunning apostate members, restricting the holy kiss to members, not requiring rebaptism of outsiders who have already been baptized, maintaining simplicity in costume, no rigid uniformity in mode of distributing the communion bread, etc. One article refers to the question of the Incarnation, calling for abiding by the Scripture on this point and avoiding as far as possible all disputing. This is the only known Anabaptist discipline after the Schleithem discipline of 1527.

5. The conference of 1592 is known solely through a letter written on behalf of the participants of the conference to the Socinians in Poland, in reply to a letter from a Socinian leader, Christian Ostorodt, dated Oct. 20, 1591, found in the City Library of Bern, Switzerland, and published by Theodor Wotschke with an introduction and notes in Archiv für Reformationsgeschichte XII (1915)

137-54. The reply of the Strasbourg conference was published under the title (translated), An Answer of the Swiss Brethren, also Called High Germans, to the Polish, Concerning the Point of the Incarnation and the Deity of Jesus Christ, in Handelinghe der Vereenigde Vlaemse en Duytse Doopsgezinde Gemeeynten Gehouden tot Haerlem Anno 1649 (Vlissingen, 1666). A postscript to the letter adds the note (translated): "Passed at the general gathering of the elders and ministers from many countries, held in the year 1592 at Strasbourg. . . . Translated from the High German into the Low German from Rauf-bits' [Rauf Bitsch] own handwriting." Rauf Bitsch was a leading spokesman of the Brethren in the disputation at Frankenthal in 1571.

The repeated meetings at Strasbourg suggest not only that Strasbourg was tolerant, but that there must have been a continuing Anabaptist congregation at Strasbourg (as indeed we know there was down to at least 1880), that there may have been other congregations in the neighborhood (as we know there were both north and south of Strasbourg in Alsace), and that Strasbourg had an established reputation as a meeting place. Outside of Schleithem and Augsburg (both in 1527), no other Anabaptist conferences meeting in the 16th century south of Cologne are known. H.S.B.

Strasbourg Discipline, a set of 23 regulations drawn up in 1568 by the "preachers and elders from many places in the meeting at Strasbourg" and confirmed and renewed in 1607 at the same place by the assembled representatives of the congregations. This Abrede der Diener und Eltesten (Agreement of the Preachers and Elders) was expanded at two later conferences, viz., on March 5 (year not given) in Obersülzen in the Palatinate and in 1688 at Ofenstein (Offstein, q.v.).

These articles do not constitute an actual confession of faith or dogmatic teachings, but in general discuss practical questions of church life, for the most part dealing with the organization of the congregations, supply of ministers, discipline, ordinances, marriage, care of orphans, etc.

Three manuscript copies of the Strasbourg Discipline recopied and handed down through Amish bishops in Pennsylvania, Iowa, Ohio, and Indiana are now in GCL. One of these was reproduced in German and English translation, "The Discipline Adopted by the Strasbourg Conference of 1568," ed. by H. S. Bender, MQR I (1927) 57-66, together with an attached appendix of four articles adopted at Hoffingen in 1630.

William Yoder, an Amish bishop of near Nappanee, Ind., published the Strasbourg Discipline together with additional material in 1905 as Artikel und Ordnungen der Christlichen Gemeinde in Christo Jesu (printed at Elkhart, Ind.) as a 16-page booklet (copy in GCL).

The Gemeinde-Kalender for 1906 contains an interesting article by Mathias Pohl on the Discipline, in which he presented a paraphrase article by article from an old copy then in the possession of Peter Kipfer of the Emmental congregation near Langnau, Switzerland. Two additional articles appear in this paraphrase, one dealing with tobacco, which could not have been in the 1568 form, hence were likely added in 1607. Also presented by Pohl are four additional articles adopted by a conference at Obersülzen on March 5 (year missing) and another set of five articles adopted by the conference at Ofenstein (Offstein) in March 1688.

Ernst Müller in his Berner Täufer (1895) refers to the Strasbourg Discipline with brief characterization and summary (pp. 50-52) stating that the manuscript copy he used was in private possession in Emmental Mennonite hands, possibly the Kipfer copy. He refers to the Obersülzen additions as of March 5, 1668, but does not mention the Ofenstein additions. An interesting and valuable feature of the Kipfer manuscript is a colored drawing on the cover picturing Anabaptist men and women in an assembly. This is reproduced in the Pohl article in black and white.

This is, next to the Schleithem Confession, the only significant church document of the Swiss Brethren which has been preserved. It is of outstanding significance from the practical point of view, but of no value theologically. H.S.B.

Strasburg Mennonite Church (MC) of Franklin County, Pa., a member of Washington County, Md., and Franklin County, Pa., Conference, began in the early 19th century when a log meetinghouse was built, probably in 1812. A brick building was constructed at a near-by site in 1858 and rebuilt in 1903. In 1942 the United States Government claimed this area for an Ammunition Depot which necessitated securing another, the present, place of worship which was formerly a Brethren Church. Ministers who have served the congregation include John S. Burkholder, Henry Bricker, John Lehman, John Gsell, and Harry H. Witmer, the pastor in 1957, when there were 53 members. S.L.B.

Strasburg Mennonite Church (MC), located 9 miles southeast of Lancaster, Pa., a member of the Lancaster Conference, was from the start a strong Mennonite community. This was the home of Bishop Benedict Brackbill (1665-1720), leader both in Europe and here, his son Ulrich Brackbill (1703-39), also a minister, John Herr (III) (1708-83), and Preacher John Herr (1720-97), who in 1740 built a 2½-story stone house on the Brackbill farm as a dwelling, which was also provided with room for worship services and was used until 1804. (It is now owned by Charles E. Good.) That year John Brackbill, Sr., gave John Brackbill, Jr., John Funk, Henry Breneman, and Jacob Groff the present site of ground on the western edge of the borough, "being willing and desirous to promote the spiritual growth and religious fellowship of the people called Menonists in this neighborhood." This beautiful stone church, 40 x 60 ft., of colonial architecture, was the largest Mennonite meetinghouse of its day. It was enlarged in 1877 and 1887, and razed in 1925 for a new brick church 57 x 103 ft. In 1957 Emory H. Herr was the pastor, with a membership of 348. It formerly was a part of the Brick-Strasburg circuit. I.D.L.

Strasser, Gottfried (1854-1912), Reformed pastor in Grindelwald in the Bernese Oberland, author of the song which has become the folk song, the Grindelwaldnerlied or Gletscherpfarrer von Grindelwald. In Langnau (Emmental), where he grew up, Strasser made some observations among the New Amish (q.v.), which led him to a closer study of the Anabaptist movement. In 1884 he published a historical treatise, "Der schweizerische Anabaptismus zur Zeit der Reformation," in the Berner Beiträge zur Geschichte der schweizerischen Reformationskirchen, which is, however, not entirely objective and does not go beyond the prejudiced position of church historians of an earlier era. As the foundation of his book Strasser used biased sources, especially Bullinger's (q.v.) books, and therefore came to the conclusion that the Anabaptists were only fanatics. Even the conversion of Conrad Grebel (q.v.) he thought took place from motives of hostility rather than of love for the cause of the Gospel. For the doctrines of the Anabaptists Strasser showed little understanding, although he admitted that their motivation was not mere fanaticism but their wish to be, "after the example of the apostolic time, in the narrower circle of the awakened, a brotherhood of active holiness, the gathering of a truly Christian people which would adhere to the Gospel, live the most blameless lives and not tolerate any grave sin among them." Concerning the strict Biblicism of the Anabaptists Strasser said, "It was not to be avoided that the petrified adherence to the letter of the Bible would soon after the inception of Anabaptism turn into a fanaticism that elevated itself above the Bible." He identifies the Anabaptist movement with the Peasants' Revolt; the reports of fanatical happenings that Strasser gives are taken from Bullinger. On the whole, like his contemporary Emil Egli (q.v.), whose works he used, Strasser sought to do justice to the history of the Reformation. (ML IV.) S.G.

Straten (Straeten), van der, an Anabaptist-Mennonite family in Flanders, Belgium, three of whose members died as martyrs—Joost (q.v.) van der Straten, executed at Antwerp in 1571, and his two sons, Hans (q.v.), executed at Brussels in 1571, and Martin (q.v.), executed at Gent in 1572. Probably the van der Straten family originally came from Kortrijk (q.v.). Among the first Calvinists in Flanders there were also a number of persons bearing the same family name. (Verheyden, Gent, 59 f.) vdZ.

Straub, Hans, the author of the song, "Durch gnad so will ich singen, in Gottes forcht heben an," No. 56 in the Ausbund. Nothing else is known of him. (ML IV.) NEFF.

Strawberry (B.C.) Mennonite Brethren Church, belonging to the Northern District and Canadian conferences, was organized in November 1944 with 52 members. The meetinghouse is a schoolhouse formerly owned by the Japanese and used for religious and educational purposes. In 1957 the membership was 105, with Paul J. Wiebe as leading minister, assisted by Abraham H. Toews. H.D.F.

Strawberry Lake Mission Church (MC), located on the White Earth Indian Reservation, Becker Co., Minn., is a member of the North Central Conference. In 1948 there were ten members, two of whom were Chippewa Indians, and a class of 22 was under instruction for baptism. The work was started by Joe Gingerich of Detroit Lakes, Minn., who conducted Sunday school in a local schoolhouse for a number of years. The meetinghouse was built in 1948 by voluntary labor from several states. In 1957 the membership was 20, with Llewellyn Groff in charge. L.Gr.

Streichenberg, a former Mennonite congregation near Eppingen in Baden, Germany, was settled at the beginning of the 18th century by exiles from the Swiss canton of Bern (Müller, 210, where the name is Streigenberg). At the beginning of the 19th century Martin Frey, a member of the congregation, built a meetinghouse. In 1843 Heinrich Baer of the Dammhof was chosen elder and Samuel Brandt and Daniel Baer deacons. Later the Streichenberg congregation merged with Bockschaft (q.v.). In 1731 it numbered ten families. In the Dutch Naamlijst of 1766 the congregation is called the Bockschaft, Streichenberg, and Wesingen church. Martin Kräuter was at that time its elder, ordained in 1746. In 1767 the congregation obtained a second elder, Jakob Funck. The Naamlijst of 1773 lists Bockschaft and Streichenberg as two separate congregations, each with its own elder and preachers. The elder of the Streichenberg church was Jakob Funck and the preachers were Heinrich Funck (ord. 1772) and Philippus Schneider (1772-after 1801). According to later issues of the Naamlijst, Funck was followed as elder in 1773 by Jost Glück, who served until after 1801. Later preachers were Martin Frey 1780-c 86, another Heinrich Funk 1783-89, Christian Heer (Herr) 1785-after 1801, and Mathias Bär 1790-after 1801. Neither Streichenberg nor Bockschaft exists any longer under its own name; in 1841 Streichenberg united with Ittlingen (q.v.), and since 1913 it has belonged to the Sinshelm (q.v.) congregation. Streyers, Jan, a Quaker of Kaldekerk, near Crefeld, Germany, probably a Mennonite before 1679 when Quakerism was planted in this area, one of the three promoters of the German settlement along with Jacob Telner (q.v.) and Dirck Sipman (q.v.). He bought 5,000 acres of land in Pennsylvania from Benjamin Furly, Penn's agent in Rotterdam, which he finally turned over to his younger brother William, one of the first 13 Germantown settler families. He spent a short time in Germantown sometime between 1687 and 1706.

When William Penn came to the Rhineland again in 1686, he visited Wesel, where Jan Streypers and his son-in-law, H. J. van Aaken, met him and accompanied him to Kirchheim and Crefeld. E.H.B.

Strickler Mennonite Church (MC), now extinct. Henry Strickler settled southeast of Columbia, Pa., and Jacob and Henry went to Hellman Twp., York Co., early to establish a Mennonite community. About 1790 Jacob sold from his 150-acre farm a three-cornered plot to Henry Strickler, Andrew Garber, and Abraham Flury for a Mennonite meetinghouse. The brick was imported from England for a 30 x 28 ft. building directly south of the Lincoln Highway, about two miles west of Wrightsville. The well-kept Strickler burying ground is about a quarter mile east. The congregation was under Lancaster Conference and was served by Frederick Stauffer as bishop, Daniel Stauffer and David Witmer as ministers, and Michael Strickler as deacon in the late 1880's. Witmer's, now known as Stony Brook (q.v.), absorbed this membership by 1920 the house was razed and plot sold.

Strobel (or Helwig), Christina, of Gotha, Germany, an Anabaptist martyr, was drowned with nine other Anabaptists in the Unstrut between Mühlhausen and Ammern, on Nov. 9, 1573. (Wappler, Thüringen, 162; ML IV.)

Stroe, het, a hamlet on the former island of Wieringen, Dutch province of North Holland, where there was a branch of the Wieringen (q.v.) Mennonite congregation, with a meetinghouse of its own. The first meetinghouse, a frame building, was rebuilt in 1738. This curious old-type meetinghouse built like a brick barn burned down on April 2, 1938. Strohm (Strahm), a Mennonite family, formerly living in Switzerland. Ulrich Strohm emigrated to the Palatinate, Germany, in 1671; Martin Strahm (Strohm), of Höchstetten, was in prison at Bern, Switzerland, because of his Mennonite convictions, and was expelled from the country in 1711; he probably also settled in the Palatinate. Here Heinrich Strohm was a preacher of the Oberflörsheim (q.v.) and Griesheim congregations 1758-90, and Johannes Strohm was a preacher of the Erpolzheim (q.v.) and Friesenheim (q.v.) united congregation 1757-80. Another Johannes Strohm (b. 1781 at Kriegsheim, d. 1852 at West Point, Iowa), a preacher of Schway, Bavaria, 1821-47, emigrated to America with some children and many grandchildren. One of these was the preacher Matthias Strahm.

Struth Mennonite Church near Saverne, Lower Alsace, France, was probably established soon after the end of the Thirty Years' War by emigrants from Switzerland. Its members were increased by refugees who had been driven out of Markkirch (q.v.) by the decree of 1712. It appears in the Dutch Naamlijst of 1768 and following as "Stroeter Gemeente." It was located in the midst of a sympathetic Protestant population, which resulted later in mixed marriages, which may well have accounted in part for the ultimate disappearance of the congregation. Leading names in the community indicate previous Mennonite origin, such as Haury, Zehr, Biehler, Hunzinger, Kempf, Lehmann, Springer, Muller, Maurer, Martin, and Risser. It was represented at the Essingen Conference in 1759 by Uli Sommer, and in 1779 by Christian Nafziger and Hans Schertz. It participated in 1809 in the collection for defraying expenses of the delegates to Paris in the matter of nonresistance. The Naamlijst of 1802 lists Christian Naftziger, Jr., as elder. By the middle of the 19th century Struth had died out.

Stübner, Markus Thomae, one of the "Zwickau prophets," the son of the owner of a bathhouse at Elsterberg in Vogtland, therefore called "Stübner" (room owner), studied theology at the University of Wittenberg. He left the university in 1521, met Nikolaus Storch (q.v.) and Thomas Müntzer (q.v.), and enthusiastically adopted their ideas. He accompanied Müntzer on his third journey to Bohemia. In Zwickau he was a zealous follower of Storch. With Storch and Thomas Drechsel (q.v.) he went to Wittenberg in December 1521 and was the actual spokesman in the discussions with Melancthon (q.v.). He won Martin Cellarius (q.v.) and Gerhard von Westerborg (q.v.) to their cause. In April 1522 he also had a discussion with Luther, which was, however, fruitless. A letter which he wrote to Luther from the town of Kemberg was answered by Luther with the words, "Farewell, dear Marcus." Nothing is known of Stübner's further fate. NEFF.

Stuckey (Stucky, Stucki), a Mennonite family of Swiss descent, originally living in the Bernese Oberland. Peter Stucki (q.v.) died as a martyr at Bern in 1538. In the 18th and 19th centuries members of this family lived in the Bernese Jura, particularly in the Pruntrut (Porrentruy) district. By the early 18th century some Swiss Stuckis had settled in Alsace; Christen Stucki (b. c1687) of Diemtigen in the Bernese Oberland was one of the emigrants to the Netherlands in 1711, and settled with this family near Sappemeer (q.v.). His descendants in the 19th century left the Mennonite Church.

The first Stuckeys in America came from Alsace in 1830 (see Stuckey, Joseph). They were Amish. Others (see Stucky, Jacob) came from Volhynia (q.v.) in 1874 to where a Stucki family had emigrated from the canton of Bern in 1740. There are numerous descendants in America. vbZ.

Stuckey, Joseph (1825-1902), founder and outstanding leader of the Central (Illinois) Conference of Mennonites (q.v.), was born in Alsace July 12, 1825, the oldest of the eight children of Peter Stuckey and Elizabeth Sommers, his grandparents having lived in the canton of Bern, Switzerland. He immigrated with his parents in 1830 to Butler County (q.v.), Ohio, where he was baptized at the age of eighteen in the Amish congregation. He married Barbara Roth on Dec. 17, 1844; they had two children. In October 1858 he moved to McLean County, Ill., where he was ordained deacon, minister on April 8, 1860, and bishop on April 26, 1864, both times by Bishop Jonathan Yoder, for the Rock Creek (Yoder) A.M. Church, and after Yoder's death became the recognized leader of the Amish Mennonites of Central Illinois. From 1872 to his death on Feb. 5, 1902, he was pastor of the North Danvers congregation. He was in great demand as a preacher and bishop to assist in ordinations, communion services, etc., and traveled widely among the Amish of the central states. He was a regular and influential attendant at the Amish general conferences known as Diener-Versammlungen (q.v.) until 1872. In that year, because he refused the request of the conference to excommunicate a member of his congregation who advocated universalism, although Stuckey himself never held this view, he was declared out of fellowship.
